Last week's mention of Runciman, the vets who practised in Downing Street, Cambridge, has brought back interesting memories. Miss Daphne Foreman of Cambridge remembers hearing the clang of the anvil when walking along Downing Street and of something bizarre: a tiny horse head suspended by its neck that hung in the vet's waiting room. It was only about two inches but had a perfectly-shaped horse's hoof and just four points where the legs would have developed. It was labelled 'Willnot Winalot', she recalls.

Mr R.T. Norman of Waterbeach tells me how, as a lad, he used to go with a lorry to clear out the Downing Street stables – it was a very regular and unpleasant job. The muck was taken to be burnt on the steeplechase course at Cottenham that they owned. The Runciman family lived in a large house in Howes Close – Mr Norman went and cut the lawn and made hay in the garden. But as well as curing animals the vet also culled them. Rabbits were a very great pest and it was his son who brought breeding fleas from Australia which he introduced into a field to bring myxomatosis into the rabbit population.

In 1953 outbreaks of the disease killed 99 per cent of the rabbits but they recovered quickly. It was a distressing sight to see the stricken animals, Major Harry Legge-Bourke, the Isle of Ely MP told Parliament in June 1956. He'd gone shooting in Norfolk at the height of an outbreak: "There was more mercy-killing that day, than the shooting of game. I was truly horrified by the effect", he confessed. The rabbit had a food value and a manufacturing value, it was of use to the economy of the country and for export. Now because of a lack of rabbits, foxes were feeding on animals they had never troubled before. Whenever man tried to upset the balance of nature he created as many troubles as he solved. People had also attempted to exterminate the grey squirrel, which ate pigeons' eggs. The result was a great increase in pigeons, which were a pest, the Major told members, 50 years ago.

Memories 26th November 2007, by Mike Petty

Michael Reynolds grew up beside the Cam in the 1920s. He remembered how residents of the cottages along Granta Place were allowed to dry their washing on Laundress Green – and how at one time the council hired out washing lines. It was here too that they would beat their carpets – there were no vacuum cleaners then – and also had right to fill their buckets from dipping holes for drinking purposes. Courting couples used to canoodle beside the buttresses of Peterhouse wall along Coe Fen and Michael used to ride along path on bicycles and throw banger fireworks against the wall!

Nearby was Bunker's Hill Island which was annexed by John Hodson and became known as Hodson's Garden. He built a summer-house with his coat of arms on it where he supervised the fish hatchery he constructed. He invested his money in the railways but lost it when a speculator fled to America, forcing him to sell the land which was bought by the Dale brewing family. They used it to entertain their friends to tea by the river

Later Michael Reynold's mother turned it into a riverside tea garden to cater for the passing boat trade. She got permission to have a punt fitted with an outboard motor so she could transport food and drinks from the Belle Vue Hotel that they owned.

The Belle Vue was the first in Cambridge to have central heating and hot and cold running water. It also boasted a pleasant drawing room, card room, spacious lounge and loggia. In 1930s it acquired an 18-hole crazy-golf course with hazards such as a howitzer gun and a water jump. There was a dovecote on the lawn which was home to fantail pigeons until it became overcrowded. When the pigeons started laying eggs on hotel beds they had to go.

Guests were summoned to meals by a large and loud eighteen-inch gong which was beaten twice before a meal by Alice the waitress. They could enjoy wines, sherry and port – but beer had to be fetched by waiters from the Mill pub as the liquor licence issued by the Vice Chancellor of the University did not cover spirits or beer.

Michael sometimes accompanied his mother as she went shopping for fresh food. She bought from the fish market in Peas Hill, vegetables from Horace Simpkins a Cottenham farmer, fruit from Whitehead's stall, and groceries from Matthews in Trinity Street and Eaden Lilley of Market Street

Afternoon teas were popular with a choice of three or four different types of sandwiches, buttered brown and white bread with jam, a selection of 'dipped' French fancy cakes and a rich fruitcake. As the number of guests increased they ran out of tables, chairs, and lawn space. So they doubled the price. But numbers still increased.

By then the Belle Vue had become the Garden House Hotel and established its reputation as Cambridge's finest. It was a reputation that Michael worked to enhance once he took over after the Second World War. They welcomed notable guests, including Diana Dors in 1950 and Jack Cohen who stayed while preparing for the opening of Cambridge's first Tesco in St Andrew's Street

They hosted weddings, receptions and dinners, including one to promote holidays in Greece in 1970. However a number of academics and others felt this was endorsing an 'illegal' Greek regime and organised a demonstration that escalated into a riot during which guests were attacked, policemen injured and part of the hotel trashed. The resultant trial made headlines around the world and caused Michael much trauma. Worse was to follow. In April 1972 the hotel was swept by a disastrous fire in which two women guests lost their lives.

Michael and his management team moved to the other hotel he had established, the Royal Cambridge, where he planned a new first-class hotel, building on the reputation of the old. It was rapturously received, bookings flooded in and everybody was supportive – apart from the bank. When they refused to honour an agreement they'd made Michael arrived at work to find the Official Receiver sitting at his desk. His connection with the Garden House was abruptly ended and a nightmare period ensued. But he refused to give up, as those attending his funeral today will be told.

Michael Reynolds battled cancer and compiled his memories of Growing up with The Garden House. They were sent to the printers only hours before his death.

Now copies of his remarkable account of a remarkable life can be obtained from his son, David, at dmichaelreynolds@hotmail.co.uk. There is no charge though a £10 donation to Hospitality Action at 62 Britton Street, London, EC1M 5UY would be appreciated. Michael never called on them for help, but others in his most hard-working profession do.

Three readers have been in touch with musical items.

Linda Gipp would like further details about the Cambridge Railway Silver Band. Her grandfather, John William Johnson played the big drum and was an engine driver. His son, also John William Johnson - but known as Jack – also played. She has a photograph of the band taken about 1930, posed in front of a locomotive, and another with a shield taken in the mid 1920s. But what did they win it for? Let me know if you can help, or if you recognise anybody in the picture. [SCAN OF BAND IN FRONT OF LOCO; SCAN OF THE SHIELD]
Email Linda at stuartcam@ntlworld.com

George Gould has an original sketch by Ronald Searle, who was the News cartoonist for some years. It shows the Magpies Concert Party. The pianist is Cyril Gould, the lady next to him is his wife Dorothy (Doll) Gould, but the other four people he's not so sure about. Can anybody identify them? The names George recalls in association with the 'Magpies' are Godwin Hunt, George Gass, Dolly Hunt and Alice Reynolds. If you can help then email ggould@totalise.co.uk or drop me a line at the News

Mrs T.A. Harrall from Willingham has sent me a photo of the Ken Stevens Orchestra when the line-up was Barry Mason (trumpet), Bertie Smith (baritone sax), Don Jenkins (alto), Mike Waller, (tenor), Bernie Stubbings (drums), Ken Stevens (piano) and Ken Southee (double bass). My mention of Runciman's, the vets in Downing Street has brought further details from Dr P.G. Jackson of Over. He has researched the family in some detail, tracing them back to Thomas Runciman senior who set up in Ely in 1890 where he remained until his death in 1930. Four of his five sons qualified as veterinary surgeons of whom James G Runciman took the Downing Street practice in 1907 where he was joined by his son, James P.G.

Dr Jackson recalls:

"As a boy I often walked past the practice premises in Downing Street and barking dogs could often be heard. JG and JPG Runciman were always dapper and mostly wore trilby hats. One or both could often be seen working as veterinary inspectors at Cambridge Cattle Market on Mondays. I came in contact with them when I helped out at the dairy at Home Farm, Babraham in my school holidays. They had many interesting remedies including 'Runciman's Red drink' and 'Runciman's Yellow drink' and had the RCVS coat of arms on their medicine bottles. On one memorable day I helped JPG Runciman deliver twin calves at Babraham and was even more determined then to train as a veterinary surgeon myself"

He would love to hear more about the family. You can email him at pggj2@cam.ac.uk or write to me and I'll put you in touch.

Don Unwin has sent more memories of Banhams boatyard; he writes:

"Banhams used to build their own hire boats on the site whilst the rowing 4s and 8s were built in the "long room", a long timber workshop constructed over a wet dock nearer to Victoria bridge. The Cambridge 8s for the Oxford & Cambridge boat race were built in this workshop. In the dock underneath steam launches were often moored. When floods were expected all the electric motors and other gear likely to be affected were unbolted and lifted up onto the benches. On one occasion Mr Leach's steam launch was moored in there when the river level rose unexpectedly one night and the funnel pushed the floor boards of the workshop above up!

"Life in the workshop on Saturday mornings were hectic, hire boats came in early, hopefully before 10am and had to be serviced before the first hirers arrived about 12 noon. Apart from cleaning and refuelling this sometimes involved an engine change or other repair work. It was a case of everybody being pressed into help and on occasions I used to go and give a hand. If a hire boat broke down whilst away from the yard this involved sending a rescue party either by road or in another boat. Although very rare, gas explosions due to ignition of leaking Calor gas, which is heavier than air, laying in the bilges were not unknown. They also ran trip boats on the river, the Viscountess Bury and the Enchantress were the two large ones.”

Another reader, Michael Pittcock wonders if anybody has any information about the Viscountess Bury which used to operate cruises between Cambridge and Ely? It was to be refitted in the mid 1980s, but where is it now, he wonders. You can email

Memories 10th December 2007, by Mike Petty

Many older residents can recall when their town or village had a dozen or more pubs. But few people can list as many as Patrick Ashton who has been researching the story of Ely Inns. He has tracked down about 80, most of which have now ceased trading

They included the Red Lion in the High Street that closed in 1911. It was already an inn by Christmas Day 1636 when two Ely labourers were charged with burglary. While the landlady, Mary Smythe and all the rest of the household were at divine service, one of them "did beate downe a Baye which he did cutt with a morespade, a hammer and a paire of pynsers; dyd breake open two lockes, the one of a trunke and the other of a chest wherein her money did lye. And took out x pounds in gould, twenty in silver and xxx tie single pence". The Red Lion was obviously a hospitable place: sixty years later Elizabeth Stoughton of Bottisham told how she was awoken from her slumbers by a cider merchant of Downham Market trying to get into bed with her. She fought him off and went back to sleep, only to be disturbed a second time, this time by a Newmarket innkeeper.

This is only one: there was the Bell, the Club, Cromwell Arms, Elephant and Castle, George and Dragon, Maid's head, Queen's Head and the Tinker of Ely. Not to mention the Royal Standard (which was once a tearoom and private museum), Windmill, Woolpack and Globe.

But what others do you remember. To jog your memories see Patrick's new book "Ely Inns" which has just been launched – with wine rather than beer – by the Ely Society. (ISBN 0-903616-23-8 £7.99)

Memories 17th December 2007, by Mike Petty

At this time of year people traditionally like to look back on the 'Good old Days'. Seventy-five years ago, on 23rd December 1932, the News reflected on 'Christmas Memories': "The grocers and wine merchants handed out gaily coloured almanacs as 'Christmas Boxes' and butchers made a sucking pig, decorated with gold and silver tinsel and holly berries, and having an orange in its mouth, a feature of their shop window display", they wrote

Eric Isaacson from Soham recalls how his father, a butcher, was featuring the same sort of display back in the 1930s. He also recollects how his dad travelled down to the Angel Hall, Islington and bought four big cattle that were shipped up to the village. Then on the Saturday night they were tethered in front of the shop, standing in the gutter with a bay of hay. When the old men came out of the fen for their weekly shave they would strut up and down before making their selection: 'I'll have a stone off that one, Ernie'. But, as Eric observes, once the animals had been slaughtered who could tell just what joint had come from which?

F.C. Coldspink of Burwell did things differently in the 1920s: his joints were labelled with the name of the farmer who had reared them, including Sir Ernest Cassel and R. Moore from Fulbourn. However it is now some years since Cambridge had a city-centre butcher such as MacFisheries to display their wares, seen here in 1974

Years ago some butchers had a Christmas club with families saving a penny a week so they could afford what would be their only piece of red meat – butcher's meat – a year. It was usually geese and ducks that they reared themselves, a couple of wild rabbits or a hare – perhaps a brace of poached pheasants or a nine or ten pounder cockerel fattened up for Christmas.

Turkeys were practically unknown in Soham before the war, says Eric. But Pam Blakeman has lent me a photograph showing Christmas time at Archie Haylock's farm yard in Market Street, Ely in 1931. He kept his cows in the Dean's field, next the park, and either milked in the field or drove them up the Gallery to Market Street to be milked. But at Christmas time turkeys were his main enterprise. They were purchased at the Attleborough trade fair, in Norfolk, then taken to the railway station and put on a train to Ely. On arrival they were driven up Back Hill and waddled along the Gallery to Market Street, which was their last resting place.

Our seasonable fare had changed, the News of 1932 lamented. Curious dishes as roast swans and peacocks sewn up in their feathers once appeared on lordly tables at Christmastide but in humbler homes the plum pudding of today was a 'hash' of brown bread, raisins and allspice; mince pieces were known as coffin or manger pies from the shape of the crust and were filled with chopped mutton.

Many a Cambridgeshire housewife baked an extra batch of bread on Christmas Eve, in the belief that it would never go mouldy, while at midnight the pixies and fairies visited the houses of those who were good to them and left gifts on the doorsteps. Christmas morning brought the children to the doors, singing their greetings. Some of the girls carried dolls resting on decorated boxes, to represent the child Jesus in the manger; other bore 'wassail boughs' of holly, mistletoe and coloured ribbons. Only occasionally nowadays (the News wrote in 1932) is this pretty custom observed, though we do look for a 'fair man' to 'let in' Christmas and brings us luck.

Sybil Marshall remembered one very memorable Christmas present she received – a wonderful dolly with jointed arms, eyes that shut and a veil over its face. She waited impatiently for her friend to visit from across the fen, anxious to show it off. "What did he bring you" Sybil enquired, only to learn that Santa had not managed to find his way to their isolated house. In truth the family were too poor to afford such luxuries. But Sybil's mother had suspected as much: "Well bless my soul, I quite forgot to tell you. When I cleared away that mince pie you'd left for Father Christmas I found a note from him – he said he'd not been able to find their house down the drove, so he'd left Molly's present here." And from the cupboard under the stairs came an identical doll – only it didn't have a veil.

But children need not worry – Santa will find them somehow, as John Carter discovered when he snapped him in action in Cambridge in 1954. Were you amongst the lucky recipients – and what did he bring you?

Sybil and Eric's recollections have been recorded by Lester Milbank along with a number of wonderful tales of other fenland folk. They are now issued on a CD of Fenland Memories which also incorporates some of the songs and humour of a generation who will be fondly recalled in many a house at this festive time. "WHAT DID HE BRING YOU" – FATHER CHRISTMAS VISITS CAMBRIDGE
CHILDREN IN 1954

This Christmas Eve many eyes will be scanning the rooftops and chimneypots, seeking for a glimpse of a red-coated figure and perhaps a string of reindeers. But in Cambridge the roofs could be alive after dark at any time.

Colleges had strict rules. Their gates closed at ten o'clock and at midnight the college porter took to his bed; after that nobody could enter without a late pass. There was a penalty of a few pence to be paid as gate money for coming back between ten and twelve so students considered the option of climbing in. The obvious ways were guarded by revolving spikes, designed to spin under the drunkard's foot and drive into his thigh. Sometimes a hansom cab was hired, backed up to a wall to give a platform from which to shin over. Otherwise they turned to drainpipes. However they got in it was something to be repeated only in necessity

But others took to the rooftops in the cause of sport. In the 1920s membership of the Cambridge Alpine Society was only open to those who had climbed into every college after the gate had closed. Trinity Hall was really difficult but could be entered by swarming up the angle of a twenty-foot brick wall in Garret Hostel Lane before manoeuvring over spikes and a bone-shaking drop on the other side. Shane Leslie managed it in 1907 as he recorded in his book 'The Film of Memory' in 1938

Other exploits are less well recorded. In 1927 three well-known Cambridge sportsmen decided to spend part of one Saturday night in the grounds of each of the women's colleges. So at midnight they climbed into Newnham, taking with them a tent which they pitched in full view. They were not discovered until they were all snug in "bed", when they commenced community singing. Newnham dons became alarmed and phoned for the police, who turned them out. They then motored to Girton, scaled a twelve-foot wall and again set up camp. They were not noticed until the early hours of the morning when the porter came on duty.

There was another outbreak of 'night climbing' in 1932 when two parties of undergraduates, including several well-known athletes, climbed to the roof of King's College chapel and tied an umbrella to the lightning conductor. They reported that the stone had become so soft that it crumbled away in their hands and fragments of masonry fell to the ground. A few nights later it was the turn of Emmanuel College when buckets were placed on top of prominent pinnacles. They were quickly removed by college workmen.

Some details of such secret activity was recorded in a book entitled 'The Night climbers of Cambridge' first published in 1937 by 'Whipplesnaith', now revealed as the pen-name of Noel H. Symington. He gave accounts of routes and hazards, providing an unusual insight into college architecture. His classic work was reissued in 1952 and has just been republished by Oleander Press (ISBN 978-0906672-83-9, £16.95)

But such activity continued after he left Cambridge, indeed in 1943 'official' photographs of students climbing into Peterhouse were taken to be published in a Russian magazine. Then once the war was over many of the young men who came to the University had been fighting for king and country and were not amenable to college regulations about staying out late. 'Climbing in' became the rule and to stop them the Master of Trinity Hall – already one of the most difficult – decreed that barbed wire should be fixed along the tops of the college walls. Contractors worked long and hard but next morning the newly-erected barbed wire was neatly rolled up in front of the college – the new undergraduates were proving they had escaped from far more secure accommodation than that!

In more recent times 'Peace in Vietnam' banners and a variety of other items have continued to be strung overnight on prominent places. But many other exploits have remained secret. Perhaps you can add a tale or two. Especially if you travel by reindeer sleigh.

A new book claims that a woman's work was never done But just what did they do?

Professor Margaret Spufford, who has contributed the introduction, says the core of a married woman's work was the upkeep of the home – cleaning, scrubbing, washing, shopping, cooking and trying to make ends meet. Often that meant going out to work, but little has been recorded about this side of their duties.

"Holly Leaves" magazine for Christmas 1956 included an article on fenland life 50 years earlier. It featured a picture of women and children in the harvest fields captioned: "The harvesting of crops like mustard and hemp was often left to women using their old-fashioned toothed sickles. They looked gay in their cotton sunbonnets which gave excellent protection against sun and dust. For the children the harvest was a prolonged picnic party". It forgot to mention the hard nature of the work for the grown-ups.

But Joyce Thulbon (nee Salmon) remembers how in the 1960's many women were still working on the land:

"There were many farmers within this region and these needed flower pickers and fruit pickers. Other ladies picked up potatoes, hoed out sugar beat and pulled up carrots. They came home suffering with back strain or aching muscles that they didn't even know they had. Indeed the first time I picked up potatoes, I did not know how to get out of bed the next morning. I was lucky up to a point that my husband had his own smallholding, so I did not have too far to travel to my work.

"When my children were very young I only worked when the weather allowed me to take the children with me as in those days there were no nurseries or play schools in rural areas. Other mothers, who really wanted to work, took their young families with them, spending time sheltering from spring and summer showers in garden sheds and barns. Women who regularly worked the land sometimes formed themselves into gangs and moved together around the various smallholdings helping wherever needed. It was fun though, as every one joined together to make the work enjoyable

"Juggling this with housework, washing, cooking and caring for three small children was not an easy task in those days as there were not the modern conveniences of today. Plus there were no packets of ready meals, it was good old-fashioned food prepared by the lady of the house"

Joyce's reminiscences were tape recorded by the Haddenham Farmland Museum in the 1970s and have featured on BBC Radio programmes. Now Lorna Delanoy has edited a selection for a booklet "Women's Work is Never Done" which is available for £6 with profits going to Great Ormond Street Children's Hospital. Email lorna@delanoy.co. or phone 01353 777691

Several readers have contacted me following Memories articles. They too recall women's work.

Eddie Holden emails to say his wife Mary worked in the Wines and Spirit department at the Ely Brewery, under Herbert Roythorne. Her job was to break down the raw spirit with distilled water to the correct volume content, and then colour it to the brewery's colour, as raw spirit is clear. In the late forties she used to go around Ely Pubs on a Thursday and collect the extra licensing fees for opening all day during the Thursday market.

William Aubury's mother worked at Runciman's the vets in Downing Street, Cambridge. He recalls: "She started work there in September 1945 as a Veterinary Nurse and left late 1958. As I was born in 1947 and there was no such thing as child care, my mother was allowed to take me with her. I can remember 'helping' Mr Austin shoeing horses and also making the horseshoes. I also helped mum by washing various size bottles before animal medicine was put into them and taking labels off animal eye ointment so they could put the Runciman's labels onto them before they were dispensed. I also helped her walk the dogs and clean the cat and dog kennels out. The two rooms I was not allowed into were the waiting room and the consultation room. But I watched some of the operations on the animals"

Memories 2008 in one sequence

Memories 7th January 2008, by Mike Petty

News of the fire at the Royal Marsden Hospital reminds me that our own Addenbrooke's Hospital suffered in much the same way in the early 1900s.

In January 1906, fire broke out in the roof of the Hospital in Trumpington Street. A laundry maid saw wreaths of smoke above the roof of the operating theatre and raised the alarm. The Hatton and Victoria wards nearest the seat of the fire contained women who on the whole behaved with surprising calmness. Patients were carried down the emergency staircase on stretchers or led to safety by staff.

Meanwhile, the hospital fire hose was brought into action together with another from the Fitzwilliam Museum, until the Fire Brigade arrived. There was plenty of water, but their pumps did not possess the power to raise it high enough. Hoses were laid up staircases and with dripping skirts the nurses assisted to drag them into position.

A large number of slates had to be removed from the roof to enable the firemen to get at the seat of the blaze, and one fireman had a narrow escape when he fell through the charred remains of the roof but was caught by Fireman Wing.

Had the outbreak taken place at the front of the building with a high wind it is doubtful the building could have been saved.

There was an urgent need for a steam fire engine, people said.

But they had said the same thing four years earlier in October 1902 when fire broke out in the women's ward at the top of the left wing of the hospital. In a very short time the flames secured a firm hold, burst through the roof and worked towards the centre of the building. Nurses and probationers heroically entered the wards and led their patients to a place of safety with several old men brought to the lawn in the front of the burning building.

The News reported how "Bed after bed, each with its living freight, was carefully lifted with stalwart arms and borne steadily to the quarters assigned to it in neighbouring houses."

In the meantime the clouds of smoke rolling skywards from the hospital gradually grew less in volume. The ceaseless exertions of the firemen were telling their tale, and soon water pouring in a cascade down the staircase adjoining the blazing wing made it clear the building was flooded to the extent that rendered the further spread of the fire improbable.

Despite all the efforts, the roof and contents of Victoria Ward were destroyed along with beds, bedding, linen, tables, chairs and other furniture. The cause was judged to be the actual construction of the building itself, where joints extended into the chimneys. It was a miracle it had not happened before.

In 1977, the News carried photographs of nurses once more evacuating patients; fortunately this time it was just an exercise. Did you take part?

A recent article has brought a response from Neil Lanham. He writes: "I read your Memories piece about women's work and wondered if my mother Ruby's story might be of interest.

“She did everything there was on the land - when they bought an International junior tractor for her to drive in 1921 she literally ploughed from morn to night without leaving the tractor seat (having a packed dokey!!) and then often into the night with a hurricane lamp set at either end of the furrow. When the tractor packed up she then had to take the head off and decarbonise the engine herself - which she did often and alone. When the depression really set in her only pleasure was in taking a quarter-bred Shire horse out of its ploughing traces to have a day's hunting on.”

Ruby recorded her own memories of the hard times of the mid 1930s in her own words: “We were in everybody's debt. We couldn't buy anything, we couldn't pay for anything, we were as poor as church mice”, she recalled. “It was no good thinking that when you threshed a stack out you could sell the corn. Just as likely the corn merchant would hear that you were threshing and he'd send his wagons up for the corn because we were up to our neck in hock with him. We were well in his ribs. The bailiffs came up and put stickers on the furniture and you had to sit and eat at a table and chairs with bailiffs stockers on them saying that if such and such money for the rates had not been paid within so many days they'd be taken away and sold.”.

She was philosophical about it: “It was a time when you could walk on land from Cambridge to Clacton that nobody would take. A time when it was driving honest to goodness hard working farmers shany and they were being turned out of their homes and committed to the workhouse. But if you did not have anything you were lucky because you did not have the worry of it”

But even then there was time for fun: “One night I had some Carol Singers come to the door. They were boys from the village after a few pence. I knew that one was Tom Skinner. I went upstairs with a bag of flour and gently dropped some out of the window on the boy Skinner. ‘Blast that snaw’ he said. So I dropped a bit more, then a whole lot more, on his head and he looked up and said: ‘That's yer b... Ruby!’. So I asked them in and gave 'em a mince pie each after that.”

But hard as it was, Ruby's mother had it even worse. In later years she came to live with Ruby and Neil at Newmarket. Neil recalls:

“In her final bedridden days a mouse got into the bedroom. They tried to catch it but had failed. Emily at this time was surviving on a few biscuits which she would munch when she felt like it and this the mouse knew. It would crawl up the bedpost and over the eiderdown and nibble the crumbs whilst she was dozing off to sleep. One time whilst she had a little piece of biscuit in her hand and was dozing she noticed out of the corner of her eye the mouse appearing and coming over the eiderdown. Although her hands were eaten up with rheumatism and her joints as big as footballs and she had a piece gone off finger in a rat trap and the joint off another squashed where it had gone in a mangle, she still had enough nip left in her hand to kill that mouse when it got close enough. I think this story shows the necessity of the times that Ruby and her mother had been through”

Now Neil Lanham has edited some of Ruby's remarkable memories into a book “There's a story that my mother told”, (ISBN 978 0 9666947-0-0) is available from him at Ivy Todd, Helions Bumpstead, Haverhill CB9 7AT for £11.95

Memories 21 January 2008, by Mike Petty

When Nick Harrison went to Oakington Primary School in the 70's he heard talk about 'the first aeroplane in the world being built in Oakington'. Of course it wasn't, but there was some truth in the rumour. Then in 1998 he discovered some hand written notes based on an article published in the Cambridge Chronicle in September 1909. After reading them Nick was hooked and decided to find out more about the famous plane and its makers, Grose and Feary – then just names to him.

Since then he has amassed piles of information but has one last piece to add to the jigsaw.

His researches show that Alfred M Grose was born at Newington, London in 1879 and in the 1901 census was described as a 'motor engineer articled pupil'. He later travelled extensively throughout England, America & India, in the motor trade, and was reputed to have had the first motor driver's license.

His partner was a local lad: Neville Alexander Thomas Nix Feary who was born in 1884 in Earith near St Ives. His father Neville was a farmer and his mother Lucy sadly died the year he was born. By 1901 Neville Alexander or Alec as he was referred to, was staying as a 'Visitor' with William Nix (his uncle) in, Sevenoaks, Kent.

In 1909 both lads were apprentices at the Windham Detachable Motor Body Co. A car owner only had to buy one powerful chassis, to which various bodies could be fitted, slid into place on channels fitted to the frame. But Windham was also interested in aviation and he engaged Grose & Feary in the design and manufacture of a glider.

By this time Britain had fallen well behind in the aeronautical world, whilst the Americans and French were mastering the skies. In attempt to redress the balance, Lord Northcliffe of the Daily Mail announced a competition in 1909 for the first all British aircraft to fly a circular mile, piloted by a Briton. This was enough for Grose & Feary to set about designing their entrant. It was based on the successful lines of the Bleriot and Antoinette monoplanes of the day. The fuselage & wings were built at Windham's factory, the propeller came from Handley Page but the undercarriage was built by a Cambridge bicycle builder, Herbert Vincent Quinsee of East Road.

The components were brought together for final assembly in a barn at Manor Farm Oakington where Feary's uncle, Thomas Cooke, was the tenant farmer. It was an ideal site with its large barns, quiet location and the large flat fields that surrounded it. Here Grose & Feary worked on their monoplane which was finally finished it in April 1910.

But would it fly? The plane was tethered to a tree for its initial trial, but when it came to the big day to attempt flight, a dispute ensued. Grose argued that as he had a widowed mother to support Feary should be first to pilot the machine. Feary was of the opinion that as he was a father it was Grose who should be the guinea pig. It was not reported as to who finally agreed to jump into the hot seat, but all did not go well. Trials continued through 1910 but the monoplane refused to become airborne, other than when it hit a bump.

Later that year Grose & Feary called it a day and gave up on the project. The monoplane was exhibited in marquee in a field in Oakington, admission 6d. It was then dismantled and apparently taken to De-Havilland's factory.

Alick Feary went on to become a designer for Frederick Sage & Co. of Peterborough who were shop fitters, but built Avro aircraft during the First World War. He died in 1957 in Westminster, aged 72.

But what happened to Alfred Grose?

If you can answer this puzzle or have more information on early aviation in Cambridge then Nick would love to hear from you. You can email nick.harrison@oakingtonplane.co.uk or drop me a line at the News. And if you'd like to know more visit his website: www.oakingtonplane.co.uk

Do you remember the Cambridge of the 1950s? In 1958 a film crew turned up in the city to make a movie entitled 'Bachelor of Hearts', starring Hardy Kruger and Sylvia Syms. It was based around student life and contained a number of location shots. David Jakes remembers seeing it being made and now looks forward to watching the complete film again. For the Cambridge U3A film group have arranged a screening at the Arts Picture House on Tuesday 29th January at 1.30pm. It promises to be a treat not to be missed. All are welcome – contact the Arts Picture House or email redjakes@aol.com for more details.

Memories 4th February Mike Petty

News of the death of Jeremy Beadle has brought sadness to the millions of people to whom he brought laughter. But over the years other people have caused consternation yet left a smile in their wake.

One of these was William Horace De Vere Cole, hailed as the world champion hoaxer, who died from heart failure in France at the age of 53 in February 1936. Amongst the most famous of his practical jokes were when he dressed as a navvy and roped off a large area of Piccadilly and disguised as the 'Prince of Abyssinia' to inspect the British battleship, 'Dreadnought'

He first came to prominence when, while at University, he posed as the Sultan of Zanzibar whose imminent arrival at Cambridge station in March 1905 was intended to fool academic and civic authorities into giving him an official welcome and a tour of the colleges. In this he was partially successful but he failed to hoodwink the Mayor, Alderman Campkin, since the Cambridge Daily News had a few days earlier recalled a very similar hoax visit from the 'Shah of Persia' which had indeed been a triumph. Nevertheless this copy-cat performance launched Cole's career as a successful joker.

It was not his only Cambridge escapade. On one occasion he jumped on to the line at the station and, holding up his hands, stopped a train. When asked why he did so he replied "Because the lines are dirty". On another he walked into a confectioner's shop on King's Parade and with his stick knocked every cake off the stands for a bet. He then calmly proceeded to make a cheque out to cover the damage.

But there have been other attempts to fool Cambridge folk that are less well remembered, as these snippets from past issues demonstrate:

May 1822

An advertisement in the Cambridge Chronicle announced: Zachariah Whitmore of Philadelphia, N. America, begs to inform the inhabitants of Cambridge that he intends starting from Lynn on his water velocipede at 12 o'clock and will arrive at Cambridge between 6 and 7 o'clock in the evening on Whit Monday next. Accordingly on the day about 2000 persons assembled who, after several hours, found they had been hoaxed.

April 1904

A few days before Christmas a young man arrived in Bristol absolutely penniless but soon learned from a firm of solicitors that he was the son of the late Rev E.A. Stephens of Cambridge and entitled to a huge fortune. However the News smelled a rat and did some digging. They discovered clergymen who have seen long service did not remember him, his name did not appear in any University calendar and even members of the police force who have proverbial long memories did not recall him. Instead the story recalled a hoax played on a drayman who lived in Cambridge. He'd been informed that an uncle had died and left him a fortune so he threw up his position and went to Portsmouth to conclude the formalities, only to learn that the fabulous fortune was a myth and he had been cruelly hoaxed.

November 1921

Hoardings in Cambridge displayed posters announcing that Sir Arthur Conan Doyle would lecture in the Guildhall on 'Sex Equality After Death' and would completely vindicate the theory of materialisation. At the time indicated the Guildhall was crowded, but no lecturer appeared. Suddenly a white-robed figure came forward from the rear of the platform, bearing a banner inscribed with the words 'Sir Arthur Conan Doyle Failed to Materialise'. Pandemonium arose as the audience realised that it had been hoaxed

October 1952

If some bright young first-year Freshman had not done some checking up, 1,200 Cambridge undergraduates might be on the carpet for trampling on the Senate House lawn. New undergraduates found in their room a printed notice inviting them to hear an address by the "University Chamberlain" – but it was a hoax, there is no such office. The University Registry was besieged with telephone inquiries and ordered the closing of the gates. Hundreds gathered around the Senate House curious to see what would happen but two hefty specimens of City Police proceeded to keep the sight-seers moving. Thus fizzled out the Freshman's Hoax, 1952 version.

There must be more recent ones – what do you remember, or what hoaxes did you perpetrate?

As Valentine's Day approaches I feature a love story sent in by Ann Garwood. Ann writes:

"On 31st December 2007 you showed a picture of women hoeing peas at Starlings Farm, Littleport in 1965. One of those women was my mother. The names of the women were, from left to right, Alma Heaps, Tressa Rolfe, my mother Mabel Clift, Joyce Brown, Mabel's sister Elizabeth Oxborough and Rose Crowe.

"Mabel was born 19th January 1916 at Suspension Bridge, Welney. Her father was a shepherd and wildfowler and her mother was the local 'midwife' and 'layer-outer', that is to say that when someone was giving birth they called for her to attend and when someone died she went to wash and prepare the body for the undertaker. Life was not too bad even though her parents went on to have five more children including a set of identical twin girls. Her father owned two cows and sold the milk and butter, they also had chickens and pigs at various times.

"Mabel went to school just up the road from her home until it was time to find work. Her sister Lizzie said that she was not strong enough for land work and that she would have to go into 'service'. She found employment with a local landowner and shopkeeper, Mr. & Mrs Jackson as a domestic servant. When she was 16 years old she met a boy named Reg Clift. She thought he was rather nice but the family kept saying that she should not get serious as he had 'consumption' which later they found to be asthma. They had lots of laughs.

"Later she found another post as a domestic servant with the Norman family but the job was in Littleport. By now Reg was her boyfriend and he would meet her in Littleport when she had time off. Life was looking good but Reg did not like her being left alone in the house whilst her employers were out so she looked for another job which she found working in the house, cooking and cleaning, for the Jones family who owned the Heygates Drapery Store in Littleport.

"Reg and Mabel spent as much time together as possible. One day Reg gave her a box and asked her to marry him and of course she said yes. They were married on Wednesday, 23rd November 1938 at Welney Parish Church. The weather was very windy and someone remarked it was the best wedding they had ever been too as not only did they see what the bridesmaids wore on the top but they also got to see what they wore underneath as well. Someone lost their hat and it floated away down the river.

"They went to live in a little black wooden bungalow a few doors away from Reg's parents. In the spring after they were married a farmer asked Mabel if she would do some sugar beet singling, she replied that she has never done anything like that but would try. She continued her working life doing farm work. In 1940 Reg got job on a farm owned by Claude Starling and a 'tied cottage' went with the job but they were not able to move into it until 1941 as evacuees had been housed there and it was in a mess, so Mr Starling has it cleaned for them. It was at Northfield Farm, Hundred Foot Bank, Pymoor where they lived continue to live until April 1967.

"Mabel and Reg had a little girl while the Second World War was in progress. They named me Ann. There was a big searchlight on the next door farm and Mabel and Reg were walking home pushing their baby in her pram and saw the bombers making their way to bomb Coventry. Reg had joined the Home Guard with Claude Starling and his brother-in-law Albert Oxborough. So life went on until I met my future husband, Alan, and Mabel started to plan the wedding. When I told them that they were to be grandparents Mabel was delighted. They bought a house and had it modernised and in April 1967 they moved to Littleport and put farm work behind them. Reg went to work at Standen's in Ely and Mabel went to work for Pye's in Cambridge on the assembly line where she made many new friends."

"My father is now aged 92 and lives in sheltered accommodation with 3 of his sisters, aged 84, 88 and 94. Unfortunately my mother, who is 92 years old, has Alzheimer's but I have written an account of her life as best I know."

Pauline Anderson has written from Cherry Hinton Road after she read an article in the News that the Brunswick School is being pulled down for flats. She writes: "My friend (Mrs Brenda Davis) and I both remember the time it was built, 1928/29 and Brenda still has a copy of the little booklet we were given at the time telling us all about it when it was officially opened in 1929.

"However we both started school at the old Brunswick in Auckland Road, off Newmarket Road. It was an old Victorian school with heating from open fires with fireguards round them where sometimes things were hung out to dry. The classroom sloped upwards and there were steps up to the back so everyone could be seen by the teacher. In the playground was an old brick toilet which did not flush. Altogether it was a dreary place. The school was also next door to a brewery and we could always smell the beer being brewed"

The Brunswick had started as a British School in Eden Walk in the 1840s before it moved to Auckland Road about 1900. However it was not to remain there very long.

In 1922 the Cambridge Education Committee received a report from the Borough Surveyor which said that the rooms at the north end of the building were no longer safe for occupation and would have to be pulled down. He could not be responsible for the safety of the children if that portion of the school were opened after the holiday, he told them. Councillors inspected the building and found that the foundations were slipping, the bricks in many cases were loose and breaking away. The buildings had been a source of trouble and anxiety for some time but there was no need for the alarming reports that had been spread - one that a portion of the school had fallen down and some children had been injured.

First they pulled down the Boys' School and later the Girls' School suffered a similar fate. In 1927 the foundation stone was laid of a new Brunswick School in Walnut Tree Avenue to provide accommodation for nearly 1,100 children. At the opening the Mayor said it was unfortunate, perhaps, that the other School fell down but this was a better building. When they compelled children to go to school there was an obligation to see the building provided as much fresh air and sunlight as possible.

Pauline certainly approved; she remembers: "One day as we were breaking up for the Summer holidays the Headmistress (Miss Duke) came to tell us that we should not be coming back to Auckland Road any more as a new school had been built for us in Walnut Tree Avenue. What a lovely change it was after what we had had before. We all loved it – central heating, proper desks with lids and proper toilets, and last but not least, a lovely lawn sloping down from the playground from where we could see Midsummer Common and the river. In June we could also see the fair and sometimes some of the fairground children would attend the school"

In July 1929 councillors agreed that the school could accommodate 320 boys, 320 girls and 210 infants but by 1982 falling rolls and cash cutbacks saw its as an ordinary 5 to 11 years school and it became part of Cambridge Regional College. Pauline and Brenda went to an open day and toured the classrooms, looking at photos of times past and recognising some of the people in them. Now they lament its passing.

Readers have been recording recollections of Cambridge's war-time shelters. The Bunker Project, a unique Heritage Lottery-funded venture which began in summer 2007, was the brainchild of Zoë Svendsen. When she found a well-preserved wartime shelter in her Cambridge back garden she began wondering what it had been like for citizens using such bunkers and shelters during the Second World War and the Cold War which followed it.

Zoë and her performing arts company METIS began researching with the help of volunteers who were given training in the skills of recording oral history. Many people came forward to recount their stories.

They tell of the excitement, fear, discomfort and uncertainties of wartime. For some shelters were places they played in as “war babies”, others say they still find the dank smell of a concrete building takes them back to the days when they sheltered underground from enemy attack.

Monica Smith remembers: “I lived a few yard from the shelter in Gwydir Street but I never used it because my father, being a builder, built his own shelter in our garden and the neighbours used to shelter in it when there was an air raid, about 10 of us. As a child at school, we had a shelter in the grounds of the Roman Catholic Church on Hills Road, which was used quite often, and I remember there was always a tin of sweets given round when we had to go in the shelter.”

Pat Jones was still a young boy in 1939, and attended Brunswick School. He recalls the bad smell of the air-raid shelters in the school grounds which were used for lots of practice drills, though there were few real attacks. At home his family sheltered under the stairs during air-raid warnings, and they built a special miniature shelter for their cat in a suitcase, complete with a blast tunnel, cushion, and electric light!

Stephen Falkner talks of the “musty smell and the smell of paraffin lamps” in his family's suburban Anderson shelter. His neighbourhood showed the signs of war: a cuboid brick-built shelter stood near his home, and a static water tank to supply water for dealing with incendiary bombs stood at a junction in the area. Aged four, he was taken by his father to see a German plane that had made a pancake landing on allotments in Chesterton.

Maurice Rolph was three years old when the war started. He lived with his parents and elder sister on Histon Road and went to St Luke's Infants and Juniors then Chesterton Secondary Modern. He remembers an air raid shelter in his back garden as well as one at St Luke's.

Jack Parsley describes a substantial air raid shelter built c.1940 at the bottom of a garden in Greville Road by his parents and relatives. The shelter was almost completely sunk into the ground and fitted with seats and children's bunks. It still survives, having since served as a garden store and wine cellar. Jack also provides interesting background colour to life in those times; from the strong character of his mother as she organises the family, to the men working as air raid wardens and to the disturbance of routines by sirens and bombs. He contrasts the relative safety of Cambridge with London, visible to the south as "a red glow on the clouds" from the fires. This led the children at least to adopt a blasé attitude to bombing risks, once rudely shaken when a bomber attacked Mill Road forcing them to run to the School's air raid shelter.

Brian Waygood served in the Royal Observer Corps at Linton, rising from being an ordinary observer to become a Leading Observer and Troop Observer. Posts like his were staffed by 10 people, including the occasional woman. The post was underground with a firmly secured lid. A shaft gave access to the monitor room which was kitted out with Tilley lamps, Primus stoves, ration packs and five-gallon cans of water. Observers could take their own supplies, and Brian and his men insulated their post with polystyrene tiles. Sometimes they had to do test recordings for monitoring nuclear fallout. Once, one of Brian's demonstration readings was mistaken for the real thing, giving the impression that there had been fallout at Linton (but nowhere else). Fortunately the error was laughed off afterwards. He proved himself expert at identifying enemy aircraft, aided by films of aircraft that were screened for them at the Doric Cinema in Newmarket.

David Swainston also joined the Observers but a lack of openings in aircraft recognition led him to working with the Centre Team plotting aircraft movements. Later, changing national priorities led to a voluntary post at Oakington Airfield. Here he practised with his team, first identifying the position and strength of nuclear explosions from an underground observation post and then feeding the radiation measurements back to the Centre

These and other memories feature in an exhibition at Milton Road library until Saturday, March 1 before going on tour at the city's four other branch libraries until the end of May. There is also a free DVD which is available from Cambridge branch libraries or you can log on to www.bunkerproject.info to see the edited interviews and research gathered in the course of the project.

Cambridge folk have been recording recollections of life underground for a remarkable new DCD and website. Now youngsters – who seem to be able to use the new technology that has others of us grappling with the instruction book – can appreciate just what it was like to be a child during the years of the Second World War.

The Bunker Project, a unique Heritage Lottery-funded venture which began in summer 2007, was the brainchild of Zoë Svendsen. After she found a well-preserved wartime shelter in her Cambridge back garden she began wondering what it had been like to have to use them. Memories 3rd March 2008, by Mike Petty Sometimes strange co-incidences happen.

Within the last week I have received an email from Janet Mancuso who writes: "My sister and I are putting together a family history and have come unstuck with where my mother went to nursery school. She went at the age of 3 (1927) to Auckland Road Nursery School and no matter how hard I try I have been unable to find anything under this name. As she was so young she doesn't know if it was anything to do with the Brunswick School where she went on to at the age of five but her and her two school friends who also attended the school are convinced it was called Auckland Road. Did this go on to be the Brunswick school which is now CRC beside Elizabeth Way bridge”

Indeed it did – as News readers have been describing.

Last week more ex pupils have sent in memories including Ron Ryder who even has a photo that may show Janet's mother!

Both Ron and Sid Hunt from Bar Hill started at Auckland Road and moved to the new Brunswick when it opened. Ron recalls “Our headmaster was Mr Points, Mr Thompson was science teacher, Mr Leach had an old motor bicycle and a steam boat on the River Cam, Mr Hughes was senior teacher and Mr Roy Burrell the PT instructor. Mr Thomson, in the science class, produced a revolving switch to control traffic lights – not bad for 1932.”

There were had two lady teachers, one was a Miss Ashby (who, Mike Bowyer remembers, was very keen to ensure that whenever her pupils wrote that the pen pointed over the right-hand shoulder). Another was a Miss Knights, recalls Sid, who can add Mr Garner's name to the staff list

Ron remembers it as a happy school that was kept clean and tidy by caretaker Mr Clarke and Mr Mallions. Mike Bowyer tells me how Mr Clarke was called up during the war and sent down to London in the National Fire Service. Sadly he had a fear of ladders, which for a fireman was a great drawback!

Brunswick wasn't fully equipped at the time Ron was there so he went to St George's school on Broad Street, East Road for metal work lessons. He still has some of the pieces he made, including a steel hinge and key-hole plate. It obviously stood him in good stead for Ron went on to work for the Cambridge Instrument Company.

Another emailer has asked for information on a building just across the road from the old Brunswick School.

Abbey House stands off Newmarket Road and a few yards from the roar of the traffic along Elizabeth Way. It was built in the 1670s on the site of an Augustinian Priory and was once claimed to be the most haunted house in all England with a ghostly squire, a white nun, a spectral hare, a disembodied head, a clanking chain and a poltergeist.

There was talk of a figure in nun's robes who passed through one room and vanished into the panelled wall. This may have been the ghost of the White Nun who was supposed to come by an underground tunnel from St Radegund's nunnery, which is now Jesus College, to visit her lover, who was a Monk in the old Priory of Barnwell. When her sin was discovered she was walled up alive.

Children of the family living there in 1904 became quite used to seeing her and were not much frightened but in the 1960s a resident recalled: When my daughter came here seven or eight years ago, the place was undoubtedly haunted. Night after night the dog rushed to the panelling in that corner over there, hair on end, and barked furiously.

In the end two clergymen exorcised the place with prayers and holy water. After they had done their best the children of the tenant who lived at the other end of the house lamented that they were no longer tucked up in bed by the kind lady!

But it is just talk – or can you add anything to the tale, did you live or work there or have you researched its story. If so then let me know.

Jim Langford from the Arbury has been prompted to write after he saw a picture of Cambridge's Coronation Street in a recent copy of the News. The photograph showed a view looking towards St Paul's church where he was christened. Jim was born in the street in September 1921 and spent many happy years of his early life there.

"I would often be sent to the snug at the Ship pub to fetch my grandmother a jug of ale", he recalls. Across the road stood St Paul's Institute, which he used to attend and where he threw fireworks in the reading room. The street was lit with gas lamps: "I would wait eagerly for the gas man to come and light them. When he arrived on his bicycle he would use a long steel pole which he poked through a flap under the lamp at its base and light the mantle above. If I was lucky or near enough I was allowed to operate the trigger and do the job for him", he remembers.

"On the same side of the street there were various shops: Daisly and Stubbs, general stores, Maskels the barber, Gillingham who sold hardware, firelighters and coal, Barbers joinery and undertakers. At the top of the street on Hill Road stood Harold S. Driver, the stationers. I could write much more but I am sure it would bore the pants off you", he adds. Not so – more memories please. Only residents know what an area was like.

In February 1983, 25 years ago, Coronation Street was in the News when reporter Jane Spence compared it with its famous soap namesake, which was then embroiled in the story of an affair between Ken and Deirdre – perhaps you remember it?

Residents of our Coronation Street had their own Jug and Bottle at the Panton Arms where a tight knot of locals were wont to congregate in deep discussion, she found. Though quite what it was they were talking about they were unwilling to share with a News reporter.

She did find two of the older residents willing to chat. From their house at no.61 Frederick Christian and his wife Alice had seen many changes. They recalled when it used to be a real community with two breweries, three pubs, a general store, hardware shop, tailor's and a greengrocer's. Small houses with pretty cottage gardens lined the street and the inhabitants knew each other's business in the nicest possible way.

"It was all families in those days – some with two, three, four or five children. We knew everybody. You really did know people, although we were not in and out of each others' houses much. You knew about people even if you did not know their names", Mr Christian told her.

Change came when the council pulled down a line of old homes and rehoused many streeters in new blocks of flats. More work bulldozed the Victorian streetscape into the twentieth century and by 1983 it was one of the most modern-looking in Cambridge, clean and possibly rather sterile.

But although Jane found no scandal, she should have reflected on the very name of the street.

It was part of the New Town that grew up on the west side of Hills Road following the enclosure of the Barnwell open fields in 1807. Near to Coronation Street are George IV Street, Queen Street and Prince's Street. The names have strong Royalist connection but need to be put in the context of the time

Before his accession George IV had been Prince Regent during the madness of his father, George III (hence Regent Street). He'd married Caroline of Brunswick in 1785 but their relationship was not an easy one: he accused her of adultery and left her for a Mrs Fitzherbert who he'd secretly married ten years earlier. When he succeeded to the throne in 1820 he tried to prevent Caroline from attending his Coronation at Westminster Abbey and the newspapers of the day commented fully.

Many Cambridge people believed 'Queen' Caroline had been badly treated and there were town and gown riots on Market Hill with 250 special constables sworn in to try and keep the peace. Although the University voted a loyal address they also voiced their detestation of infidelity.

It was all much juicier tale than any soap writer dare invent!

At noon next Friday, 21st March, Cambridge & County Folk Museum will be reintroducing a traditional Cambridge custom: that of skipping on Parkers Piece on Good Friday. The day will open with a demonstration of traditional skipping by Girl Guides and the afternoon will be interspersed with singing, dancing and sports skipping.

It was an annual Easter event regularly reported in the News: in April 1905 the paper commented "One of the features in Cambridge is the way in which a crowd indulges in skipping upon Parker's Piece and the congregation of young people there is reminiscent of the survival of a pagan spring festival"

On Good Friday 1922 Parker's Piece had its traditional skipping devotees, and the first ice cream vendor of the year was in attendance together with sweet sellers and a barrow with balloons, ticklers and paper toys without which no public holiday would be complete. Even the damp weather of Easter 1925 could not spoil the fun: in accordance with custom many people produced skipping ropes and skipped away to their hearts' content. Old men & maidens, young men & children – likewise grand dames – jumped up and down to "Salt, mustard, vinegar, pepper" and similar meaningless jungles.

When people were tired of skipping they sat down on the grass and ate their picnics, supplemented with lemonade and ginger beer bought from the many stalls that lined the Piece. The hawkers of balloons, ices, fruit and sweets did good business, the News reported.

In 2004 Peggy Pink from Cambridge told Memories she remembered how in 1937 whole families went together on Good Friday for the traditional skipping and the Piece was packed with stalls set up along Parkside selling trinkets, candyfloss and balls on elastic.

As a regular event it seems to have stopped during the Second World War. In 1948 there were only about three groups of people and the stalls had dwindled to just one selling tinsel-covered balls on elastic. He came back next year and had the Piece virtually to himself: of skippers there were none. The tradition had been lost, although it was briefly revived by News columnist, Christopher South a few years ago.

But why did it happen? In 1927 an old man of 83 said he remembered skipping there as a boy of five or six and his father apparently did so before him. His version was that Good Friday used to be the publican's "day out" and they used to repair to the Piece for a game of bat and trap, while their youngsters amused themselves with a skipping rope. More recently one elderly lady confided to me that in her youth she enjoyed the event. It attracted boys who came to watch and she always ensured she wore her prettiest frilly underwear as she skipped up and down

However it may have happened elsewhere in Cambridgeshire too. In 1954 Dr. Margaret Murray, President of the Folk Lore Society, referred to the custom of skipping on Good Friday as surviving at the Bartlow Hills "until well into this century". When quizzed residents in Linton and Hildersham could not remember skipping but did recall how "old Morley and his daughters had a winkle stall at Bartlow Hills on Good Friday" and that there was dancing afterwards. Alice Kerr of Bartlow told how "we used to have a rare old time skipping on Good Friday " but it turned out she was referring to her childhood in Bow, London. However her invalid aunt of eighty-four could remember "skipping at Bartlow in my mother's time ".

Bartlow Hills are a series of high man-made mounds whose origins are shrouded in mystery. If you've not visited them yet then it would make a marvellous family excursion. Take the Haverhill Road past Linton, then turn right to Bartlow. Discover the round-towered church, then follow the footpath signs and be prepared to be amazed.

Memories 31st March 2008, by Mike Petty

Cambridge has a major new retail experience with the opening of a new, grand, Arcade. But that's a story that has made headlines before.

Shopping in Cambridge has been constantly evolving. At the end of the 19th century the town centre was dominated by shops such as W. Eaden Lilley, Joshua Taylor and Robert Sayle. Competition came when Hallack and Bond built a large grocery store on the corner of Market

Hill and Petty Cury in 1889 to give themselves what was regarded as the finest block in Cambridge.

But for three months of the year trade dwindled to just a trickle when the undergraduates went down.

Something had to be done and after the Great War came a period of massive expansion in retailing. Old buildings on the east side of Sidney Street were ripped down to make way for Sainsbury's in 1925 followed by Woolworths and then Marks and Spencer in 1934. Across the road came a new Boots emporium to provide an attractive shopping centre for patrons of all classes.

The arrival of such large stores attracted shoppers into the centre of town, their numbers swelled by an advertising campaign and the creation of a new large bus station in Drummer Street so they could actually get there.

But by the 1950s planners were concerned about the viability of the Cambridge shopping scene and proposing a new development. It came in 1960 with the opening of Bradwell's Court, claimed to be the city's first shopping arcade. However something bigger was being planned. The question was should it be in the Fitzroy Street or Petty Cury areas?

For years the debate rumbled on until the decision was finally made in favour of the town centre where ancient buildings and lanes were razed for the Lion Yard precinct which opened in 1974. It brought more nationally-known names into Cambridge as well as providing space for local fashion shops such as the Alley Boutique, Cambridge's answer to Carnaby Street.

But many small traders were soon in difficulties as the three Rs – rents, rates and recession – took their toll. Several of the older-established firms such as Bacons the tobacconists, Pigotts tools, Barretts china and others closed or moved away to be replaced by Building Societies.

However the planners had not finished. Now one centre was complete they turned their eyes back to the East Road area where many of the properties were in poor condition. For years the arguments raged as two large locally-based shops Laurie and McConnell and the Co-op expanded and modernised. But with no firm plans the area deteriorated, parking restrictions were introduced and finally Laurie could wait no longer. In 1977 they announced their closure blaming indecision over the Kite redevelopment. Almost immediately plans for the Grafton centre were confirmed. In recent years this has been expanded but the Co-op has closed. Its site was chosen by Robert Sayle as a temporary home whilst their old site was redeveloped.

For concern had been voiced again about the viability of the city centre shopping where Eaden Lilley, Joshua Taylor and Woolworth's had moved away. Now in a new leap of faith comes a new development which includes the area of the old Robert Sayle store, now known as John Lewis.

It is called the Grand Arcade. But that is an old name, and one linked to Robert Sayle.

For after Cambridge had gained a new Corn Exchange in 1875 then it had to do something with the old one, which faced Downing Street. Robert Sayle had the answer: in 1879 he converted it into the Arcade covered market with butchers, florists and confectioners. But it did not prove a success and also developed structural problems with the roof which provided the lighting for the central corridor. It leaked badly, admitting rain in great quantities.

Later Ernie Hayward, a concert promoter, transformed it into a music hall called the Arcadia. It opened in January 1894 offering 'Grand Variety Entertainments' and flourished until the long frost between Christmas 1894 and March 1895. As temperatures plummeted an outdoor skating rink was created at Newnham lit by electric light. This novelty attraction emptied the theatre and not even a proposed visit by the great Marie Lloyd could revive its fortunes. It later became a garage until finally being demolished to make a private car parking space for workers in nearby businesses.

Now it is buried under the site of the Crowne Plaza Hotel whose website features its proximity to both King's College Chapel and the new Grand Arcade.

Time will tell which of these proves the more durable of Cambridge's attractions.

Memories, 7th April 2008, by Mike Petty

This is the time of year when the chairman of Parish Councils start to get concerned. Soon it will be the Annual Parish Meeting when they will have to report to the local people about what they have been doing and why they have decided to increase the parish precept.

When I did the job for more than 20 years I had three worries. One was that nobody would turn up and another was that somebody would actually come and ask something. But the most frightening was that there would be a reporter!

So what must the chairman of Milton Parish Council have been thinking 75 years ago?

In March 1933 Milton school was packed for the largest meeting ever held in the village. And the main issue revolved around the old parish pond – what one councillor called a 'stink hole in the middle of the road'. It stood on the main Cambridge-Ely Road near the war memorial. They had been complaining of it since at least 1928 when the Clerk described it as a cess-pool and a menace to the health of the village. Being on a bend in the road was a danger to traffic on dark or foggy nights, he claimed.

Beyond the old pond stood 'The Willows', the large residence of Dr Roland M. Woodman, a botanist at the Cambridge School of Agriculture. The site had originally comprised not only the house but a cottage with a drive between. When it was sold the drive was included with the cottage and The Willows was provided with a gateway opening on the far side of the house. There was no way in at the front as it looked across the pond.

The pond finally disappeared after the County Council widened the road. The parish council claimed the site was public ground and could become very valuable in the course of time, with Cambridge continually expanding. So they arranged for three seats to be placed on it. This was duly done, as agreed.

The only thing is that the doctor had got in first and opened a new gateway at the front of his house giving him access over the newly dry ground. When one of the seats was erected – where planned – it was immediately in front of this new entrance and nothing larger than a pedal cycle could get past

For a while things continued with the doctor's visitors walking around the seat. But then the council wrote asking him to stop using the way across the ground. A load of wood arrived on a Saturday morning and was placed in a neighbour's garden – who promptly moved it out into the road way. On the Tuesday a contractor arrived and proceeded to erect a six-foot close-boarded fence at the back of the site and in front of the doctor's new gate. Now the only way in was by climbing the fence and dropping down on to a flower bed. A window cleaner had problems – he managed to get one of his ladders over the fence, but the other became stuck and it was some time before he could go either backwards or forwards. A large crowd of villagers gathered and encouraged him with their cheers.

Then Dr Woodman took matters into his own hands. Watched by a number of villagers, he pulled down the whole of the fencing and sawed it in half. Then, in persistent rain, the seat across his gateway was dug out from its foundation of solid concrete and placed on one side without harm.

The Council put it back. They reiterated that it was public land and should not be given away. It did look odd that they'd put a seat up in front of the gateway or that tradesmen should have to climb over the fence, but it was better than the council climbing down. The situation had not altered: when the doctor bought the house in 1930 the agents had made another gateway on the other side. It was still there. Previously he was held in by the water, now he was bounded by boards.

But whatever the rights and wrongs, people thought the council had not acted reasonably. This was a peaceful resident who was being victimised, they claimed. So a petition was organised calling for a meeting.

It was very 'lively' affair with cat-calls, boos and other vocal demonstrations, though all agreed that the chairman kept it well in hand. It broke up quite amicably with a resolution demanding the resignation of the whole of the Parish Council. As to what happened next – well we must all keep an eye on my future 'Looking Back' columns!

Dr Woodman subsequently became chairman of Milton Parish Council between 1936 and 1947 and now has a street, Woodman Way, named after him. The Willows, the house at the centre of the dispute, is commemorated by Willow Crescent

But can you fill in any of the details – or do you recall other Council meetings that have been as exciting!

Occupation Road, which links East Road and Newmarket Road, was never one of the city's most picturesque streets. Indeed back in 1966 the News published a picture of an abandoned car there in a series entitled 'Crumbling Cambridge'.

It came into prominence at a meeting at Haslingfield recently when one of the audience asked why it was so named. As in many such cases I did not know but said I would try and find out. Back home I turned to a book on Cambridge street names by Ronald Gray and Derek Stubbings. Their research indicates that an 'occupation road' was a private road for the use of the occupiers of adjacent land and that the name had survived.

More details of the early history of the area have come to light through the research of Prof Mary Hesse recently published in the Cambridge Antiquarian Society's Proceedings for 2007. In a detailed article she traces the ancient fields to the east of 'Old Mill Way' – the early name for our present East Road. Occupation Road formed part of the West Balk that bisected Bradmore Field quite near Maggots Close.

But what jobs did people do who lived there in the past? Cambridge Street Directory for 1904 lists a mixture of occupations: William Langley was a bricklayer, Henry Fordham a carpenter and George Clements earned his living as a groom and gardener. Nearby was charwoman Harriet Chandler, Harriet Baker a needlewoman and Alderman Edward Young, JP, a grocer.

There was also an Infant's School which was condemned by an Inspector in 1929 – it was not fit to teach children in and an absolutely cruelty to children to make them go there. In fact Occupation Road was really unsanitary, he recorded.

One of my regular correspondents, Miss Daphne Foreman, knew that building in the late 1940s. "I was asked to play the piano on Sunday afternoons at a Sunday School run by two ladies from St Paul's church, Miss Maltby and Miss Atkinson", Daphne told me in 2002. "Their idea being to get off the streets on Sunday afternoons the many children who lived in Occupation Road, Gas Lane and the other small roads in that area. We sang simple hymns and choruses with prayers and bible readings by the ladies".

By 1974 the old school building was home to Cambridge Bookbinding Company and was in very poor condition, with buckets catching the drips from the roof.

One of the darkest period in the street's history was in January 1837, when the bodies of a mother aged 86 and her daughter, 57, were found dead in their beds. An inquest learned that the daughter, Ann, used to go out in the fields and work for the farmers. On the Sunday night she went into John Daffen's shop for a pint of ale, a pennyworth of turf, a rush light and a halfpenny worth of sedge. She was a good customer who used to come in regularly for her laudanum, always about a pennyworth. It was needed, she said, for her poor old mother who was bed-ridden with a pain in her back and could not rest without the opium. She never gave her much, because she knew it was poison.

Next morning John noticed the shutters of her house were still closed at 11 o'clock. At four in the afternoon the house was still shut up so he got a ladder and broke in through an upper window. On going downstairs he found Ann lying in her bed. She was dead and stiff. Her mother, Elizabeth, was partly on and partly off the bed - and she was dead too. The word went round that they'd starved to death but the relieving officer of the Chesterton Union showed they got enough to keep them in what little food they needed.

While the surgeon was doing his investigating the rumours started up that the two ladies were being cut up for anatomical purposes and a crowd of people gathered to protest. The inquest jury decided they'd been found dead with no marks of violence - but the discovery of a small bottle of laudanum in the room was thought to be a cause of their demise.

But what are your memories of this patch of the city?

Tony Day, the fenland artist, writes following last week's article:

Your piece on Occupation Road stirred a grim memory of my arrival in the corner of the city in 1938.

Two-and-a-half years earlier, on my leaving school, my grandfather had released his farm to my father who had slaved for him all his life. But he was soon a sick and dying man who wanted me away from farm life. I was at the mercy of my mother's choice of cheap residence based on sheer poverty.

We moved from a ten-roomed farmhouse within our own blissful green pastures on the corner of the Upware Road, near Wicken and travelled to Cambridge with our chattels in one of the Wright brothers' cattle floats. Our destination shrank to Occupation Road, then, worse, the old part of New Street. I felt suffocation as never before or since. It was typical of my mother to choose the cheapest hovel she could find. Happily that dirty grey terrace vanished long ago. We were not there long but the next move was not much better, the war trapping us there." Tony has now returned to his native village.

One man who was active in the East Road area was Alex Wood who is commemorated by the Labour Party Hall, a road on the Arbury Estate and by a residential home of the Cambridge Housing Society. His story has been researched by Ronald Speirs and published in the Cambridgeshire Association for Local History's Review for 2007.

On his arrival at Cambridge in the early 1900s Wood attended St Columba's Presbyterian Church in Downing Street where he met two wealthy ladies, Mrs Agnes Lewis and Mrs Margaret Gibson. They were concerned about the conditions in poor areas such as Occupation Road and bought the old York Street Mission – now commemorated by a new GP practice known as Lewis-Gibson House.

Alex Wood volunteered to be a Sunday School teacher there. He became its superintendent in 1914 and remained for thirty years, conducting services most Sunday evenings. He joined the Cambridge Labour Party in 1918 and, stimulated his first-hand knowledge of the conditions in the St Matthew's area, stood for election to the Borough Council. He won the ward on his second attempt and served as councillor until 1950. In 1923 the council passed a resolution that "the slums of Cambridge are a disgrace and steps should be taken to demolish them".

One of Alex Wood's initiatives was to set up a Boys' Club (which admitted girls), organising speakers and first-aid courses with something on most evenings. The importance of such facilities is described by 'Pimbo', writer Fred Unwin in his book, 'A Cambridge Childhood Revisited', who attended a boys' club run by students in Occupation Road.

There was a similar club across East Road in Wellington Street. It was run entirely by voluntary effort and attracted a membership of 100 boys from 14 to 18 years of age with a programme is designed to create a balance in their physical, spiritual and mental development. In 1955 Councillor Burkitt described how the first time he visited the noise was terrific, there was not a single pane of glass left unbroken and the club was very disorderly. But it established a tradition of decent behaviour and loyalty; the boys taking pride in making it a credit to the community.

When News reporter Colin Moule visited in February 1958 it was flourishing under the leadership of Chris Silcock. Despite the volume of noise the youngsters were not idle. In well-equipped workshops they were taught woodwork and metalwork while the more artistic received instruction in modelling and painting. There was table tennis, P.T. and boxing along with photography, chess, talks and trips abroad. Parents attended on open nights when the fun was shared by all.

Membership decreased and it closed in 1960 when John Ewen, a theology student at Ridley Hall, established a Freebooters Coffee Bar & club which attracted 400 members with rock around the clock, 25-hour, jiving competitions, table tennis, a juke box and television room. They also organised film shows and debated taboo subjects – such as birth control, keeping teenagers off the streets and out of trouble until it closed in December 1962

The recent discovery of a wartime bomb off Felixstowe and the subsequent difficulty experienced with its destruction, has brought the work of the bomb disposal squads once more into prominence.

But it was not until I read a review of a book in the Cambridge Daily News in June 1958 that I realised that I knew little of what happened locally. So I visited the University Library and tracked down a copy of “A cold-hearted business”, the reminiscences of Squadron Leader Alec E. Haarer.

In it he describes his training and the complexities of the various types of bombs and fuses. Alec was based in Lincolnshire for the early part of his career but in 1943 was promoted to command the East Anglian Bomb Disposal Squadron and told to report to RAF Station, Waterbeach. There he found the Station Commander knew nothing of him and certainly didn't want his men cluttering up the airfield. So he had to find somewhere else to go.

He learned of a building at Milton that was due to be de-requisitioned and went to investigate. He found an old Georgian property standing in its own grounds with an overgrown garden. The outhouses were mouldering into decay and when they opened the front doors they discovered that the topmost plaster ceiling had fallen three stories down the great well of the winding staircase into the hall. It seemed an ideal base. Decorators were sent in to distemper it throughout and paint the woodwork Air Force blue.

Soon all the officers had bedrooms and offices and the large rooms on the ground floor were devoted to storing their special equipment. A large number of red-winged motor vehicles were parked in the yard and once the telephones were installed and the walls covered by maps, they were ready for action.

They also needed dart-boards, footballs and other sporting gear together with reading matter to while away the long hours of boredom between jobs. But they had no money to buy them. Then, hidden away amongst the overgrown undergrowth they found masses of oyster shells. More were buried under the floors and in a lean-to chicken run. This proved a valuable source of income for they could be sold to be ground up for poultry keepers to feed as grit to their birds. It was hard work, but remunerative.

More importantly they needed somewhere where they could detonate any bombs they discovered. Just across the River Cam there was a field where huge piles of earth screened a place where somebody had already been demolishing pyrotechnics. It seemed ideal so they obtained permission from the farmer to use it, provided they took care of his black-and-white cows.

The time came when they had a big 25-kg bomb to detonate and shooed the cows into the next field before exploding it with a bang that sent all the Milton hens clucking. The cows took no notice. But a couple of days later a farmer lodged a complaint: following the explosion he had found his cattle dead in the field. It took some time before he remembered that there had also been a massive thunderstorm and it had been that that caused the animals to panic.

Alec Haarer never kept a diary but recalls that it was in about July 1943 they were called to an incident in north Cambridgeshire where four unexploded bombs had been reported. It seemed they had penetrated the clay and been buried as the soil had then covered them over making it was hard to see where they had hit. By searching a lush half-grown wheat field the disposal team eventually discovered the entrance holes of three of the bombs. A circle of wheat at least twelve feet around the holes was stunted and yellow – it appeared the bombs had in fact gone off deep underground. The procedure then was to dig down into the underground chamber created and detonate a small charge so as to cause the dirt above to fall in. It would cause a depression but was safer than leaving a hidden hole.

This was duly done, the fuse lit and the disposers ambled away. The small bang they caused was followed by a tremendous explosion. The whole earth seemed to be flung into the sky leaving a huge crater. The experts had got it wrong: a large bomb must have lain unexploded after all and the charge in the drilling hole inserted very close to it. It was an easy mistake to make, but one that could have proved fatal.

But where was this. Have you any clues?

Records show 17 high-explosives were dropped at Twentypence, Wilburton in September 1943 and three high-explosives together with 92 other types near Shippea Hill in the October. But these were German bombs and there were more lost from allied aircraft together with practice bombs dropped by the Americans that could still cause devastation.

It was one of these that was discovered in the Old West River at Aldreth in April 1965- an incident recorded by a News photographer who got far nearer to it than I would. Perhaps you remember it?

Cambridge United Football Club are going through a most interesting period as they strive to gain promotion back to the Football League PLEASE CHECK THIS IS RIGHT!. Whether they are successful only time will tell, but perhaps they may consider the lesson of the past.

Just 50 years ago their Vice-Chairman, J.F. Ablett addressed the club's annual dinner at the Dorothy Café. He expressed the opinion that Cambridge football had reached the most interesting position in its history, it was the dawn of professional football. Next season both the city's two senior clubs would be campaigning in the same league – the Southern League.

He went on to review their achievements so far. In the 1920s, the club, as Abbey United, had played in the third division of the Cambridgeshire League. They gained promotion in two successive years and became first division champions in the 1925-26 season.

In September 1932 Abbey United had started their football campaign in fine style. Not only did they play their first match on their new ground but they won it. That ground was situated close to their former pitch at Newmarket Road and had been levelled and fenced-in. All this had been made possible through the generosity of the club president, Mr H.C. Francis and it was officially declared open by Mr R.J. Wadsworth.

Then just after the second world war the Supporters' Club embarked on an ambitious scheme – the building of a £3,000 pavilion and clubroom with office accommodation. At first the loyal band of supporters was beset by building material difficulties and then hampered by the weather. There were scenes of great enthusiasm when the building was handed over to the football club management in 1952. "Our set-up is now really wonderful and there is no reason why the club should not go on from success to success", Harry Habbin, chairman of the Supporters Club told the News.

The new stand brought success and the future was being anticipated by the News cartoonist of the time. I thought it interesting to reproduce his contribution to the paper of 19th April 1958 in which he looks forward to a brave new world for United football when large crowds would pack the terraces.

The subsequent story of the club's ups and downs has been told and will be retold by others more competent to comment than I.

Doubtless the issue of the new name of the stadium will occupy the letter-pages for weeks to come. The stadium's current name is a reminder of the old Barnwell Abbey that was founded in 1092 by Picot, the Norman sheriff of Cambridge after his wife recovered from illness. However Picot squabbled with the king and his lands were forfeited to Pain Peverel who rebuilt the abbey on land between Newmarket Road and the river where it flourished until it was swept away by Henry VIII. The stones were taken for other developments until now it is remembered by Abbey Road, Abbey House, the Cellarer's Chequer in Beche Road and the stadium. Nearby stands another reminder in the form of the Leper Chapel, an early isolation hospital for those suffering from disease.

But there was another early hospital. The Hospital of St John the Evangelist stood in the centre of Cambridge – its site is now St John's College. It was founded at the end of the 1100s when Henry Eldcorn built the 'poorest of shacks' on a plot of waste ground near the main river crossing as a refuge for the poor. It expanded to become an institution of considerable importance and, backed by the support of generations of Cambridge families, it acquired lands.

Like Barnwell Abbey it disappeared and its story has been largely forgotten.

But now Malcolm Underwood, archivist of St John's College, has transcribed masses of ancient documents which have just been published by the Cambridgeshire Records Society. Through their pages one can gain a snapshot of life 700 years ago – even of the sheets on the hospital bed. It contains a detailed index of names of local folk: William the barber, William the carpenter, William the goldsmith ...

One name caught my eye: William Kinchant – who was sometimes known as Quinchant – and 'Quinn' (Jimmy of that ilk is the current manager) may well be a name chanted by United supporters if their promotion hopes turn to reality, or even lead to an appearance at a somewhat newer stadium, Wembley.

Cartulary of the Hospital of St John the Evangelist, Cambridge by Malcolm Underwood (ISBN 0904323 20 X) is available from Cambridgeshire Records Society, email philip.saunders@cambridgeshire.gov.uk

Memories 12th May 2008, by Mike Petty

Rural post offices have been part of community life for generations, but like various other village institutions they now under threat. Without them rural life becomes the poorer.

In their heyday the village post office and general stores supplied most of the villagers' needs, as Beatrice Stevens recalled in her book: 'Stretham: a feast of memories'. "Swan's was a general store and housed the village Post Office. This was a small box-like office at the left of the entrance, with a fascinating aperture through which you voiced your requests and received the stamps and Postal Order that you might want. Occasionally one needed to send a telegram, but only when sad news was to be transmitted. Someone was ill and the daughter in service in London must be sent for. Or, perhaps even worse, one of the family had died or had had a farm accident, and other relatives must be informed."

But the post office side of the shop was eclipsed by the other things it sold. You could buy almost anything at Swan's including drapery, socks, vests, pants, men's and boy's trousers, women's combinations, warm knickers or drawers. Then there was calico for sheets and underwear, speckled wool for home-knitted socks and gloves, even boots and shoes. In the 1920's Swan's gave up the postal side of their business which transferred to another village shop where it still trades.

But it has not always been easy to find a new site for the post office, as the villagers at Ashley found back in October 1926. One option then considered was to attach it to the Crown Public House, although the language at a public house was not always of the best.

Their future has never been secure: in November 1929 the inhabitants of Houghton were up in arms as the postal authorities had removed their sub-post office, which had been there for more than a century, to the neighbouring village of Wyton. The Houghton office was run by the widow of an ex-servicemen who had lost her breadwinner in the service of his country. It should be returned and telephone facilities installed, they demanded.

The News pages have often recalled the appreciation communities have shown to their post office staff.

In 1979 Landbeach postmistress, Miss Doris Mitham, retired, ending a family involvement that dated back 36 years. The village lost a much-loved facility but the family regained the tiny room at the back of her High Street home that had served as the post office.

In April 1981 an era came to an end at Debden with the retirement of the village's 90-year-old postmistress, Mrs Lilian Peterson after 52 years. Over 40 villagers clustered round the tiny sub-post office to show their appreciation by presenting her with a cheque.

That year Lolworth's village post office was being praised as a cornerstone of the small rural community. It had been run since 1972 by Mrs Margaret Wenham, a jolly, red-haired lady who was born and bred in the village. For the first five years she operated it from a caravan but now it doubled as the only village shop stocking basic groceries and bits and pieces. It didn't have a full range of counter services or provide a proper living on its own. But it was relied on by pensioners and mums drawing family allowances in a village with only one bus a week.

In 1982 Lillian Cornwell retired as postmistress of Wilburton and looked back on her experiences: "So much has changed since I started just after the war. For one thing the fact that we are a post office as well as selling groceries has kept us going – the growth of supermarkets would have seen us off, I'm sure. Wilburton's a wonderful village with a wonderful crowd of people", she told the News. But one of her customers had another view of her success: "Her friendly, personal nature in running the store puts the supermarkets to shame. She is always at the counter with a smile and always a good listener to customers' problems". A bit perhaps like the folk in the current people's post office advertisements.

Back in April 1973 the British Tourist Authority pronounced that the village shop was alive and well and to prove it they picked out the post office at Gt Abington then run by retired R.A.F. squadron leader Jack Armitage. Since he and his wife took over the shop three years earlier they had modernised the inside and turnover had almost doubled. "I am sure there will always be a place for the village shop", Jack said.

But whether that will remain true once the latest round of cuts has worked its way through the system remains to be seen.

Barway is a small hamlet out in the fens between Soham and Ely. The only road winds between the houses, passes the former church and school and then crosses a bridge before it peters out in a field.

If it is isolated in 2008, then what must it have been like years ago? In fact Barway folk were in close touch with surrounding villages as they had riverbanks and footpaths they could follow and thought nothing of walking or biking.

One ran towards Wicken through Fordy Farm where, as recently as 1939, Mrs Markham, the farmer's wife would charge a penny to open the gate for cyclists to pass through. Another went across the fields to Stuntney where people would attend the Harvest Festival before returning by moonlight.

It was only three miles by the river-bank to Ely station to catch a train or they could cycle up to the Soham road and leave their bikes at the Toll house, before catching the bus to the city. At this time the Ely High Bridge was so narrow only one vehicle at a time could pass over it so you had to send somebody ahead before attempting to cross with a pony and trap.

A drove lead to the river Ouse where there was a ferry bridge wide enough to take a horse and cart across to Little Thetford. Here tradespeople crossed. One of these was a Mr Nightingale, a butcher, who used to tether his horse outside 'The Bull' public house. One day the horse got loose and was startled. It backed, the cart tipped up and all the meat slipped into the pond. Rakes and pitchforks were quickly brought into use and soon strings of sausages and joints of meat were being dragged out and lifted away from the water. These needed a good washing as cows often wandered through it on their way for milking.

In such an isolated community it was unusual to see a stranger, especially one who wore a turban. But one such gentleman came with a large suitcase on his bicycle and would display a range of goods on the doorstep. Housewives were pleased to buy underwear, pinafore or shoes – although he would only bring one pair and these had to be ordered for his next visit.

Peggy Chaffe's mother, Jessie Fleming, was a stranger when she arrived in Barway in 1892 to take over as Headmistress. But she was to become a part of the community's life for many years, teaching generations of youngsters and then, when the school was closed down in the early 1930s, she bought it at auction. She continued to educate a few of the older children who did not wish to change school and opened a little shop in what had been the scullery, selling basic grocery items and sweets.

She also built up a wonderful collection of newspaper cuttings, ephemera and snapshots that paint a unique record of local life. Highlight of the year was the village feast on May 5th which attracted people from all around. One year there were so many vans that Ben Pope's field was hired for those unable to park on the road. A big banner was made, it was blue and as big as a sheet with 'Barway Feast' written on it, which was put at the entrance to the field where the children's races and prize-giving took place.

Through these we discover how when the river threatened to burst its banks one family, the Seekings, put all their possessions on a horse and cart and moved into the school for a few weeks. They had a hearth-rug and table with an old-fashioned gramophone and made up their beds down one side of the school room.

The in 1924 four strangers dropped in from the sky. They had been flying a giant Vickers Vimy bomber from their base at Bircham-Newton to Margate when it developed engine trouble. They had no option but to make a forced landing in a stubble field where the plane ran along the ground quite happily until it reached a four-feet dyke and somersaulted. Fortunately it rebounded on to an even keel and the airmen were unhurt. They became instant celebrities in the village, where they stayed until the plane could be dismantled and taken away. The airmen were based in the school – a thank you letter from Ronald Martin of 'A' Flight, No.7 Bombing Squadron, Bircham Newton Aerodrome is amongst the papers. "Everybody had a lovely time (altho' the beds were rather hard) and we were very sorry to leave. You made it so homely for us that nearly everybody had had an attack of homesickness since we arrived back. We shall always be indebted everybody at Barway for being so hospitable to so many stranded airmen, but I for one shall remember the ditch!" he wrote.

But there are very sad mementoes too: one of Jessie's sons was taken Prisoner during the Great War. He wrote letters home, begging for items such as salt, corned beef, Golden Syrup and socks. Several parcels were sent, just one arrived. He got it shortly before he died.

At her home at St Ives Peggy continued to sort through her mother's fascinating scraps. Do you have similar collections of material? Contact Mike Petty at the News

Tim Coles from Elsworth was surprised to read a snippet from 18th May 1933 in my 'Looking Back' column. It read:

Hangman's Corner, Barton Road presented a scene of excitement when the British Hospital's Air Pageant visited Cambridge and all afternoon there was the incessant 'zoom' of aeroplanes 'taking off' and landing. All-in advanced aerobatics provided a thrill; the 'crazy' flying drew many a gasp whilst equally entertaining was the dancing to music by the tiniest machines in the show. Wing-walking and parachute jumping were presented, together with balloon bursting and a chase after a 'kidnapped' bride. One machine which caused amusement was Mr Heath Robinson's conception of a Chinese dragon: the 'flying motor cycle'

Tim writes:

"I am intrigued by the paragraph on "crazy flying" – I was born and brought up in the house my grandfather built in 1931 on "Hangman's Corner", now number 112 Barton Road. . Neither my grandparents or parents ever mentioned any flying from the area. Can you or any of your readers shed any light on this aspect of the history of the area? Which side of the road was used as the airfield? What became of the airfield? Do any maps exist showing an airfield on Hangman's Corner, which we knew as Hangman's Bend? Do any photographs exist – these would be particularly interesting."

As so often happens I have very little information. I have a note of an accident to a three-seater Avro airplane engaged in pleasure trips from field off Barton Rd in October 1923 and in May 1934 the Sky Devil's air circus performed from there. But can you add more.

There were other sites. In April 1930 a News reporter experienced the thrill of looping the loop in a joy-ride aeroplane that was giving flights from Cherry Hinton Road and one of his colleagues had a far smoother flight that October when a 'Westland Wessex' three-engined six-seater cabin monoplane de luxe arrived at Marshall's aerodrome. Seated in a padded brown leather seat with arm and head rests he found it glided so smoothly that he could scrawl down his experiences in his best hand. There was no vibration and the businessman could take his secretary, for letters and notes are typed with ease, he noted.

Even bad weather could not deter thrill-seeking folk: in July 1931 a heavy, gusty wind and driving rain greeted Captain C.D. Barnard and his famous monoplane, the Spider, when he visited Cambridge. But when it abated a number of people took trips knowing they would be dry in the plane. Twenty readers of the Cambridge Daily News had been given free tickets for a ten-minute flight and enjoyed the experience; one young lady laughingly remarked she felt 'a bit funny' coming down.

In 1932 Cambridge town councillors were offered a flight by Sir Alan Cobham who was visiting Marshall's aerodrome with his fleet of planes. However the Mayor was unable to be present and the deputy mayor preferred solid ground. When the party was about to take off it was discovered to number 13, so the County Chief Constable stepped into the breech and the plane both ascended and descended safely. They made a comprehensive survey of the town with its ring of new housing estates and would doubtless have looked down on Hangman's Corner.

Something of the story of Hangman's Corner was revealed during an appeal against a refusal of planning permission back in January 1956. Percy Tolliday wanted to erect one house with a garden on two plots of land there. He was supported by Kelsey Charles Kerridge of Dales Farm, Barton, a builder for over 30 years who said his father had acquired land there in 1934 and gained approval to build eight houses, two of which had been constructed. It was a dangerous spot: Tim recalls that his grandfather assisted at several accidents and in 1956 the County had plans for a western by-pass to carry up to 5,000 vehicles a day. Anyway the proposed house was outside the Cambridge development area and would constitute ribbon development they claimed. The Planning Inspector supported their arguments

Readers often recognise themselves in old News pictures. So when David Carrington of Swavesey turned to the Memories column a couple of weeks ago and saw himself it was not that unusual. Except that he was pictured in close proximity to an unexploded bomb that was dredged up near Aldreth in April 1965. Not that he remembers the occasion now. He writes:

The policeman looking at the Aldreth bomb is me, although I do not have any memories of it, perhaps because there was no 'Bang'!

But of course it prompts other memories which take me into the land of reminiscence. This was at the time when most villages had their own policeman - I was at Sutton - Ray Thoday at Mepal - Bill Goodrum at Haddenham and Gordon Baxter at Witchford. We all chugged round on our water cooled Velocette motorcycles. 'Chug' was the word - good head wind and top speed might be 30 mph.

This was around the time of the amalgamation of the five forces into Mid-Anglia Constabulary. The policemen, we can say that because the ladies were still Wpcs, at snooty Cambridge dreaded the thought of being posted to the dark depths of the Isle. But the old Isle of Ely force knocked the others into a cocked hat. We had a diving unit, a motorised boat for river work, mostly for finding bodies, and a mobile lighting unit to take to accidents. We also had home-made intruder alarms and even a miniature listening device to hear what prisoners were saying to each other in the cells!

A hundred years ago, in April 1908, the Queen got lost near Newmarket. What was worse the Dowager Empress of Russia was with her.

The two Royal personages had safely passed through Cambridge station, where elaborate security arrangements had been made with Inspector Baker and several constables in attendance in addition to the Station Master and other officials. There was no hostile demonstration but a kindly act on the part of Queen Alexandra was spotted by the waiting News reporter: she waved her hand once or twice to the persons on the platform as the train proceeded without stopping to Six Mile Bottom. There their Majesties disembarked, transferred to their limousines and drove to Egerton House, on the outskirts of Newmarket, where they took tea with Richard Marsh, King Edward VII's trainer.

It was then that things went wrong. The chauffeurs consulted their maps and set out for Fordham station, not more than a quarter of an hour's drive away. The route however was somewhat complicated and they took a wrong turning, eventually landing up at Long Bottom, some miles from their destination.

By now the people on the platform at Fordham were worriedly waiting with the special train that was to have conveyed the Royals on to the next leg of their journey. The Cambridgeshire Chief Constable, Mr C. Stretten and Superintendent Winter together with railway officials Mr R.P. Ellis and George Kinum became ever more alarmed as the minutes slipped by and there was no sign of the Royal car. Officials communicated with Egerton House only to be informed that their guests had left some time before. After another quarter-of-an-hour cyclists were sent out as search parties. They returned without any news.

By now rumours had started to spread that Anarchists were responsible for the disappearance so it was time for more drastic action. The police approached Mr George Flinders, whose car was in the station yard, and he readily placed his vehicle at their disposal. Superintendent Winter climbed in and set off around surrounding lanes – but still failed to locate his prey. He returned back to Fordham, only to find that the Royal cars had arrived just moments earlier – they had got well and truly lost and then suffered from a burst tyre.

Queen and Empress at once boarded the train for Sandringham where they were well protected by a large number of special detectives from Scotland Yard.

At least with modern satellite navigation devices and mobile phones such things would not occur today. Oh no?

Last week I had a couple of talks in Norfolk and decided to make a three-day break of it. The first was at Narborough, where I met a lady who'd grown up at Barway and was fascinated to learn of the papers collected by Evelyn Pollard that Peggy Chaffe has been sorting. Afterwards we drove to a hotel along winding roads that were totally deserted and almost bereft of signposts. Next day we relocated to our favourite Country House Hotel at Lenwade from which it was a short drive to the Norwich Out and About Club for a morning talk on Ghosts and Witches. We rounded off the break with an evening meal at the King's Head country inn in North Elmham.

As we ordered a kindly local noticed that our back tyre was flat – punctured by a Norfolk flint. Since the meal was cooking it seemed best to enlist the assistance of the Royal Automobile Club to change the wheel. We telephoned at 7.30 and a patrolman arrived from his base a couple of miles away at 8.30. Quite unremarkable, except that was a delay of not one hour, but thirteen!

By midnight it was getting less than a joke. Despite numerous phone calls it appeared that the first two or three knights of the road had either got themselves lost or been sent to the wrong location

We could not keep the King's Head landlady up any longer, but we could not go back to Lenwade with a flat tyre that refused to respond to our own ministrations.

It was then that true Norfolk hospitality kicked in. Sue Dunn gave us a wonderful room overlooking countryside that by morning was wreathed in mist – and then tried to refuse any payment. Then once the five-minute tyre change had been successful it was back to Lenwade where the manager - who'd offered at midnight to come out to us - also strove not to charge for the room that had remained empty through no fault of their own.

Which leaves a dilemma – when next in Norfolk which of the hotels that showed us hospitality fit for a King should we beg the privilege of staying at?

The story of how a group of undergraduates managed to raise the body of an Austin 7 van on to the roof of the University Senate House in June 1958 without anybody noticing, and how then the combined might of the Cambridge Civil Defence Corps failed to get it down again, has been told several times. But I could not let this 50th anniversary pass completely unnoticed. Perhaps there are still some snaps or memories that you can share.

However it was not high parking that saw a Newnham College student in court in June 1933: it was low flying. Mary Enid Barnard was undergoing a course of instruction at Marshall's flying school and had to do three hours solo flying before she could obtain her certificate. During this she decided to have a closer look at her Alma Mater, so swooped down over Newnham.

But a Corpus Christi College don, Dr John Thompson, who was a flier himself, complained that she had descended rather rapidly, then flattened out and crossed Corpus' Fellows' gardens dangerously low: he assessed the height as about 600 feet. John Patrick Bury added that he could read the letters on the plane quite clearly.

Mary defended her actions: she denied going below 1,000 feet. She estimated that a plane could glide a mile if the engine gave out and as the nearest landing ground was 880 yards away she could have reached it without causing damage to people or property. The magistrates were not so sure but as it was the first prosecution of its kind they decided to dismiss the case with a caution.

Cambridge was getting used to aerial activity. My recent mention of an airshow at Hangman's Corner, Barton Road has encouraged Harry Bye of Ely to delve into his diaries for an entry from 18th May 1933. It reads:

“I was 16 years old when the British Hospital Air Pageant came to Barton. To see them meant a 60-mile round trip cycle ride from Shippea Hill, but I was determined to get there as my brother and I were fascinated by the wing walking by Harry Willis on an Avro 504. The programme starts with a formation flight by the 16 aircraft to advertise the show. There is balloon bursting, paper cutting, bottle shooting from the air and height judging. While some go for joy riding some so in for aerobatics. One pilot goes in for stunt flights. He hurls his passengers about the sky, rolling, looping, spinning and diving from about 250 to about 50 feet from the ground, then pulls out of the dive and when landing some of the passengers look a bit 'groggy'

“It is nearly dark when the flying ends and when parachutist Evans leaps from the Spartan aircraft and the parachute opens, advertising the Co-op, he lands safely. Most of the crowd make for home. We had 30 miles cycling to do and when dropping in at the Kum In Café at Ely for refreshment we were nearly home”

Harry took some pictures of the event, but they didn’t come out. So in July he cycled to Bury St Edmunds to see the display again, only to find that several of the aircraft were not there. He did snap one that had been at Barton Road.

One impediment to low flying is high poles, one of which was featured in the News in June 1908. The paper had already reported an outbreak of ‘Alpine fever’ which had seen students climbing trees along the Backs. But then they’d turned to a wireless telegraphy station on the Huntingdon Road – something that seems not to be widely mentioned. It was a pole over 200 feet in height that received messages from Cumnor Hill near Oxford. Two undergraduates merrily commenced the ascent by means of the metal spikes driven in at convenient intervals and managed to reach the top from which they enjoyed the views. However the descent was not so easily accomplished and they reached terra firma with a distinct sigh of relief.

I know nothing about this prominent Cambridge landmark – do you remember it, or have snaps.

The other morning I glanced out of the window to where a fine large house is being built in place of much finer large trees. It was not the birds flittering through the vanished branches that caught my attention but the antics of a roofer.

For there he was standing amongst the rafters apparently conducting an invisible orchestra with his hammer. Only by closer observation was it apparent that he was being buzzed, seemingly by bees that had made their home inside the opening he was now trying to cover.

It was a similar experience to that which confronted licensee Bert Martin at Whittlesford in July 1958. But he not totally surprised to see them – after all his pub must have been called the ‘Bees in the Wall’, for some reason.

Bert had become aware that something was wrong when he noticed an unpleasant smell. He called in the builders who opened up the wall of his bedroom and found an estimated 80,000 bees together with masses of honeycomb filling the space between two upright pieces of plaster.

Many of the bees were dead as the one exit from their extraordinary ‘hive’, a tiny hole in the outside wall where a drainpipe was cleated on to the brickwork, had been unknowingly sealed up by builders when decorating the house the previous year. For 18 months the bees had been completely incarcerated, living on their own honey. Once released the survivors swarmed over the adjoining car park: “it was like a dark and stormy day”, said Mr Martin, “and the noise was terrific”.

Perhaps it had been some such earlier manifestation which had caused the change of the pub name from 'The Exhibition' seven or eight years earlier. But nobody had known for certain that the bees were still there. Now there was clear evidence in the great clumps and clusters and rod-like groups of cells behind the bedroom wall. Reg decided to make it a feature by fitting a glass panel over the hole and its busy inhabitants

In May 1977 the pub was in the news for much the same reason; the bees had returned after disappearing the previous October. Once more they were to be made welcome guests by the landlord, then Mr David Smith.

But do you have similar experiences to relate.

Can anybody help Julie Thompson identify a group of old soldiers. Her husband recently rescued an old photograph by the Cambridge firm of Mason & Basebe who were trading in Cambridge Market Street during the Edwardian era. It shows a Sergeants Mess Dinner, but what was the Regiment and where was it taken.

I know that 100 years ago, in April 1908 more than 1000 people gathered on Cambridge Market Hill at midnight to witness the official extinction of the Third (Cambs) Volunteer Battalion of the Suffolk Regiment. As the clock chimed the buglers played 'The Last Post' and the Volunteers were no more. But after a few seconds 'Reveille' was sounded, melancholy vanished and cheers greeted the new Cambridgeshire Battalion of the Territorial Force. The bugle band played the officers back to the mess room where they sang 'Auld Lang Syne'. But was this part of that reorganisation. Any information would be welcome please. You can email Julie at joolsnellie@blueyonder.co.uk or drop me a line [SCAN OF SERGEANTS MESS]

Ian Crisp from Hitchin has another query. He has a couple of photographs taken at Melbourn in the late 1800s by a fairground photographer, whose caravans are shown in the background. He knows who the people are but would like more information on the itinerant photographers who travelled round with the village fairs and feasts. Ian knows that the Harris family had a steam circus that toured the region and wonders if it was anything to do with them. Can you help [SCAN OF PHOTOGRAPHER'S CARAVAN AT MELBOURN FAIR]

One of the items that arrived in my computer In Box was a postcard taken by the Cambridge photographers, Kidd and Baker.

It showed a young man in white shorts holding a bucket and spade and a toy trumpet. It was signed 'Kenneth Mellanby'. The sender, Nigel Brown, wondered if I could tell him anything about it. At first glance it seemed very unlikely. But Nigel had also sent a copy of the inscription on the back, and that did ring a bell. It read "May Week, 1927. Opening of Joanna Southcott's Box in Market Hill"

Joanna Southcott was a Devon girl who claimed to have supernatural gifts; she wrote her prophecies in rhyme and left them at her death in 1814 in a sealed wooden box with instructions that it should be opened at time of crisis but only in the presence of 24 bishops.

Eventually it was decided in July 1927 that the time had come to see what was in there. The box was x-rayed, and shown to contain a pistol and a dice box. But there were some papers as well.

Sadly they were unable to find a full contingent of Bishops, but the Bishop of Grantham did attend a meeting at Church House, Westminster, together with a selection of clergy and a large number of onlookers, mostly ladies

However they had to wait until H. Ernest Hunt, director of the National Laboratory of Psychical Research, who had kept the box in safe keeping, had delivered a lecture setting out Joanna's story. He told how she'd little education but went on to produce 4,500 pages of prophecies packed into seven boxes, of which this was one.

Once the box was opened it was found to contain a diary for 1715, some books, a lottery ticket, a child's night-cap, an earring, some coins and other material. Oh yes, and the pistol.

But was it the right box? A correspondent to The Times claimed that he too had opened one of Joanna's boxes in a garret at Morecambe and found it to contain some finely-worked baby clothes made for the coming of the second Christ that she had expected, together with a large collection of 'passes into Heaven' filled out in the names of Cabinet Ministers of her day.

But the Cambridge Daily News had apparently scooped the nationals; for in their issue of 9th June – more than a month earlier, it had reported how Cambridge undergraduates had opened Joanna's famous box on the Market Hill.

Mammoth crowds gathered, with every window packed and several lads secured prime seats on top of the fountain. Just before noon a melancholy dirge from Petty Cury heralded the arrival of Highland pipers preceding one of Dale's brewery lorries on which was arrayed the full contingent of 24 bishops and their retainers. They were followed by a delegation of 'Mormons' from Salt Lake City and a variety of other colourful characters.

On arrival one of the mitred archbishops – looking very like Father Christmas – began to explore the contents of a large chest decorated with the letters 'J.S.' in huge white letters. Out came red tape, a teddy bear, some football boots and a dismembered limb from a tailor's dummy. There were some old examination papers, some bananas and various tracts proclaiming the 'End of the World' on 31st June 1927. Fortunately June only has 30 days!

But the News made no mention of the bucket, spade and trumpet depicted on Nigel's postcard, which adds to the record of this 'rag'. It had been organised to raise money for the Cambridge Fruiting Campaign which helped the people from the East End of London who spent their summers picking Strawberries in the Wisbech area

But does the name 'Kenneth Mellanby' on the front of the card mean anything? Indeed it does, for at that time a young man of that name was attending King's College. He went on to become a famous ecologist and founder of the Monks Wood Research Station near Huntingdon.

If it is the same person then Joanna's writings were not the only ones he investigated: at the end of the Second World War he went to Germany to hunt for documents relating to medical experiments at Dachau concentration camp. But, according to internet sources, despite Mellanby's later claims to have brought German experimental records back to Britain, none of these has ever been identified. Perhaps they are in a chest somewhere?

Memories 7th July 2008, by Mike Petty

The other week Cambridge was at its best. It was one of those magical days when the sky was bright blue, the college flags were flying and the streets were crowded with proud parents and their newly-graduated offspring from around the world making their way to and from the Senate House.

I had offered to show some American ladies from South Carolina around Cambridge. I arrived at our rendezvous place outside Starbucks on the corner of Market Hill just before the agreed time of eleven o'clock. They arrived at one. By that time I was in the University Library and they were in tears.

They had seen punts from behind the steering wheel of their car. Totally lost, they had followed a bus towards the city centre only to find a metal pole rise up from the road in front of them. It was then, in the depth of their despair, that a kindly taxi driver took pity and led them out of the hell of the Cambridge traffic system.

Even people who have been born and grown up here have problems with the current traffic restrictions. Could you tell a motorist approaching past Shire Hall how to get to the Lion Yard car park? When and which way is Silver Street open to traffic? And that is without the current chaos of the guided bus works affecting Hills Road.

Cambridge has always had traffic. The opening of Victoria Bridge in 1890 provided a new link to the historic centre and took pressure off the Magdalene Street – Bridge Street link where carts squeezed down narrow streets linked with ancient houses whose upper storeys overhung the road.

In the 1920s Cambridge experienced economic decline; to survive it needed to attract new shops and new shoppers. The town centre was redeveloped with massive new Boots and Sainsbury/Woolworth stores. To get there people needed better transport links from the north.

The solution was to widen the main road into the town. This also accorded with St John's College's plans for addition facilities. It saw the end of several old yards in Bridge Street which had provided homes for generations of residents. Antiquarians bemoaned the disappearance of some of the older buildings, but they could not be allowed to stand in the way of progress.

Across the road old, worn-out 16th-century buildings on the corner with Round Church Street survived until the 1960s. Then plans were announced to replace them with a supermarket. "The sooner we get the bulldozers in, the better" said one councillor. Eventually they were declared of Historic Interest and the frontage was retained with development behind.

Magdalene Street survives as a reminder of what Bridge Street once was. But that too very nearly disappeared in 1930. Under a large new scheme designed by Sir Edwin Lutyens the west side from the bridge to Northampton Street would be cleared for reconstruction making Magdalene Street a broad and handsome thoroughfare. In the event the scheme was not fully implemented before the Second World War.

With peace came major disagreement between Town and County planners. Cambridge councillors wanted to demolish those old, out of date shops and complete the widening, but the County preferred a new road across Jesus Green. By then Magdalene College had had a change of heart. In 1952 the Master wrote to the News: Sir. Twenty-five years ago the College started a scheme which might have involved the widening of Magdalene Street and the removal of buildings opposite the college. But it is now strongly opposed to the widening of the street and the demolition of the buildings on the west side. The College would be strongly prejudiced if it should be divided by a street similar in character to the widened part of Bridge Street and would strongly object to such a change of character and loss of amenity in the neighbourhood.

As they sat in their car with tears of frustration streaming down their face those American visitors might have been interested to know they were in an area that epitomised the debate between preservation and development. But I suspect they were more bewildered about how in 2008 this state of affairs could be allowed to exist in one of the greatest academic and tourist centres in the world

I don't know, I never met them. They have gone on to serve their country in other areas of conflict like Iraq or Afghanistan where there is perhaps a better chance of finding a solution to everyday problems.

But how many other visitors left equally frustrated on that most important day in their children's lives?

Two Sylvias seek your help in identifying people.

Sylvia Keeffe, latterly of Little Thetford and now resident in Kent, has supplied me with a mystery photograph that should be of interest to about a dozen people, two of whom were not around at the time it was taken.

She discovered it in the effects of her late father, Stanley Blake and his wife Helga. Helga worked in the Grange maternity home in Ely in the 1950s, which gives a clue as to the probable location. The presence of cake and crackers on one of the beds indicates that it was around Christmas time.

But who are the people; are you amongst them – above or under the blankets?

Did you attend or work at the Grange, now the site of East Cambridgeshire District Council's offices in Nutholt Lane, Ely. News that the ten-bed general practitioner unit would have to close came in 1979 with most mothers using the RAF Hospital nearby.

And while you have your magnifying glasses out, who recognises themselves on this photographed of workers in the harvest fields in the early 1960s. The sky was blue and the crops stretch unbroken to the horizon. Now this may have been taken anywhere, but in fact was snapped by Sylvia McCann from her home in Arbury Road. The fields are now buried under housing off Campkin Road – a fate that might soon befall other rural fields in the Cambridgeshire countryside.

Silvia also had her camera handy when she heard the once-familiar clip-clop of a horse's hooves and snatched a view of a man and his trap heading towards Milton Road. But who was he?

Memories 22nd July 2008, by Mike Petty (Tue)

Cambridge motorists are currently experiencing difficulties getting into the city because of work at one of the major bridges, that over the railway on Hills Road. But 50 years ago in July 1958 there was even greater disruption when Silver Street bridge, one of the two main river crossings, was taken down completely

It was not the first time this vital link had been cut: during the Civil War it was pulled down, as were all the other bridges except the Great Bridge, for defensive purposes. When restored in 1648 it was wide enough for only one vehicle to pass at a time.

Even then traffic was held up by a Corporation official who demanded payment for crossing it during peak times. But in 1824 tradesmen refused to pay. They were taken to court in a case that involved extensive readings from ancient documents going back to Domesday Book. The hearing lasted for a day and a half by the end of which the Lord Chief Justice was “so inaudible from exhaustion” that he could scarcely be heard as he summed up. The jury had no doubts: the Council had no right to the tolls they had hitherto collected. Two more cases followed. The Corporation won the second but lost the decider.

It remained a narrow, wooden structure until the 1840s when it was replaced with a cast-iron bridge made by Charles Finch at his foundry on the Market Hill. It was virtually the twin of the Great Bridge in Magdalene Street but sadly it failed to last as well.

An inspection in 1913 revealed the need for repair as more and more motor traffic passed over it. In 1923 Silver Street was closed for repairs forcing hundreds of cyclists to use Mill Lane and across Sheep's Green to Newnham mill path. It prompted suggestions that those bridges should be widened and the cobbles removed to encourage more cyclists to use it regularly.

The situation dramatically improved in 1926 with the construction of Fen Causeway, despite great protests from conservationists who feared it would destroy the attractiveness of Coe Fen. The bridge and its approaches were gaily decorated with bunting for the official opening and presented a colourful scene. The Mayor recalled how the project of relieving Silver Street traffic had started as long ago as 1904 and discussion had gone on for nearly 20 years before the Town Council finally approved the plan. Nine proposals had been put forward and had it not been for the urgency of the unemployment question the same position would have existed today, only instead of nine there might have been nineteen different schemes, he commented to laughter.

But it was not traffic but weather that brought the rebuilding of Silver Street to the forefront. The great floods of March 1947 caused the bridge to be closed with fears that the rush of water would seriously affect its foundations. By 1950 it was found to be unsafe; vehicles exceeding two tons weight were prohibited from using it while negotiations started as to what to do next.

Both Queens' College and the Anchor public house were opposed to anything that involved extensive pile-driving, fearing damage to their own foundations. Eventually a design by Sir Edwin Lutyens was accepted and work started in July 1958. By early August rapid progress had been made, the old bridge had gone and a temporary footbridge erected for the use of pedestrians and cyclists pushing their machines.

Inevitably there were complications but in March 1959 Silver Street reopened to traffic. Then just when everything appeared to be finished the workmen were back digging up the new surface. Some said contractors had hit an underground river, others that the bridge was sinking or that the banks had started to subside; whatever the cause the thud of the pumps ruined the summer.

But by August 1959 all was fixed: Cambridge had a new river crossing, a reinforced concrete arch vault faced with tons of Portland stone. It was wider than Silver Street itself - but it should be remembered that the bridge would probably last well over 100 years, during which time the street may itself have been widened – something that has yet to come to pass

And in one of those odd co-incidences, in August 1959 work was under way reconstructing the railway bridge on Hills Road.

Memories 28 July 2008, by Mike Petty

‘The local post office is an endangered species’ lamented the News in June. It has been a story carried in newspapers throughout the country in the wake of current proposals for closure of village and community post offices.

Yet that story was not from this June – it was from 9th June 1983, 25 years ago. Days later came the news that despite massive protests the Head Postmaster had decided that the sub post-office in Cambridge’s King Street must shut when the owners retired. Councillors vowed to continue the fight and said they would consider buying the building in the hope they could keep it open. But all agreed that Mr & Mrs Mansfield had given a first class personal service for 30 years which would be difficult to match even if the post office were to remain

One of the consequences of closure is that everyday facilities like the simple act of buying a stamp becomes more complicated. There used to be an answer: outside our village post office there were two machines that dispensed stamps if you deposited the appropriate coins in the slot.

These did not always work properly – something a News reporter discovered way back in March 1925: ‘The stamp machine attached to the door of the General Post Office in Cambridge is such a boon that I hesitate to complain. But on no fewer than five occasions I have found the penny slot fail to act correctly. On the first occasion the machine delivered me two penny stamps for one copper. I was wondering what to do when another purchaser came along and slipped a penny in the slot without result, so I handed one over. The next time I received no stamp for my penny, and wiped that off as a loss. On the third occasion I got two stamps for the price of one, so cried “quits”. For those who like a little speculation these stamp machines are ideal’

In October 1951 Newmarket Post Office clerk Miss Cora Simpson sold a sheet of stamps to Lady Irwin. This would not normally have made news but it marked the opening of the town’s magnificent new post office, then the most up-to-date in the country. It replaced the former office in the High Street which had been destroyed in an air raid in 1941. At the ceremony a memorial plaque was dedicated to Miss Q. Kerry and Mr A.F. Barnes who were killed on duty when it was bombed. Other staff were to learn that the work could be dangerous when in 13th November 1978 four men wearing theatrical masks – one of an ape and another a clown – made a £30,000 raid on the post office. One was armed with a sawn-off double-barrelled shotgun, two had pickaxe handles and the other had an iron wrench. They tied up three sorters on duty and broke open registered mail. Perhaps they were fed up with waiting for the postman to call.

There is no doubt that a local post office has long been regarded as an asset; on 28th August 1931 a correspondent, signing himself ‘R.N.’ wrote to the News: ‘Sir – I have just visited Saffron Walden; its one cinema is perhaps not up to par, but shopping prices are reasonable; the buses do not monopolise the streets nor their passengers the pavements. The Sunday there is no more deadly than of Cambridge, prams do not form fours across the path and they are very polite in the Post Office. If I had to migrate, I would go there because a three-halfpenny stamp may be bought there in such a friendly and courteous atmosphere’

Now the Government once more claims they are not paying their way. Perhaps there is a solution: issue yet more special stamps. In early August 1983 the Fenstanton postmaster, Anthony Hobbs, found his business had mushroomed. He was at the centre of a world spotlight after the Post Office brought out a series of stamps commemorating the village’s most famous resident, the 18th-century gardener, Capability Brown. Stamp collectors from all over the globe were contacting him for first-day covers franked with a special mark designed by Jack Dady and a group of villagers

Perhaps this is one tactic that could be employed by those people fighting the loss of their own Post Office. But who would you choose to commemorate?

Memories 6th August 2008, by Mike Petty (Wed)

A short time ago I received an email from David Farnell who organises the Eversdens village website (www.the-eversdens.co.uk) featuring a fascinating collection of community news and history.

He'd recent carried an item about a Dornier being shot down near the village which had triggered a recollection of a bigger bombing raid in 1940 from David Ellis who remembered it well as it happened on his 16th birthday.

He recalled it was 8.30 in the morning, breakfast was over and it was time to get back out on the farm. A deep drone and the boom of high explosives punctuated by the sound of machine gun fire drew the family out on to the driveway of Five Gables Farm. David looked up and saw, almost overhead, a close formation of about twelve Dorniers in a cloudless sky flying at around 15,000 feet. An ominous whine sent the family diving for cover, but no explosion followed it. The bombing raid was something of a botched attempt as far as he was concerned.

It was described in a Cambridgeshire County Council booklet "An Historical Account of Air Raid Precautions, 1935-1945" produced just after the war. This describes how the line of bombs started at Manor Farm, Fowlmere, went through stubble, orchard, and grassland until it reached the A10 where the side of the road was damaged and continued across stubble to the Hitchin- Cambridge railway close to the Blue Lias Cement Works. One bomb fell on each side of the railway within a few yards, but no damage was done. The bombs continued over a grass field and through an orchard to the Meldreth-Shepreth road where one fell in the middle of the road close to a small bridge. The line then continued close to the same stream until it entered the river, and there were a few bombs north of the river in Barrington parish. A number of Incendiary Bombs were dropped at the same time, but these fell not so regularly, and more to the east. Some fell in Fowlmere, others in various parts of Shepreth, and some on Barrington Green. A few of the High Explosive bombs did not explode on landing

Thankfully the Eversdens escaped, the supply of water-cress from Fowlmere was uninterrupted; traffic on the A10 continued to flow and the cows at Five Gables Farm got milked as usual.

However David Farnell was interested in finding more details. Co-incidentally I had received an email from a man who has been researching this, along with all other similar incidents. Julian Evan-Hart has spent 30 years wandering fields with his metal detector, talking to eye-witnesses and contacting surviving crew or families. He knows that the incident over the Eversdens was just a small drama in a bleak day. The Dorniers, probably about thirty of them altogether, had set out to destroy the fighter bases at Debden and Duxford. They were guarded by squadrons of Messerschmitt. Debden suffered some damage to the airfield. Duxford escaped this raid completely. Bombs were jettisoned over a wide area from Cambridge to Chelmsford. One civilian died. One Dornier was lost together with six Messerschmitts and one crewman died. The RAF lost eleven fighter aeroplanes. Three pilots died and five were incapacitated. Only two of the fighter pilots engaged in the battle survived the war.

Julian has now published his discoveries in yet another new book on the Second World War. But what makes this one special is the sheer amount of detail that he has unearthed that has not been recorded before, like: What made a 50 feet crater in a wood at Pampisford and caused a local girls lung to collapse? How did the Water Board find an American fighter at Wendy? Who was the famous RAF pilot who shot down an enemy aeroplane at Orwell? What crashed at Shepreth and what is the story behind the young Typhoon pilot who is buried in Shepreth churchyard?

He also has compiled a long list of planes – both friendly and enemy - that crashed locally including that of a Wellington MkIII, X3668 which collided with a Stirling on 28th July 1942 and came down at Rampton, killing five of the crew – and incident that villagers there are seeking to ensure is properly commemorated.

So if you have been puzzling over those half-remembered crashes in local fields then turn to “War-torn skies of Great Britain”, vol.3: Cambridgeshire” by Julian Evan-Hart (ISBN 978-0-9554735-6-2, £14.95) or email the author, j.evenhart@ntlworld.com. And if you can add to his files, he would be especially delighted to hear from you.

Last week Cambridge's ADC Theatre welcomed Elizabeth Hollingsworth, daughter of one of the principal figures in early twentieth-century undergraduate drama.

The name of Rupert Brooke is of course well known in literary circles around the world, but in this case he was only a supporting act; the important person being commemorated was another of the same surname.

In Edwardian times Justin Brooke was an undergraduate interested in English Renaissance drama, then largely unknown and unperformed for centuries. He became the leading figure in the establishment of the Marlowe Dramatic Society in Cambridge in 1907. The inaugural performance was Christopher Marlowe's 'Doctor Faustus' at the New Theatre in 1907, the second Milton's 'Comus', directed by Justin's close friend, the poet Rupert. They also performed plays entirely in Greek something that has itself become a Cambridge tradition.

Only men were allowed to participate but many of the characters were female. So the lads dressed as ladies, dressed in their sister's corsets that were tightly laced by the wardrobe mistresses to get them down to twenty-two inch waists! And to ensure their talents – and their sufferings – were not forgotten it was the norm to commission an album of photographs of themselves in costume as a souvenir. It was one of these that Justin's daughter, Elizabeth Hollingsworth, wanted to pass over to the ADC for addition to its archives.

The pictures show Chaplainesque villains with moustaches, goatee beard and black capes, Grecian ladies, maids and brides –and although the Marlowe Society established a tradition of not identifying its actors, each picture has a name underneath. They include Louis Mountbatten, Charles Carey who went on to be an Archbishop, Justin Brooke in long frock and his namesake Rupert in Grecian armour.

When his undergraduate days were done Justin joined his father's firm, married and had a daughter, Elizabeth, who went to live with her mother following the scandal of her parent's divorce.

Forced to leave his job, Justin became acquainted with another 'brook' – the village of Wickhambrook in west Suffolk which in the 1920s was suffering from low unemployment. There he started farming with a dairy herd and milk delivery services which travelled as far as Cambridge. He diversified into fruit, specialising in plums, apples and peaches which he sold to miners in Cardiff becoming Suffolk's leading producers of soft fruit and providing much-needed work for locals. Later he expanded further acquiring other farms, including Hinton Hall at Haddenham and the adjoining Grunty Fen Farm.

Justin retained his love of the theatre and it was at Wickhambrook in 1960 that the then undergraduate President of the Marlowe Society, a young Ian McKellen visited him. They spoke – Sir Ian recalls – 'little of blank verse but a lot about eating, drinking and hare coursing!'

Meanwhile Elizabeth had been awarded a place at Newnham College, Cambridge where she attended lectures by another theatrical legend, George (Dadie) Rylands and F.R. Leavis. She inherited his father's passion for the theatre and regularly watched the dress rehearsals of productions at the Arts Theatre, though she did not act herself. Her studies were interrupted in 1943 by the war but after serving three years in the Wrens, she returned to finish her degree. Later she took over her father's agricultural enterprises

So it was that Elizabeth Hollingsworth, now an elderly but very sprightly lady, caught the train from Bury St. Edmund's, carrying with her a plethora of programmes and photographs from 1904 and delighted the current thespians with her reminiscences of her father and his contribution to undergraduate drama.

Mrs Hollingsworth herself is mentioned in the Marlow Society's official history, 'Bloomsbury and British Theatre' by Tim Cribb, a fellow of Downing College (Salt Publishing 9781844714148). Now there is another footnote that can be added to its illustrious story

If you have further information about the history of the ADC then contact James Baggaley, the Manager, on 01223 359547 or email james@adctheatre.com,

Memories 18th August 2008, by Mike Petty

Last week's fire that devastated a restaurant King Street also brought back into the headlines a building known as the old 'County Hall'

Its story is an interesting one. When in 1888 Cambridgeshire County Council was established much of business previously transacted by Quarter Sessions was assigned to them.

The new bureaucracy needed staff. One of the first employees was Henry Wilkin who was to serve for 55 years and retire as chief clerk of the County Council in 1955. He recalled how at the age of 13 he had entered the office of a solicitor who in 1899 became Clerk to the Council. He received five shillings a week out of which he had to hire a barrow to take books to the council office – wherever that was.

Initially County Council meetings were held in the Guildhall on Market Hill and negotiations were opened between town and county councils over the possibility of joint use of their offices. But Cambridge councillors were very wary that this new upstart organisation that might come to dominate town affairs while the County feared that the Corporation was harbouring plans to gain additional powers over the rural county.

By 1912 the number of rented County Council offices were growing and they wondered what to do. If they could not join with the Borough in constructing a new Guildhall they could build their own headquarters. One option was to use the historic Assize court on the top of Castle Hill as a council chamber & construct new offices alongside. But this was felt to be too far from the station for councillors to get to meetings easily.

Instead they purchased the old Methodist Chapel in Hobson Street – a new Wesley chapel having been built on Christ's Pieces. It was demolished and replaced by new County Hall that was inaugurated in 1914.

The role of local government was expanding. The compiler of the CDN's Table Talk column in January 1928 was amazed at the speed of change. He wrote: less than 20 years ago I was doing journalistic work in a Hobson Street office. In those days there was no County Hall opposite, nor talk of one. It was begun only 15 years ago and if anyone had been asked how long it would remain the County Council headquarters he might have answered 'A hundred years at least'. But so great has been the extra work thrown on the Council that already the building has been outgrown and plans are now to be prepared for a new building on the Castle Hill site. There are now 86 officials and ratepayers may ask if such an army of officers are really necessary

Matters had been given impetus after the Home Secretary announced that he had decided to discontinue the use of the County Gaol on Castle Hill which had largely stood idle since 1916. This would allow the council to build a new Shire Hall on the prison site and plans were drawn up for office accommodation together with council chamber, library and storerooms.

In 1930 the doors to the County Gaol were thrown open to thousands of residents before the building was consigned to history. Two years later the new Shire Hall was opened with little ceremony in the presence of a handful of people. The Architect (H.H. Dunn) presented the Chairman, Ald W.C. Jackson, with a gold-covered key engraved with the County Arms with which he unlocked the door. The council chamber was very similar to that at the old County Hall in Hobson Street from which all the seats and tables had been removed as a cost-saving measure. When Councillors held their first meeting there a recommendation that it be called 'Shire Hall' was adopted without discussion.

The idea was for the County Hall in Hobson Street to be sold with the proceeds being used to pay for the new Shire Hall. However nobody wanted to buy it. In 1934 it became the headquarters of Chesterton Rural District Council but continued to house a major section of the county council's social services department. It was sold to Christ's College, 25 years ago in what was one of the biggest property deals in the city centre for years.

Since then County Hall has largely dropped out of the limelight until last week's fire brought it back into the news. But did you work there, or have you memories to add to its story.

Jesus Green is in the news at present with plans for a possible revamp of this tranquil area of parkland between Victoria Avenue and the Cam. This year on August Bank Holiday, should the weather prove clement, it will be a place where local residents can relax, read or run around. But some with longer memories may recall that at one time August Bank Holiday meant the Mammoth Show.

It had started in 1904 on the Leys School ground when a crowd estimated at 17,000 were entertained by the band of the Scots Guards, participated in sports and flocked to a dog show which attracted over 500 entries. A larger venue was needed so next year an area of Jesus Green was fenced off to provide a venue for a vast array of activities. There were various sports including an obstacle race with men running with a bucket over their heads and the 100 yards boys' race which was won by Master M. Townsend aged just 2 years 10 months. But it was the cycle races that attracted the crowds, especially when Cambridge had champions like Arthur Markham.

In addition there were displays of various types: in 1911 Percival Spencer, an aeronaut, gave people the opportunity to ascend in his balloon 'Enchantress'. Alphonso Smith, a boot and shoe maker was one who took advantage of the trip which came down at Exning.

The Show ran into financial difficulties but survived until the outbreak of the Great War during which the grass of Jesus Green was covered by military tents. The Mammoth was revived in 1922, drawing huge crowds but not all events came up to scratch. In 1924 the Rodeo displays were disappointing; the only part that created any real enthusiasm was the steer wrestling from an automobile. Montana Bob, the chief performer, had no easy task in overtaking the steer and then had considerable difficulty in bringing it to the ground. In doing so the steer trod on his arm but he was still able to ride the bucking broncho a few minutes afterwards.

In 1927 the Mammoth Show it was held for the last time: the Council did not want the grass to be cut up as they had other ideas for Jesus Green. Five years earlier an Act of Parliament had increased their power over the common lands: they could now restrict grazing and push ahead with their plans

One of these was for an outdoor swimming pool. Inevitably the proposals met opposition but construction began in 1923. The new baths were 300 ft long and 40 ft wide - and ideal for water polo. By putting them near Jesus Lock they were able to get a natural flow of water from the river, which would avoid the expense of pumping. They proved a success: by September 1925 20,000 tickets had been issued for male bathers alone. However soon the river quality failed to meet public health regulations and mains water was substituted.

Swimming was not the only attraction: despite a shower of rain a number of tennis enthusiasts were present on Jesus Green when in February 1925 the Mayor opened Cambridge's first public hard tennis courts. Directly adjoining were new grass courts, nearby was the bowling green whilst further afield cricket pitches were being laid. Dr Rouse Ball of Trinity College gave money to build a pavilion, which was named after him. Then in 1927 an 18-hole putting green was opened. It had been funded by the generosity of Col Tebbutt who'd promised £150.

Since then Jesus Green has been home to a variety of entertainments, including a pop festival in 1969 and a big top housing Sadlers Wells Ballet in the 1970s. There were even proposals to build a £40,000 open-air theatre on Jesus Green to be funded by the City Lottery Committee, but this never came to fruition. In July 1978 hundreds of people watched stars of television, stage and the music world in the heats of the Thames Television Star Games contest; they saw singer Joe Brown lead his team to victory while Dickie Henderson's team were second and £10,000 was raised for charity.

Did you attend any of these, or do you have other memories of Jesus Green?

Memories 1st September 2008, by Mike Petty

Soon schools that have been uncharacteristically quiet will start to become noisy again. But some buildings have come to the end of their educational life. One of these was until recently part of the Council School at Fulbourn and, as Norman Osborne, has discovered it has had an interesting, largely forgotten past.

In 1858 a Church Room and Class Room were built on land given by the Rev C.F. Townley. According to the Deed of Conveyance it was to be used as 'a school for the education of children and adults or children only of the labouring, manufacturing and other poorer classes in the parish, and for no other purpose'

Later it was supplemented by an Infants' school erected in 1871, with a Council School being erected in 1877.

At the outbreak of war in 1914 the Church Room was the venue for a recruiting meeting; several volunteers came forward of whom only one, Walter Plumb was accepted and the others returned home disappointed.

Soon the scale of the casualties was becoming apparent and the need for convalescent hospitals became urgent. The county director of the Red Cross, the Rev C.F. Townley who lived in Fulbourn appealed for buildings suitable for use as Voluntary Aid Detachment Hospitals. Responding to his appeal the Rector gave permission for the Infants School and Church Room to be used.

The children moved to the Congregational Church Hall where they stayed until November 1918 and in just four days the building was transformed into a hospital. The Church Room became a large and lofty ward holding seventeen beds with two open fire grates. A second ward held another eleven beds. There was a bathroom and washhouse heated by a large boiler while the outhouses were used for storing coal and washing up.

Soldiers needed to be fed so a kitchen was fitted with two stoves where cooking was done, with the exception of the large meat joints which were kindly cooked by the village baker, Mr Ellis. The nurses had a private kitchen. Supplementing all this was Fulbourn Reading Room which was made a recreation room for patients with a billiard table, piano and library.

Fulbourn's Red Cross Hospital opened on the 23rd November 1914 with the arrival of 30 patients from the First Eastern General Hospital at Cambridge. They were nursed by a team of ladies led by the Commandant, Miss R.C. Townley and her mother. A few days later forty men responded to an appeal to help with the transportation of patients and relieve the nurses at night.

Wounded soldiers became part of village life; they paraded with their band, gave concerts, were taken on trips to Bottisham lock and helped fight fires. They were allowed the use of the cricket and football pitches and had the freedom of the Manor grounds.

It was not the village's only reminder of the casualties of war. News came back of village lads who were being cared for in other hospitals, including Walter Plumb who was badly wounded in July 1916 but lived to tell the tale.

Meanwhile another former resident, Miss Dorothy Nicholls, was writing back to describe her experiences as a nurse on the Russian front. She was honoured for her service, as was Sister Whitmore who after four years splendid work at the Fulbourn hospital was summoned to Buckingham Palace where the King presented her with a silver medal in November 1918.

By then the Fulbourn VAD Hospital was coming to the end of its work. The beds were removed and the children moved back.

Although other communities such as Girton and Hildersham still have reminders of this period in their own village halls, Norman thinks this is the last actual VAD Hospital to be much in the same condition as it was in 1914-1918. Now it faces an uncertain future but the Fulbourn Village History Society thinks it would make an excellent museum in which they could display the nearly 8,000 photographs and artefacts they have collected.

Amongst them are a series depicting the days when it was a place where 1,378 wounded soldiers were nursed back to fighting fitness, to be sent back to the Front to fight again.

Memories 8th September 2008, by Mike Petty

The financial headlines speak of a time of crisis. The collapse in the economy has seen builders laying off men and new developments being halted mid-way, adding to the problems for those desperately struggling to find and fund a home.

This was the situation too in 1931 when a worldwide slump led to wholesale unemployment and the whole banking system seemed on the verge of breaking down. Prime Minister Ramsey MacDonald decided he would have to economise by raising taxes and lowering wages of civil servants from Cabinet Ministers to the Police. But some of his supporters objected and he resigned. The crisis led to a National Government featuring Conservatives, Liberals and Labour with MacDonald once more as leader.

The country was struggling to recover from the trauma of the Great War. The promises of Homes for Heroes were not being met, indeed in Cambridge many families were living in wooden huts that had been erected for the First Eastern General Hospital on land now occupied by the University Library.

One of the priorities for Cambridge councillors was the building of more homes for the poorer classes: the slums were a disgrace and should be abolished, they decreed. 1920 saw the completion of the first of the borough housing schemes with more than 100 homes being built in Cavendish, Hills and Hinton Avenues and Stanley Road. The second was the Chesterton Hall scheme which provided some 230 houses in the Milton Road, Hawthorn Way and neighbouring roads. To speed building in 1925 it was decided to erect steel houses. But it was not enough. It was never enough.

They also decided to sell council houses to people with no capital. A typical Milton Road property was priced at £579 repayable at £5 down and weekly instalments of 21/1 (£1.05) for two years then 17/- (85p) for 18 years. Those who could afford to pay such amounts were urged to contact the Treasurer. But many could not.

The Cambridge Housing Society was set up to provide housing to rent for larger families unable afford the council's prices. Their first scheme of 22 terraced 3-bed houses Green End road were completed in 1928 & let at 7/3 (36p) a week.

The needs of families with two or more children were obviously a priority but this was very hard on the newly-married who wanted to start a family but were forced to live with in-laws. They had no hope of a place of their own.

It was to cater for their needs that the Hundred Houses Society was formed in 1933. They selected young, working people unable to afford to buy their own homes. The rents had to be such that a man in full-time work could pay them but yet bring in enough revenue for the Society to repay its loans and continue its ambition of building 100 houses a year, every year. The first houses were constructed at Eastfield, off Scotland Road, to be followed by Fallowfield. It was the start of an initiative which has continued to provide homes for Cambridgeshire folk ever since.

Today they are celebrating their 75th anniversary with a dinner at St John's College and have issued a history in which Jeane Underwood has poured through the Society's archives and even tracked down some of the first tenants.

Peter Soar moved in in 1935 before the road had been made up and recalls there was a brick copper to heat water for the laundry and a black cooking stove in the back room but no electric sockets in the house. Another tenant remembers: "The bath was in the kitchen. It had a lid which pulled down to cover it and this acted as a kitchen table. We had to go out of the back door to reach the toilet. This was embarrassing, as anybody who was in their garden would know where you were going"

Mrs Mary Tilley was one of the first on Eastfield, "My husband worked for the Cambridge University Press and my children were born and grew up here. The only time I have not lived in this house was when they were being done up: they made a bigger kitchen and bathroom, put in central heating and double glazing. I've always been very happy here and I've never wanted to live anywhere else.

What were your experiences of starting life in your first house; was it harder then than now when 'the youngsters seem to have everything'. Or was life comparatively easy compared to the stresses of modern living.

J.H. Plumb from Landbeach has memories of brass – not brass bands, but the brass fittings that adorned the lavatories beneath Cambridge Market Hill. He was reminded of them after seeing a photograph of the fountain that used to stand in the middle of the Square. What ever became of the top section and stonework, he asks.

Many people remember it as "Hobson's Conduit". But it wasn't. Hobson's Conduit stood nearer the junction with Petty Cury and fulfilled its role of providing a supply of clean water to the town centre until 1856.

For most of that time what is now the market hill was packed with shops and houses, the stalls being confined to the area in front of the Guildhall and a strip along the eastern edge. Then in 1849 came a fire that destroyed many of the properties, leaving Cambridge with a ravaged town centre. Faced with such devastation the council debated what to do before finally deciding to clear the site and start again, creating a square market area.

Hobson's old Conduit would be out of place in such a redevelopment and was relocated to its present home on the corner of Lensfield Road and Trumpington Street. But there had to be some centrepiece to the scheme.

At that time a new Cambridge University and Town Waterworks Company had been established to supply better water so it was thought that a fountain would be appropriate. A number of schemes were put forward before Gordon Hill's design for an ornate stone-canopied structure was agreed.

Sadly things did not go smoothly and there were inordinate delays before work finally commenced. The new structure when finally complete became a landmark, revellers had their pictures taken around it, people parked their cars near it. But it was not well-built and within a century the stone of the canopy was crumbling. Repairs would be expensive and the town council wanted to take it down.

But the County Planners objected – it was an important part of Cambridge. However the County also wanted to demolish another historic building, the Assize Courts on Castle Hill. This time it was the City councillors who wanted its preservation.

Then both gave way, both structures disappeared. The top of the fountain was demolished in August 1953. Some of the carvings from the fountain were presented to the Cambridge Folk Museum, other stones were put into store so they could be reused if it was ever decided to put the top back on.

Since then there have been plans for replacement fountains but what we have today is the fountain head and the base that once supported the canopy that Mr Plumb remembers. The loos are another story for another day.

Do you have memories of that fountain and the coloured piece of glass at the top that would catch the light. Do you have snapshots to share – or other memories you would like jogged. Write to Mike Petty at the News

Various readers have done just that. Amongst them are R.H. Asbury of Cherry Hinton who lived in Trinity Street in the 1920s and 30's and was taken to see the Assize Court buildings and the county gaol on Castle Hill – even getting into the padded cell with its walls lined with leather and the gallows room with the trap door in the floor.

Mention of the County Hall in Hobson Street has brought a letter from Peggy Squires of Cambridge who worked for Chesterton Rural District Council from February 1931. She started in offices in St John's Street before moving into County Hall where South Cambs RDC also had offices for a while. The two councils merged in 1974. Viv Blunt from Cottenham has kindly sent me a copy of the programme for the opening of the Wesley Church on Christ's Pieces which replaced the Hobson Street Methodist Chapel that was demolished to build County Hall.

Memories 22nd September 2008, by Mike Petty

On 25th September 1933, just 75 years ago, two women, two children and an ice cream man witnessed the final act of an event which had been part of the life of Cambridge since well before the University had come on to the scene.

The Mayor, Alderman Mrs Keynes, together with the Clerk of the Peace (Sterndale Burrows) and the Sergeant at mace, journeyed down Newmarket Road to Stourbridge Common to make an official declaration just as their predecessors had done for centuries.

In 1933 there were just six in the official party. In 1727 there had been 86: councillors, officers, members of parliament in a grand procession, mounted on horseback and bedecked in official robes, with banners and streamers, drums and trumpets. For this was an important duty and followed by an official dinner.

It was too important a duty to be left to the Mayor and Council and so the University Vice-Chancellor together with his officials – registrary, commissary, proctors and taxors - also set off in their carriages to the Common, to proclaim three times and proceed to their refreshment in a substantial brick building called Tiled House. Here they partook of oysters straight from the barrel, and then enjoyed a stroll around Garlic Row before returning to its upstairs room for a substantial feast. (Does anybody remember this building, later known as the Oyster House and demolished in 1960?)

Together in 1727 they were proclaiming Stourbridge Fair, one of the greatest international trade fairs in the whole of Europe. In those days merchants made their way from Venice and Genoa with silks and velvets, Flemish weavers brought linen, Spaniards iron, Norwegians tar and pitch. Wines came from France and Spain and – sometimes – Greece. Then from all over England tradesmen with their packhorses and wagons negotiated the atrocious roads; from Halifax, Leeds and Rochdale came cloth, Birmingham sent iron and brass, Sheffield cutlery, Nottingham and Leicester glass and stockings. Lancashire wool would be bought by Norfolk manufactures, hops grown in Surrey and Kent were destined for northern breweries.

The fair was laid out upon regular lines with specific commodities in particular areas – coal by the river, leather near the fish hill. There was a brush row, joiners and braziers had rows, a cheese row, a cheap side and the duddery or cloth fair. The main approach from Newmarket Road to the river was called Garlic Row.

Nor was the prosperity limited to the fair itself: the vast influx of visitors meant that every inn bed and most stables for miles around would be utilised as sleeping accommodation and local butchers and bakers would call each morning and sell their wares from tent to tent. In 1724 fifty hackney carriages plied night and morning to and from London and watermen went so far as to bring their Thames wherries up to Cambridge by road so they could convey people along the Cam to the fair.

The same river that brought the goods still winds around Stourbridge common but now there is no fair, no heaps of dung, straw and rubbish left behind to re-enrich the ground so trampled by thousands of feet. The trading aspect declined during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. By 1902 the only business was that done at the horse fair where cart horses, hackneys and hunters, foals and ponies were offered for sale. One dealer, Mr Titchmarsh of Barrington, got rid of about 40 carthorses during the morning. That year the pleasure fair consists largely of refreshment saloons and stalls from which pungent odours proclaimed the nature of the edibles on sale. Some roundabouts, swing boats and one peep show, in Garlic Row, completed the scene

Things revived in 1923 through the enterprise of Messrs Thurston and Sons who brought their amusements and visitors could indulge in the excitement of "Housey, Housey", the scenic railway, Manning's flying horses and the swing boats which provided the thrill of the rush through space.

In 1930 there was just one traction engine with a cargo of swing boats, by 1931 even the swings were absent. But as one fair was dying, another was becoming a nuisance: residents at the other end of Newmarket Road were complaining that their peace was being disturbed by the noise and bustle of Midsummer Fair. Councillors agreed and decided that from 1931 it should be relocated to Stourbridge Common. But fair men boycotted the site, arranging another at Arnold's Meadow just beyond Ditton Lane. Next year they were back on Midsummer Common.

Thus it was that on 25th September 1933 the Mayoral party stood virtually alone on Stourbridge Fair declaration day. The News speculated on the future: "In this world of multiple stores and quick luncheon counters, great amusement parks and world exhibitions, what place can a fair have which was the child of the Middle Ages?"

In 1934 Stourbridge Fair was formally abolished by the Secretary of State.

But this year the grounds of the Leper chapel again welcomed the Mayor to pay tribute to the memory of the days when Cambridge housed its great international trade fair.

BBC TV's 'Strictly Come Dancing' programme has sparked a revival in Ballroom dancing. One of its especial fans is Keith Mann of Girton. He writes:

"I was born in Cambridge in 1931 and have lived here all my life. Like many young men of my generation in the late 1940's & 1950's I joined the Coleridge Youth Club in Radegund Road where I became quite keen on dancing. In September 1949 I joined a ballroom class at the Bobwin School of Dancing which met above Millers music shop in Sidney Street. We learned the Waltz, Quickstep, Slow Foxtrot and the Tango from strict tempo music recorded on 78 rpm records by Victor Silvester & His Ballroom Orchestra.

“There were many Dancing Schools in Cambridge at this time including the Leader School which met at the Masonic Hall in Corn Exchange Street, the Curwain School at the Dorothy Cafe and the Luman School of Dancing in West Road.

“It was about this time that the University founded a school for dancing for students which became known as ‘The Cambridge Dancer’s Club’. They met at Milton Road School and held regular dances at the Guildhall with competitions and a professional demonstration by some of the best champions in the world of ballroom dancing”. Keith won their Novice Competition in April 1951 with his partner, Mary Ebden.

The Guildhall was a popular venue with dances held most Saturday nights and it was there that Keith met his wife, then Mary Dant. They have been dancing together ever since, though one of her own memories is of dancing with another young man called Anton du Beck, the ‘Strictly’ star, in July 2006

Some of the dance bands playing at the Guildhall in the 1950s were the Stirlingairs, The Astrals, George Freestone, and Chic Applin, whilst at the Dorothy Ballroom one could dance to the Reg Cottage Ballroom Orchestra.

Another band was the Kestrals for whom Keith played the saxophone, performing at the Guildhall regularly and in many towns and villages around Cambridgeshire. They played for Old Tyme Dancing which was very popular in the 1940’s /1950’s. This has declined in recent years and has been succeeded by Sequence Dancing.

Keith continues: “During the 1970’s and 80’s my wife and I did some competitive dancing and had dancing lessons in Ballroom and Latin American with professional dancing teachers in London. We still love dancing to this day and attend a Sequence Dance Class at Shelford, as well as Ballroom and Latin dances with our friends at St. Neots and also at Letchworth, Herts. We have and still do go on dancing holidays to Pakefield and Gunton Hall in Norfolk, which has given us some wonderful memories.

“Needless to say we have been thoroughly enjoying the Series of Strictly Come Dancing on B.B.C. Television”.

Keith has supplemented his memories with a wonderful collection of photographs and ephemera some of which he has lent me in the hope they will jog memories for others. If so then please let me know.

News readers recollections are needed to help various people who are researching their particular area of Cambridgeshire.

Barry Chambers from Sheffield writes: "Although born and brought up in Cambridge, I have lived away for many years now, hence it's difficult for me to visit and do family history in Cambridge. My father was Sidney Chambers who was a keen cricketer in the 1920/1930's and an umpire in the 1950/1960's until his death in 1966. He played for a local Cambridge cricket club – perhaps the Old Perseans - and I have some medals inscribed C.C.A for 1929, 1930, 1931 and 1932 and one inscribed I.L.C.L for 1935. There are others but they are not inscribed.

"Unfortunately when he died, my mother destroyed all his effects apart from the medals and I would be grateful if anybody has memories of him or can add details of the clubs. My uncle was Bert Charge, who was, I believe, a well known local billiards player. Again, I know very little about him."

Barry has sent me scans of the medals. I suspect the CCA was the Cambridgeshire Cricket Association, but what would I.L.C.L. have stood for? [SCAN OF BARRY'S MEDALS]

Mrs C.M.Carter (nee Langford) also needs help. She has a picture of her Great Great Grandfather, Samuel Maltby, born 1803, taken when he received an honorary MA from the Cambridge University. It shows him holding the robe he made for King Edward VII when he was awarded an Honorary Degree in 1864, a feature of which were read gold trimmings. John Maltby, now dead, remembered this and said his own Mother made the robes for Queen Elizabeth the Queen Mother when she was given an Honorary degree at the Senate House in 1948. Several generations of our Maltby's were also robemakers also often taking work on commission from firms like Ede & Ravenscroft. She would be extremely grateful for any information regarding this. You can email teabag.carter420@ntlworld.com or drop me a line and I'll put you in touch. [SCAN OF QUEEN ELIZABETH AT SENATE HOUSE 1948 WEARING GOWN MADE BY MRS MALTBY]

In my 'Looking Back' column I noted a letter from the CDN of 22 March 1954 from A.R. Almond of Sidney Street which read:

"Although I call myself a robemaker I do not personally make gowns. This is done as it has been for hundreds of years by operatives working in their own homes and many of them can trace back a couple of centuries. One of the best known names in Cambridge is that of Maltby, a member of which family is still active and busy in that occupation. Any unfamiliar details which we require we can generally obtain from this source with its accumulated knowledge."

Mrs Maltby herself appeared on the BBC "Down Your Way" programme recorded in Cambridge in January 1949 when she talked about the Queen's robes. Other local interviewed by Richard Dimpleby included Mr R. Shorrocks who worked for Pest Control Ltd, Miss M. Stuart, secretary of the Arts Theatre, Mr Fred Hudson, a television tester at Pye Ltd and Mr R. J. Pointer who was a CND linotype operator. Does anybody have a tape of this programme

Mark Alvin is tracing his Whiteheads family tree. There were for several generations Fruit & Vegetable Traders around the old Fitzroy Street area and were related (by marriage) to the Reynolds and the Thurstons of Cambridge.

The Cambridgeshire Collection has a photograph taken in 1940 of A.E.Whitehead, fruiterers, of 30b St.Andrew's Street, pointing to 'Help to win the War' notice. It is noticeable that despite rationing he had oranges and pineapples on display.

The fruiterers trade was not without its problems: in June 1906 Albert Whitehead of Burleigh Street appeared in court after his shop had been broken into and 90 oranges values at seven-and-six had been taken. Four schoolboys were charged with the theft – they had taken them to the gala ground on Midsummer Common and sold them. Two of the lads had very bad characters and were sentenced to receive 12 strokes with the birch. Albert had not wanted to prosecute, he'd just wanted the police to frighten them and was himself reprimanded for not turning up to give evidence. If you have similar memories then Mark would be pleased to hear from you. You can email mark.alvin@tinyworld.co.uk or drop me a line

If you attended Central School or Parkside college then you should get down to the Folk Museum in Castle Street which will be celebrating the history of school from the earliest provision of education in 1870 to the comprehensive system introduced a century later with a new exhibition which runs from today until 23rd December. Assistant Curator Becky Proctor has already had a lot of positive response from former pupils keen to relate their personal memories or offer school mementoes and looks forward to more.

Memories, 13th October 2008 by Mike Petty

Suzanne Langford from West Wrattling is seeking information on parish pounds as there is one in the village they'd like to restore to its original state. Its not known how old it is but a photograph taken in the 1920s shows a gate. Inside there is a small archway cut out of the lower part of the wall near the ground and they can't work out what this would have been for. Perhaps other villages had a pound and they may be able to help them with some history, she hopes. If so please email suzanne.langford@tesco.net or drop me a line.

The background to pounds was described by C.F. Tebbutt in his history of Bluntisham-cum-Earith, issued in 1941. He records that the pound, or pinfeld, was a necessary institution in every unenclosed parish, as the Open Field System made growing crops particularly liable to damage by straying cattle. The great area of common grazing grounds over which the cattle wandered made adequate fencing difficult. The owners of cattle were therefore deemed liable to prevent them getting among growing crops, meadows laid for hay, or on to commons resting from stock. Cattle found where they had no right to be were shut up (impounded) in the pound by the Pound Keeper (known usually as the Pindard or Pinder), and could only be recovered by the owner on payment of the appropriate fine. Pounds were small square enclosures built of posts and rails or brick, with a gate in the centre of one side. Both Bluntisham and Earith pounds were of wood, and still existed within living memory. Earith Pound was on the north side of The Hill, Bluntisham Pound at Little London on the north side of Station Road, he records

Writing in 1908 Albert Pell recalled the situation at Wilburton in his childhood: "An important officer of the manor was the 'Pinder'. His services were constantly required, and he was for ever bringing up cunning donkeys, wandering cows and loose colts to the fine brick enclosure, the manor pound. I was fond of climbing up the red-brick walls and getting on the bold picturesque coping to look down at the captives. The pinder was not a young man, and pigs at 'shacking' time were occasionally his masters. They were very uneasy and restless when in durance, whereas the donkeys stood stock still in the sun, almost asleep, with their lower lip dropping as if they were well accustomed to their quarters and were certain of release, and the cows chewed the cud placidly till kicked by a cart colt. Then a general rumpus ensued in which the pigs took a leading part, getting entangled in the legs of the rest of the community, and finally drawing up in battle array in a corner with their snouts 'at the rest' outwards".

Out at Landbeach in February 1980 the pinder was George Arnold who was carrying on a family tradition. For the last 40 years he had held the post that his father held before him. The job was unpaid but he could charge owners for releasing the animals and sell unclaimed beasts after a month and keep the cash. In the old days pinders could charge 6d for every animal; that was worth half a day's pay. The last time George had any animals in the pound had been in 1978 ago when six cows escaped from a field but he didn't have the heart to fine the owner.

Not every pinder was as honest. In the early 1800s the pinder for St Giles parish, Cambridge was William Cooke whose compound was on Pound Hill. He'd been drinking in Preston's beer house when the landlord refused to serve him more beer, so he determined on revenge. Preston's cattle were grazing, quite legally on Queen's Green but that did not stop Cooke letting them out, then driving them to the pound. A local resident, Sarah Coxal was disturbed by the noise, looked out her window and saw him lock the cattle in the pound just as the clocks struck two in the morning. The matter came to court when the pinder was found guilty and sentenced to a month's imprisonment

Do you have similar tales to tell, or pictures that can add to the record of these largely-forgotten institutions

As one who travels round more halls than most I can testify from personal experience that they come in all shapes and sizes. They range from brand-spanking new edifices with all the latest creature comforts to the more homely, sometimes shabby, older constructions which them can themselves have a long history even before they were pressed into their present use.

Some as at Girton and Hildersham were once wooden war-time hospitals, the meeting place at Downham Market was a former cinema with a screen to match and the hall at Ringstead near Hunstanton will be always remembered for the warmth of the welcome: when the group knew we had arrived they set a match to the fire which was soon roaring away in the grate.

Few have such a lengthy history as that at Trumpington, which is now celebrating its centenary. It was officially opened on 22nd October 1908, though it was not quite ready and various legal formalities had to be completed before it actually became the possession of the village in perpetuity.

The idea had begun to take shape after Mrs Mansfield, a respected parishioner, left money in her will for the benefit of the village. Canon Pemberton of Trumpington Hall gave the site and started the subscriptions with a donation of £100. This was followed by £200 from E.B. Foster and various sums from other notables, including the Archbishop of Sidney, Australia. Mr W H Brierly was commissioned to draw up plans for the builder, Mr W. Saint, and the corner stone was laid by Mrs Patience Pemberton on 11th February 1908. She was presented with a silver trowel.

The new hall would accommodate 250 people: “It will provide opportunities for the inhabitants to spend as much of their leisure time as they desire in reading, intercourse with one another and participation in various recreations”, the News reported. There would be concerts, billiards and a reading-room

Although it was the Village Hall, it was more frequently referred to as ‘The Men’s Institute’ and certainly the children thought of it as male territory. As one child wrote, “An Institute was built opposite the Post Office for young men to go in the evenings instead of going to the public house”.

Women were allowed in for concerts and whist drives and when the Women’s Institute set up a branch in Trumpington in 1920 the ladies met in the hall and have continued to do so to the present. In 1922 the men wished to put a second billiard table in the hall, but other users protested that there would be room for nothing else. So an extension was added specifically for the Men’s Institute.

In 1977 a loan in the Queen’s Silver Jubilee Year enabled a new extension to be built with its own kitchen and cloakrooms. It is known as the Jubilee Room and was initially intended for use as a Youth Room. Since the Church Hall was closed the Village hall has been much busier and has had a few improvements in this its Centenary Year.

The hall has been used for myriad functions including a Hawkey supper organised by Trumpington Young Farmers’ Club in June 1959. Now all this week it will house an exhibition celebrating its role in the community with documents and photographs of events that have taken place over the years. The earliest wedding photograph is from 1927 and the bride is mentioned many years later on the committee of the Over 60s Club. Another couple pictured on their wedding day in 1958 recently celebrated their golden wedding anniversary in the Village Hall.

The exhibition will open from 11am - 8pm, Tuesday – Friday and 10-4 on Saturday.

Peter Harrall of Willingham has written following Keith Mann's memories of ballroom dancing. He has sent me a photograph taken at Cambridge University Examination Hall on New Years Eve 1957. The Ken Stevens Orchestra was booked to play at this venue but found they had another booking somewhere else at the same time. So they put together another band to fill the gaps while the Orchestra shuttled between the two. The personnel in the photo are Peter Harrall on trumpet, Keith Mann and Jeff Harrison on alto sax, Trevor Edwards and Dave Sanderson on Tenor sax, Paul Bircham on piano, Geoffrey Whitehead on double bass and Dave Wiseman on drums

Last week Ridgeons, the timber and building materials firm, celebrated the 50th anniversary of the foundation of its '25 Club', which recognises the contributions of its long-serving staff.

Cyril Ridgeon began the company in 1911 from a bedroom in his house on St Barnabas Road before taking a small piece of ground in Tenison Road in 1913 for his first depot. Then came the first world war which might well have crippled such a young business but he was able to keep going and at the end of the conflict the firm was able to branch out.

In 1922 bought its first solid-tyred lorry. It had none of the modern luxuries like a heater and at 20 mph the driver was flung about all over the place. Before this goods were transported by horses and carts which were hired locally and often it would take all day to make a delivery of only 12 miles.

Throughout the depression of the 1920s and 30s the firm supplied materials for the programme of council house-building that was seen as a means of making work. During the Second War they became 'wharfingers' for the Ministry of Works and had to be prepared to get materials off to bombed areas within an hour or two of being warned.

In 1946 the firm branched out to March and in 1958 the Saffron Walden Building Materials Company became part of Ridgeons. By then they had a staff of 160 with 28 lorries and vans as well as a fleet of 13 cars.

Few will remember those distant days when everything was measured on the Imperial system and paid for in pounds, shillings and pence. Despatch notes were all handwritten using plenty of carbon paper (who now remembers carbon paper!) and everything entered into ledgers by hand.

There were few mechanical aids in the yard: timber was loaded, piece by piece, into railway trucks, up to 800 of which would come into their Cavendish Road sidings while bricks had to be moved manually. Ray Andrus who started at the firm's Nuffield Road site with Glyn Richards and Ted Ashman remembers: "Cement these days came in cold, but then it was boiling hot so I had to wear gloves. I had to use a sack barrow and load up to 10 bags inside the lorry, then steadily edge my way to the open back door where there was a tail-gate on an angle. You had to be very careful not to allow the weight of the sacks to over-balance you – it happened to me once: I got half-way down and the weight pulled me over; then both barrow and I shot down the steep tail-gate. The barrow stopped abruptly at the bottom but I went shooting over the top and landed on the ground."

Domestic customers in those days had far less choice than that now available but it included bathrooms in white and six other colours, fireplaces – which were made at Cavendish Road – and that latest innovation, central heating. Then came Westinghouse washing machines, imported from America, and stainless-steel sinks. Peter Silk recalls how during the early 50's kitchen planning was unheard of: a white glazed earthenware sink with perhaps a clip-on wooden draining board was the norm. Things were transformed by the coming of plastic and Formica worktops with cabinets and wall cupboards arriving in the 1960s. Bathrooms consisted of a free-standing bath, a small basin on brackets or maybe a pedestal, and a toilet with a high-level cistern and chain-flushing pull.

There was one must-have product in those days: red lanterns that were used by civil engineers to warn people about holes in the road. In one bad winter people flocked to buy them to heat outside toilets. Who knows, given global warming they may soon be back in demand!

The recent cold snap has made the inevitable headlines but ice was making the news in central Cambridge in August 1908.

Mr J.V. Pryor, a fishmonger, had developed a method of making great blocks of glittering, iridescent ice every hot midsummer morning in Falcon Yard, our present Lion Yard off Petty Cury. There he had installed the most up-to-date plant where the shrill insistent note of the dynamo was joined by the plunk-plunk of the gas engine exhaust.

He had constructed a large clean room whose floor was honeycombed with galvanised steel tanks filled with brine maintained at low temperature. Here the water was frozen in moulds for some 50 hours before being dipped in a tank of warm water and tipped out in slabs weighing two cwt apiece. But it was not this simple: ordinary Cambridge water contained a fair percentage of chalk as well as air. This would make the ice opaque so to produce clear ice it had to be agitated during the freezing process by a mechanical arm actuated by a dynamo.

This and more was described in detail by the News reporter who commented that like the flying machine (and this was 28th August 1908), the ice factory was at present only in its infancy and the plant expensive. It also made more ice than Mr Pryor needed for his ordinary fish business. So what was he to do with it?

In addition to the needs of wealthy gentlemen for a piece of ice to add to his bandy-and-soda there were commercial possibilities. The frozen meat trade, the preservation of perishable foods or indeed its potential to cool down buildings in hot countries had hardly been considered. In breweries, dairies and other industries there was an immense opportunity for an enterprising business in refrigerators and ice-making machines that might have made the name of Pryor known around the world.

But can you add more to the story of this Cambridge initiative?

Whilst visiting the wonderful exhibition of material at the Soham Community Museum's display and 1940's fashion show recently I met Denise Leonard who is seeking help in identifying a picture she has of her great grandparents, John and Matilda Pope.

Normally there would be very little chance that anybody would know more than the family does, but these couple are pictured standing in front of a windmill. It may well be the Hardfield Mill Soham since I have another picture taken as part of a survey made by the Cambridge Antiquarian Society. If you compare the windows and doors on the two pictures they do seem to line up in the right places and the external brick buildings seem to be the same. In Denise's photo the brick base of the windmill is round, which is quite unusual, and so is the one in the Antiquarian's collection.

Sohamroots, an organisation that helps people who are researching their local ancestors have a record that Hardfield Mill was on Kings Parade, but can anybody add further details. Email Denise at Denlen29@aol.com or drop me a line.

Recent Memories articles have brought me letters from a number of people including Miriam Brown of Cherry Hinton who tells me that she and her husband Alfred were members of the Cambridge Dancers Club and attended all their Saturday dances. They went to Milton Road School to practice their routines for the Cambridge Formation Team dance at the Guildhall. All the girls wore Cambridge blue net dresses while the men sported black suits with tails. They had competitions against teams from Romford and Baldock which were judged by the Star Ballroom Champions from London. Amongst the couples was John, the younger brother of Richard and David Attenborough who often appear on television.

Meldreth Local History Group will be reviving memories at an Open Day in Meldreth Village Hall on Sunday 16 November from 11.00 am to 4.00 pm. Visitors will be able to discover the history of the village through its people, with displays focusing on a particular individual or family, the events they were involved in and the places where they lived and worked. Cambridgeshire Family History Society will be represented and there will be A "Can You Help?" board with requests from people who are researching their own family histories. In addition, there will be a slideshow, maps of the village and aerial photographs. Entrance is free and refreshments will be available.

Memories 10 November 2008, by Mike Petty

Tony Brotchie from Cambridge has lent me a photograph which is especially relevant at this time of year. It shows a very unusual view of the Memorial at the end of Station Road, Cambridge on the day it was unveiled.

The story of the memorial is itself unusual.

At the end of the Great War Cambridge decided to erect a War Memorial and a collection of £6,000 was made for the Nurses' Home at Addenbrooke's Hospital. Then in September 1920 a meeting of the Cambridgeshire Joint War Memorial Committee agreed the erection of a statue at the corner of Station Road. A Canadian sculptor, Tait McKenzie was commissioned, and he modelled the figure of a private soldier, in full kit, striding along bareheaded, helmet in hand, a German helmet as a trophy strung on his back and partly concealed by a laurel wreath, carelessly flung over the rifle barrel. In his hand he holds a rose, another rose thrown to him has fallen to the ground. His head, based on that of a Christ's college undergraduate, Kenneth Hamilton, is turned to the side, his expression alert and happy and his lips slightly parted as if he has recognised an old friend in the crowd. As he glances over his shoulder he looks down Station Road from which he left for the war. But now he is at peace, for the statue is of The Homecoming.

The day for its unveiling was set for July 3rd 1922. The Duke of York, who was in Cambridge to open the Royal Show at Trumpington, would perform the ceremony. The plinth was erected, the crowds anticipated. Everything was ready. Almost.

Meanwhile the sculptor was feverishly trying to get the design just as he wanted it. In his studios at the University of Pennsylvania he was working constantly, inviting artist friends to comment and criticise. At last he was ready. The mould for the statue was complete, it just need to be shipped to England. But the boat was delayed and the bronze could not be cast in time for delivery.

With the day booked, the Duke booked and the plinth erected the Committee was faced with a dilemma. They could not unveil a statue that was not there – or could they. They decided on a subterfuge. A plaster cast of the statue was erected and painted to look like bronze. Then they prayed that it would not rain – for that might streak the paint - and that the wind would not blow and the covering canvas rub out essential details. But being Cambridge it rained and blew. However nobody noticed and in the presence of thousands of people The Homecoming was unveiled.

Then ten days later a lorry drew up at four o'clock in the morning. Mr Kett and ten men were waiting and within four hours the copy had been taken down and the proper figure erected. But they were not identical, for the sculptor had made slight changes once he'd seen the figure in place. As far as I know nobody took a picture of the switch-over and the fact that it happened would have been forgotten except for the vigilance of a News reporter who turned out early to describe the action.

Other memorials have been erected over the years, including a roll of honour in memory of the citizens of Cambridge who lost their lives during the Second World War which was unveiled in the Guildhall in November 1955. It is written on two skins of vellum with raised gold lettering and also commemorates the Women's Forces and all the civilian casualties. It was executed by Miss G. Horsley, a designer at the Technical College and School and is a poignant reminder of how modern wars have involved the very homes of the people. The first name is a woman's and the names of children killed in one of the air raids also appear.

For years the 'Homecoming' has witnessed acts of Remembrance, though as the years have passed so the old soldiers of the First and Second World Wars have faded away and new generations have taken their place. Now given current conflicts its importance is enhanced as a place where people can gather to remember, even if the memorial's own story is largely forgotten.

At eleven o'clock last Tuesday, Armistice Day, the pupils and staff of St Paul's School, Coronation Street, Cambridge, observed a two minute silence in memory of other generations who had discovered that their life would not be one of peace. Just 100 years earlier in 1908 other youngsters had been snapped in Castle Street. The picture of boys and girls parading with wooden swords was captioned "Their country's future defenders". Indeed some were just the right age to be just that when the world descended into the horror of the First World War.

However other youngsters have been prepared to fight to prevent war. Their story has been largely untold. Almost as soon as the 'Homecoming' statue was erected at the end of Station Road, people started agitating against further conflicts.

In 1922 there was a "No more war" demonstration on Parker's Piece with banners such as "For Peace and Freedom", "Cambridge Sisterhood says No More War" and scores of bannerettes bearing the words "No More War". They kept the memory of the dead alive but did they remember the maimed, the blind, shell-shocked and the mad? No one was worrying about those men, speakers complained.

Next year there was another anti-war demonstration on the Piece which by July 1930 had become an annual event organised by the Cambridge Peace Council.

But protests did not bring peace: next month air exercises saw squadrons of fighting planes engage in bitter mock combat and in March 1932 the chatter of Lewis guns and the rattle of rifle fire echoed almost continuously over the countryside around the peaceful villages of Bottisham and Quoy for almost four hours as members of the Perse, Leys and County School Officers' Training Corps took part in a field day.

Anti-war activity was restrengthened in 1933 when a band of sixty undergraduates from the Students' Anti-War Council marched through Cambridge carrying placards reading 'We want Peace' & 'Scholarships, not Battleships'.

However it was the Senior Service that prompted one of the greatest battles. In November 1933 the film 'Our Fighting Navy' was playing at the Tivoli Cinema on Chesterton Road when fifty Anti-War students decided to make a protest. However a rival party, numbering between 700 and a thousand undergraduates, also marched to the cinema with two bands playing war-time songs and carrying Union Jacks.

Some tried to push their way into the Tivoli whilst those inside struggled to hold them out. Several pieces of glass in the doors were broken and the girls inside the paybox feared for their safety as fireworks and stink bombs were thrown and cries of 'Down with Hitler' and 'Hail Hitler' were heard above the general uproar. Four policemen with drawn truncheons managed to keep the crowd at bay whilst a dozen more raced to the scene in motor vehicles and the University Proctor took several names. It took an hour before the streets were cleared and peace restored.

Then on Armistice Day 1933 itself battles broke out once more when Anti-War demonstrators tried to lay a wreath at the War Memorial. They assembled on Parker's Piece where speakers were heckled before their procession set off, escorted by police in uniform and plain clothes. They had to draw their truncheons to repel a charge of opposing undergraduates who managed to seize one of the poles of the 'Workers by Hand and Brain Unite Against the War' banner.

Outside Peterhouse the attack was resumed with tomatoes, eggs and flour thrown and for ten minutes a pitched hand-to-hand battle was fought with many of the demonstrators knocked to the ground and the standard torn to shreds. It forced them to abandon their planned route and turn down Corn Exchange Street to get to Regent Street. Here a car containing several women pulled up and handfuls of white feathers were flung out which the pacifists picked up and proudly placed in their button holes. There were more rotten eggs before they reached the Memorial where many hundreds of demonstrators had gathered waiting for the laying of a plain laurel wreath. It was to have carried an inscription In Memory of all Victims of a War They did not Cause, but this was removed on police advice.

Afterwards the procession made their way back to the town centre, still escorted by police and continually pelted with eggs and fish. At Petty Cury they met 'Hitler' and his supporters and together made their way to the Market Hill where the anti-war demonstration was soon forgotten in the excitement of Poppy Day

The anti-war struggle continued with exhibitions, torch-light processions and demonstrations. But as history shows, they were ultimately unsuccessful and in 1939 battle was joined all over again when young men who had trained for war were once more called upon to lead the fight for freedom.

Taxis have been part of the Cambridge scene for just 100 years this month.

It was in March 1908 that Cambridge Watch Committee inspected a motorcab, described as a luxurious vehicle of the brougham class built. It was one of twenty which a London firm, the Provincial Motor Car Company, wanted to place for hire upon the Cambridge streets at fares of one shilling for the first mile and threepence for each quarter mile afterwards.

But the men who ran the existing horse-drawn cabs petitioned them. When the undergraduates came up and went down it made work for 100 vehicles carrying their mountain of luggage between station and college, but for the most of the year their living was a very precarious one. Ellis Merry said that for weeks the cabmen did not average two fares a day and many were on duty 18 hours a day to get a living. "Most of us are married men with large families and it is as much as we can do to make ends meet as it is. It would mean semi-starvation for some families and ruination for the rest. Some have put all our savings into buying a horse and cab of our own" magistrates were told.

Their concerns were backed by some councillors: There were 120 hansom cabmen, probably married and with families, who owned the cabs they drove and had spent money on renovating them. But in all there were 500 people who were getting a livelihood out of the cabs including those supplying harness and fodder for the horses. Motor cabs were unnecessary, would be a constant source of street accidents and add to the congestion on already-crowded roads, they contended.

But Magistrates were in a dilemma: although they could refuse to licence them plying for hire or using the cab ranks they had no power to prevent people coming to Cambridge and running motor taxi-cabs. Anybody could get a garage, be on the telephone and receive orders to drive passengers in their taxis, just as the hansom cab proprietors did.

If taxis were to come it was better that they be licensed. They could then restrict the number of people the vehicles might be allowed to carry; although constructed for five passengers, four inside and one outside sitting beside the driver, this was not a good idea in Cambridge – it might be dangerous for undergraduates!

Anyway motor taxis would not compete with the horse cabs. They would create a new, long-distance trade since ordinary street traffic would not pay them and if anybody ever saw a motor taxi plying for hire at the railway station it would be proof that the business was not satisfactory.

The motor company also offered to employ existing cabmen and train them to drive the new machines free of charge. One of the first drivers was Sidney Wisbey, another was Jack Wallman whose family is still part of the Cambridge taxi scene.

But it was a driver named Darby who became involved in perhaps the first accident to befall a motor taxi when in November 1908 he misjudged the distance he needed when manoeuvring in Peas Hill. The lamp of his taxi caught the awning connecting a couple of stalls and there was a general upset. The stall of Mr Reynolds was practically demolished and the sweets strewn about with the result that a number of boys had a scramble and pocketed as much as they could.

No one could deny that the new machines were somewhat quicker than their horse-pulled competition and William Cooking, Manager of the Taxi-meter Cab Company was summonsed for driving at the dangerous speed of 23 miles an hour in Trumpington. He could have been fined £20 and have had his licence suspended but magistrates only fined him £3. It was a warning that they were determined to put down fast driving through the villages.

The hansom men hit back; they started to work on Sundays, something not done before and improved their vehicles by adding rubber tyres. They even changed their image by wearing Top Hats. But their days were numbered. By 1932 the hansom cabs had long disappeared, though there were still a couple of four-wheelers to be seen on the stands, one driven by George Jolley and the other by Arthur Carter. George had been driving for 40 years but said things were not what they had been. Cabbies used to assist undergraduates who were locked out of their college by backing the hansom against the wall to allow the belated reveller to climb over and slip in unobserved, something the motors would not do.

Another mystery Memories photograph has been identified.

Margaret Stephen of Cambridge recognised an unknown war memorial as being that of St Philips Church on Mill Road which used to have a memorial garden before the railings were taken down. She also identified one of the women as being her late grandmother, Mrs Ethel Hunt who used to live in Cromwell Road.

Ethel is the small lady in the middle of the group at the back of the photograph and was paying tribute to the memory of her husband William James Hunt who was killed on the Somme on 13th November 1916, aged 31. Ethel lived till she was 91, dying in 1976. She never remarried and brought up her family of six children single handed, earning her living as a dressmaker and tailoress in Fitzroy Street.

There is another point of interest: William’s father was Thomas Bidwell Hunt, one of the finest of Cambridge photographers who traded for some 50 years from the mid 1870s to the 1920s from premises in Fitzroy Street and St Edward's Passage. His trade card proclaimed him a "portrait, landscape and architectural photographer" and negatives in the Cambridgeshire Collection confirm each of these specialities.

The portraits are of unidentified academics & women, of children dressed as Jack & Jill and a sailor from HMS Indomitable; the landscapes include Coe Fen, the Plough Tea Gardens at Fen Ditton, Christ Church on Newmarket Road and a view to Garret Hostel Bridge taken after a heavy frost has coated the trees and grass.

Most of the large glass negatives are of the traditional college scenes such as Trinity, Clare and Queens', though the women's college at Newnham features extensively. But Hunt also sought out the unusual viewpoint, carrying his heavy camera into elevated positions to capture views across town from the Chapel of St John's college or views of Kings Parade over the spires of the college screen.

His pictures show that some college buildings remain largely unchanged for centuries; but the life within them varies from generation to generation. Last week two American teachers were invited to Trinity College for the launch of a book written by another American. They were impressed with the atmosphere of the college on a dark, rainy evening, with the lights shining out from the windows of students' rooms. On arrival they glanced into the great Dining Hall as it lay quiet and empty and, on departure, saw it fulfilling its role as a place where students took their evening meal – very different to that of their own colleges back in the States.

Imagine then how Charles Bristed felt when he arrived at Trinity in 1840 at the start of what was to be a five year stay. He was introduced to his room and to the men and women who were employed to make his stay. He noted:

The Freshman is first inducted into his rooms by a gyp, usually recommended to him by his tutor. The gyp is a college servant, who attends upon a number of students, sometimes as many as twenty, calls them in the morning, brushes their clothes, waits at their parties, and so on.

The new-comer generally finds his apartment ready prepared for him, it being the custom for him to take the former tenant's furniture at a valuation by the college upholsterer, and make such subsequent additions to, or alterations in it, as his convenience requires or his fancy suggests. The appearance of a student's apartment, though by no means splendid, is decidedly comfortable; it is well cushioned and sofaed, with a proper proportion of armchairs, and a general air of respectability - much better on the whole than our [American] students' rooms ever are.

But the new occupant finds one deficiency. All the glass, china, and crockery of the man going out become the bed-maker's property; accordingly our Freshman's first business is to provide himself, usually under the gyp's guidance, with a tea-set, and other like necessities, among which decanters and wine-glasses figure conspicuously. An American student is somewhat surprised at having these articles recommended to him, as it were, by the college authorities. This is only the beginning of what he has to learn.

Charles indeed had a lot to learn and used his experiences to produce "An American in Victorian Cambridge" which has long been out of print and largely forgotten. But now it has been reissued with an introduction by Christopher Stray and illustrations by another Victorian student, John Lewis Roget, son of the man who published the famous Thesaurus. (Exeter University Press, ISBN 978 0 85989 825 6, £16.99)

Another lad recalling his schooldays is Rupert Gandy from Watlington in Oxfordshire has written to me following Peggy Chaffe's reminiscences of Barway. He was born in Soham in August 1917 and moved to Barway when a lad of five. He was one of those taught by Peggy's mother and his name is amongst those listed in the two-volume history of the school that Peggy has just compiled. Rupert has just celebrated his own personal history: He left Barway in January 1938 moved to Buckinghamshire. Next month he met a young lady named, Renee. They married on 26th November that year and have just celebrated their 70th wedding anniversary.

I met Leslie Stock after I'd given a talk to the Haverhill University of the Third Age; he told me that he'd been setting down his memories of his early life at Linton and I asked for the opportunity to share them.

Leslie's life changed when his father was killed in the war. He writes: "Some years later, to lift her depression, mum was taken to the dances at the American air base a few miles away. She made some new friends among the other ladies who went to the dances. One of the girls came and lodged with us; she was going steady with an airman from the base called Placedo Gamboa, a Mexican Indian from El Paso on the Rio Grande. Placedo's mates came round and liked to play chequers and dominoes.

"We got a black dog, which was half Chow with a black tongue and curly tail. He was a friendly animal who used to go up to the base, with Placedo. He was always home without fail to meet us off the school bus until one day he went missing. This was at the time that the War had ended and the yanks were going home. We learnt later that all the dogs on the base were rounded up and shot. So that was the end of our dog.

"On the day that victory in Europe was announced, the Americans went loopy, and were driving through Linton in jeeps firing off Very Lights (Flares) one of which got caught in the thatch of a barn opposite the Green Hill pub. Volunteers led the horses to safety and American Fire Fighters put out the blaze, which was quite spectacular.

Not much war damage was done in Linton but a boy's mind remembers the small details: a row of bucket of toilets at the back of the Crown pub were blown up scattering excrement everywhere. Mr George a veteran of the First World War who kept a shop next door was woken up violently by the bang. He put his artificial leg on, struck a match and found that his staircase was blown away by the blast and that his bedroom was just hanging there by a thread. His family were rescued but it was a long time before proper repairs were carried out.

Things at Leslie's home were grim and cold: "I had a washstand in my room at home. The face flannel was frozen stiff overnight in winter and you could scrape the ice off the windows. Washing in the morning was a hurried affair. In 1954 we got a council house this was a step up; it was an old house with an outside flush toilet so we still kept pots under the beds. We waited another eight years for a bathroom"

Leslie left school at the age of 15 in 1959 and worked as a welder for most of his life before starting his own window cleaning, business that he ran for 20 years. He has set down his memories for his children and grandchildren. If you have done the same, please share them with me at the News. And do you have memories of Americans in your village

Then whilst at Huntingdon Methodist Men's Club I met David Bushby from Godmanchester who'd discovered two old film strips. Holding them up to the light it was obvious they contained some interesting pictures which seem to have been taken in about 1968. Several are instantly recognisable; others show just how much Cambridge has changed over the last 40 years. See what you can remember or identify

Tick Fen, Warboys, is not an area where many people linger, but Wharms Tinkler knew it very well. His father, Tom, was one of the original tenants when Huntingdonshire County Council bought land in 1913 to rent out as smallholdings. They built seven new houses at a cost of £280 each and converted John Rowell's old farmhouse into two cottages.

Wharms attended the Fen School, two miles away along Puddick Drove but left as soon as he could to start work full time on the land. When his father died in 1934 Wharms took over his tenancy, together with additional land. He then started to keep a diary. His entries were brief, almost entirely concerned with his farming activities. He recorded the work he was doing, the crops he was selling and the names of the people and businesses with whom he was dealing. He continued keeping diaries most years until 1970, proving a unique record of farming life in the fens around Huntingdon.

Many of the terms and descriptions relating to farming as it was carried on seventy or more years ago that were used by Wharms are now unfamiliar.

From Monday to Friday work on the land started at seven o'clock in the morning and finished at half-past-three in the afternoon. A break for 'dockey' was taken in the field from ten-thirty till eleven with a ten minute drink at 'oneses' and dinner, the main meal of the day, at four o'clock. On Saturday hours were from seven till one

However while Wharms kept horses his day began when they were fed at 5.30. Then there were pigs and poultry to feed, goats to be milked and either fed or staked on the roadside verges to graze during the day. After that the horses were brushed down and only then did Wharms take his breakfast. At the end of the normal working hours the horses had to be stabled, fed and brushed down. Pigs and poultry were fed, goats milked, water fetched for the animals, mangolds were cleaned, fresh straw spread in stables and pigsties. All in all, a working day was twelve hours. Provided there was nothing extra to be done while there was still daylight. But at least Sunday was a day of rest – unless crops had to be harvested before they spoiled.

Of course there were holidays – Wharms took every Christmas Day and Boxing Day off, with occasionally Easter too.

In 1950 Wharms acquired his first tractor, a second-hand Fordson which was old and obsolete. He bought his last, a new Massey Ferguson 35 in April 1963. Most tractors ran on paraffin but had to be started on petrol. Wharms serviced them himself, only occasionally calling out a mechanic when repairs were needed

He grew potatoes, sugar beet and wheat on a three-year rotation with some barley and occasionally carrots, red beet or onions. But it was the potatoes – Doon Star, Dunbar Rover, King Edwards and Majestic amongst the varieties - which brought the most profit. And all of this he jotted down in his diaries together with the variety of work he was undertaken at the various seasons of the year – rolling beet, spraying beet, horse hoeing mangolds

None of this is earth-shattering but little of this has been recorded in such detail before. Now his son, Richard, has transcribed the diaries and added detailed explanatory notes to provide a record of a way of life where small farmers worked closely together. A community whose economic and social life revolved around the land and the associations they had with each other.

Richard has published just 100 copies of the diaries which can be obtained direct from him for £25 including postage. They will soon disappear, as will the way of life Wharms describes. Contact Richard Tinkler on 01487 842434 to reserve your copy.

One of the changes in agriculture was the making up of the muddy droves with sand and gravel. One of the suppliers was Wisbey's pits at Hauxton – and this it transpires was the mystery picture I featured in last weeks Memories

John Mallows from Cambridge visited regularly as a lad and remembers the rough sand being tipped onto the conveyor belt that took it to the hoppers where it was washed and graded before being used for building purposes or sold to farmers or smallholders He knew the lorry drivers and would join them in their hut for a lunch of bread and cheese.

The drivers were John Childerston, Harold Bushell and Ken Moss, recalls Will Garfit who knows the site better than anybody. For he bought it in 1969 and has transformed it into a private nature reserve, winning an award for his approach to shooting and conservation and describing it in his book "Will's Shoot". He points out that the old tree in the background to the photograph was home to a large colony of bats. The view is now obscured by houses that were built along the edge of the site opposite the church.

If you scan the television schedules looking in vain for something to watch over Christmas then you must hope that Father Christmas will leave some DVDs in your stocking

Recently the East Anglian Film Archive has been releasing some of their material on a series of discs, the latest of which is a two-volume compilation entitled 'Memories of Cambridgeshire and the Fens'. It features a variety of films edited together with added sound effects and a modern commentary which is sometimes less than accurate – see just how many errors you can spot! All in all it is more entertaining than many of the festive offerings

The films are a joy. They feature some of the familiar Cambridge's central streets when they were open to motor vehicles; one made in 1951 depicts traffic problems: pollution, jams and policemen on point duty controlling cyclists and undergraduates in sedate open sports cars.

But the worst motoring offender – if one film is to be believed – is an employee of the County Council. He backs his car out into Gilbert Road, narrowly missing his neighbour, then speeds through the streets, ignoring traffic lights and no-waiting restrictions as he makes his way – via a somewhat circuitous route – to his office at Shire Hall. This is an excerpt from a remarkable road safety film entitled 'Wise or Otherwise' which has been issued before in an uncut version.

University life is depicted with views of an Honorary Degree procession, Sir Winston at Churchill, Madrigals on the Cam, rowing and Rag Days. But there are also films of schools with activity at St Faith's shown in some detail as is the opening of Sawston village college.

Films of the fens give an excellent glimpse of the agriculture of the time – hay cart, sugar beet, mud, with a tug-driver's perspective of the problems of drainage. Inevitably floods feature with interesting views of Mepal and Littleport, though again there is a tendency for one flood to be mixed up with another in the editing process.

It is on safer ground when the films themselves have commentaries; they include a propaganda film for Papworth Village Settlement and another made by Pye that shows something of the production methods of the 1960s. Transport buffs will enjoy a colour journey along the Cambridge to Mildenhall railway line, a glimpse of the work of a Canberra squadron and an air show at Mildenhall

And if you can't manage to have a peaceful Christmas without a war film, then there are remarkable scenes of lightweight tanks speeding through a Cambridgeshire village in the lead-up to the Second World War and of troops attempting to dig trenches in a farmer's field during the 1912 army manoeuvres around Linton.

Today sees the funeral of Mark Harris, described as "the city's Mr Fashion". With his wife he started 'Vogue' in St Andrew's Street in 1934, just a few doors from 'Modiste' run by his father. They built up a high-class trade and in 1953 sold a dress to be worn in Westminster Abbey on Coronation Day; it was of pure silk, priced 65 guineas. "We are absolutely thrilled, it is a great honour", Mr Harris told the CDN, adding that they had also sold three evening gowns to be worn at Coronation balls in London connected with the Court. White was proving to be the most popular choice that year for May Ball dresses; the off-the-shoulder style was in demand and the average price was 15 guineas. By 1983 prices for a post frock could reach £500.

It was on December 19th 1983 – just 25 years ago – that the News reported that Vogue, the top fashion house in East Anglia, was to close. However for them a closing-down sale did not mean a wild scrimmage as customers fought over coats and dresses. Instead a locked door kept the bargain-hunters out on the pavement while staff dealt with two or three clients at a time.

The story was illustrated by photograph of fashionable customers queuing up for a bargain. Were you one of the customers, and what do you remember of “Mr Fashion”

The East Anglian Film Archive DVDs cost £9.99 each from HMV and other selected retailers across Cambridgeshire or online at www.archivefilmshop.co.uk.

Readers have been quick to paint another side of life around the Occupation Road area of Cambridge.

Cherry Ford lived in Lower York Street (Dobblers Hole) and she and her sister went to St Matthews School where the headmaster was Mr Smith. She has many fond memories of playing on the ‘piece’ and the swings, which were on a tarmac area on the corner of Abbey Street and New Street, where they also had a large bonfire on November 5th. On the other corner was Rolphs the grocers and just around the corner, in Occupation Road was Darlers who sold sweets which they wrapped in cones made from blue sugar paper. Further along on New Street was Lucas’ shop – the building is still there, painted blue. The Reynolds family had their sweet ‘factory’ on the corner of Abbey Street and Newmarket Road. Cherry concludes: “Happy days in what was, as you said, quite a grim area!”

Mrs Jack Clements lived in Blossom Street, off Norfolk Street and remembers the nearby slaughter house, together with the Pelican pub on the corner of Nelson Street. Then there was Gold Street where her aunt and uncle had a bakery, Tebbutts. On Good Friday they used to deliver hot cross buns, direct from the oven. Not far away was the White Ribbon Hostel, run by the Salvation Army for homeless men. Her parents hired the boys club hall in Nelson Street for their wedding reception in 1926. “Occupation Road may not have been very special, but it wasn’t all that bad when I was young”, she concludes.

Charles Hall, assistant churchwarden from St Andrew the Less, writes to point out that the fuss about the name change of the Abbey Stadium is misplaced. There never was a Barnwell Abbey – it was a Priory. So perhaps we should agitate for a major change in the map of Cambridge – renaming Abbey Ward to Priory Ward, Abbey Estate to Priory Estate and so on. But that would mean there'd be two Priory Roads and taxi drivers would never find the Priory Street off Huntingdon Road. There was a similar situation in the 1930s when the Cambridge boundaries expanded to take in Chesterton. Ted Mott was a local photographer, producing postcards and saw an opportunity to increase his sales. So, he reasoned, if Chesterton was now Cambridge, then Chesterton High Street must be Cambridge High Street ...

Last week I spoke following a meeting of the Ickleton Village Society which was agonising over the latest issue to concern the village: the prospect of a new town at Henley Grange. Glancing back through my files I notice that in September 1976 the community had other issues on its mind: complaints that pigs and cows have been straying through their streets, gardens and even houses. The pigs have been walking through the streets holding up the traffic, pigs and calves have been eating vegetables in gardens and one woman even had a pig in her dining room. One mother says she saw a pig rooting around her two-month-old baby, asleep in his pram in the garden. The man who owns the animals, a chartered accountant, said he had not kept pigs before he moved to the village: "It would have been more sensible to come and tell me personally. I'm usually here at the weekend".

So with other visits in prospect I wondered what would be concerning them – if history is any guide.

In April 1955 A Gamlingay councillor was complaining about a horde of caravanners who had been told that their site should be hidden from the road - so they put up ten feet of zinc which made it even more hideous. He referred to a bungalow they had built with their own labour which he called 'a monstrosity'. 'If we allow two more places like this then Gamlingay will not be worth living in', he complained..

In November 1929 the inhabitants of Houghton were up in arms because the postal authorities have removed their sub-post office, which has been there for more than a century, to the neighbouring village of Wyton. The Houghton office was run by the widow of an ex-servicemen who had lost her breadwinner in the service of his country. It should be returned and telephone facilities installed, they demanded.

But in April 1898 the News reported how William Facer, a shepherd of Houghton, had attended St Ives market. Next day he discovered he had lost two £5 notes. He enquired at different places if the precious bits of paper had been seen. Among the places visited was Mr Hewson's, the pork butcher in Merryland. On Tuesday a boy swept out the shop. He picked up the bits of paper about the floor, and was about to light the fire with them, when his attention was attracted to two pieces by their crispness. He smoothed out the crumpled bits of paper and lo! they were two £5 notes. The note must have lain on the floor a while scores of people went in and out and did not see them. Facer may thank his stars the notes were found by good honest folk, and also that they were not burnt without being noticed

Joyce Svensson from Fulbourn seeks help in identifying a very old picture of what is captioned as the Arts and Crafts School, Cambridge (Science Room) in 1928. All she knows is that the late Jack Svensson from Barrington is the lad, second from the right in the front row. But who are the others, she wonders.

The School of Arts and Crafts was an early stage in the development of one of Cambridge's oldest educational establishments, now known as Anglia Ruskin University. So I sought the assistance of Tony Kirby, whose new history of that University has just been launched to mark their 150th anniversary.

Tony can add more details about the college in those days:

“It took children at 14, mainly (70%) from the county - offering one of the few forms of secondary education available to these (to age 16) before the Village College system got off the ground. They came in by train or (increasingly) by bus.

“The photograph almost certainly shows 'Day Trade School' students. These were the first full-timers. The School was started by Arthur Bryant (Principal 1923-25) for unemployed youths, but was put on a firmer basis by Dorothy Enright, who succeeded him as Principal (1925-32).”

According to an article I spotted in the Cambridge Daily News of March 1931 Miss Enright came to Cambridge in 1924 to help in the reorganisation of the School of Arts, Crafts and Technology and became the first woman to be elevated to be head of a technical school in the UK. At that time there were odd classes for unemployed boys and girls with 54 students but by 1930 the number in the Day Trade School had grown to 151. Dorothy had a special interest in training women in domestic science, needlework, cookery and simple home hygiene. Rooms were equipped with all the latest gadgets but few girls show much interest in so essential an art, the paper lamented.

However all the pressure did not worry her: “not only is she still young as far as years are concerned, but she is young in outlook, of high good humour and most pleasant to look upon” the reporter commented, obviously smitten.

Tony Kirby continues: “Neither I nor our people in Estates can recognise the room, but I suspect that it's in the 1928 extension to what is now the Ruskin (officially opened by the Duchess of Atholl, Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Education, and the first woman member of a Tory government) on 17 December 1928.

“I also suspect that it's a specially-posed photo. The Day Trade School offered classes for boys in Printing, Engineering, Woodwork and Tailoring, for girls in 'Artistic Trades', Dressmaking, Office Work and Cookery. No mention of Science per se in the Prospectuses I've seen - although as 'general education' was part of the syllabus, they may have had some basic science. The lab would almost certainly be more heavily-used by the "Apprentices' Classes" - put on for local employers. What appear to be heavy-duty voltmeters (or similar) in the background would support this.”

The 1931 News article concludes by commenting: “the Cambridge School of Arts, Crafts and Technology is regarded as being not only one of the most progressive technical institutes under civic control in Great Britain, but also one of the most successful”. Which seems very similar to the sentiment expressed by the present Chancellor, Lord Ashcroft, when addressing Anglia 'Honoraries', (of which I am proud to be one), at a recent dinner in the House of Lords.

I have other pictures to tease:

One shows Class EIIb – engineers - in 1944 when it was the Cambridgeshire Technical College and School of Art.

The names are –back row: Parker, Simkins, Mr Holmes, Mr Purvis, Twigg and Simpson centre row: Parish, Gardiner, Frank Stubbings, Rex Stubbings front row: Dale, Rodwell, Stockbridge and Walker

But who are the young ladies and gents in the Business Class, taken between 1947 and 1949

Did you attend similar classes, or do you have a similar picture in your own family archives.

Its just 125 years since Cambridgeshire Football Association was formed at a meeting at Trinity College on January 4th 1884.

It was launched with a trial game on Parker's Piece between two teams selected from the Old Perseans, Modern Perseans and Cassandra football teams on the one side and the Granta, Rovers, Printers and Albert on the other. Other clubs soon affiliated, including Newmarket, Linton, Sawston Swifts and the Cam. An idea of the conditions of the period can be glimpsed in a sketch published in The Graphic in 1887. (The sketch shows Queen Anne Terrace in the background which was demolished for the present carpark – do you remember it?)

In those days the game was controlled by two umpires, one in each half of the field. When an infringement occurred the umpire in that half of the field stopped the game by waving his flag. Should the umpires disagree the matter was 'referred' to the referee who sat outside the field of play.

In 1891 the system was changed by bringing the 'referee' on to the pitch to take sole control of the game and the umpires became 'linesmen', still keeping their flags. Two years later the Association required the referees to pass a board of examiners when they received a special badge and cap.

Referees experienced various problems. In April 1930 Referee L. Sylvester complained of the conduct of the Littleport Football Club after they'd played Wisbech Town. He said they followed him to the dressing-room calling him 'everything under the sun' and threw pieces of mangold wurzel at him. But the Club Secretary complained that the ref incompetent and his decisions bordered on the ridiculous.

Spectators too could be troublesome: that same month in 1930 sensational scenes were witnessed when Cambridge Town met Ipswich in a vital football match at Milton Road. The crowd, numbering over 7,300, were annoyed by some disputable rulings by the referee and at the final whistle they surged on to the field and surrounded him. The situation looked very ugly until Cambridge players and police with drawn truncheons went to his assistance. They got him to the pavilion where the crowd tried to storm the building. But for the quick work of many police both uniformed and plain clothed, players and officials, the referee might have been very roughly handled, the News reported.

In January 1984 controversy surrounded the result of a game on Parker's Piece. It was either a 13-all draw or 13-14 to the Ditton Players who were playing their rivals, the Ditton Irregulars. Both teams were in Edwardian dress as they recreated a game of 'foot-the-ball' originally played between Oxford and Cambridge students in December 1946. The match was quite like football except that it had three balls and 15 players to a side. The 1946 players had been well-behaved, although one had been penalised for forgetting to remove his top hat before heading the ball.

These days we are used to the jet-setting lifestyle of some players. But in December 1929 F.A. Ridgeon, the Cambridge Town Football Club's inside left hit the headlines when he travelled by aeroplane to Sussex for the F.A. Amateur Cup tie with Southwick. There had been some doubt whether he could make the match owing to duties in Stamford preventing him from travelling by train. Hearing of his difficulty Mr D.G. Marshall of Aviation Hall generously placed his Moth aeroplane at his disposal. His son, Arthur Marshall, would have piloted the machine but he had gone on an air trip to Austria so a de Havilland pilot was engaged for the journey. This was probably the first time an amateur footballer had travelled to a match by air and it was worth the effort, for Cambridge won 2-0

Do you have interesting refereeing tales – write to Mike Petty at the News

Readers have been quick to identify more Memories mystery pictures

Ian Garner emailed to say the man ploughing with horses (Memories 29th December) was his late father, Stanley Garner, who worked the family farm at Willingham with his brother for most of his life. He ploughed with horses regularly at both Willingham and Cottenham annual ploughing matches. Stanley loved Percheron horses and continued to breed them for showing at major farming shows even after the tractor had taken over, Ian tells me

Pictures of students at what is now Anglia Ruskin University have sparked more memories.

Julia Hardy identified the young lady seated third from the left in the Cambridge Technical College commerce class as being her husband's late sister Joan Hardy, who sadly died in 1968. The girl sitting to the right of Joan is Daphne Cook. Joan and Daphne were very good friends during the time they were at the college in about 1948.

Keith Westley from Sawston tells me he was very nearly in the picture of the trainee engineers - he was in the next year's intake. The photo was taken by Miss Lessey with her Brownie camera. Gerald Doubleday from the Arbury has one of those long, long pictures that show large numbers of faces; his shows six rows of pupils and staff and was taken in 1947.

In January 1909 thousands of elderly people suddenly found that life had got easier with the start of the new Old Age Pensions. It was the first step in the development of the modern benefits and welfare system by Asquith's Liberal government.

Now for the first time in history, veterans of toil claimed from the country the wherewithal to end their days in comparative comfort, free from the haunting dread of having to enter the 'House', as the contemporary PR people put it

The full pension was five shillings for a single man or woman and seven and six for a married man, (worth £19.30 and £29 in today's money). It was kept deliberately quite low in order to encourage as many as possible to make their own savings arrangements to top it up.

It was also means tested. Pensions Officers visited people's houses to check how much money and what possessions they had - including the kitchen sink. Many of the elderly were to be disappointed, the CDN complained, due to the stupid and unfair interpretation of the rules by the Local Government Board on what constituted income.

People had to prove they were of 'good character' before they received a penny; they were ruled out of a pension if they had refused work when able, made themselves poor in order to qualify, had been imprisoned or were habitually inebriated.

They also had to be over 70 to qualify. This proved difficult to prove as one bedridden old 84-year-old Cambridge lady discovered when the officials asked her when she was born. She didn't know, as both her mother and father were dead. She was an orphan, she tearfully explained.

As the formalities proceeded so the Post Office clerks prepared for their new duties. The pension book covers had been printed in different colours to reflect the amount to be paid: those entitled to five shillings had blue-covered books, 4/- were cream, 3/- drab, it was orange for the two-shilling claimants and terra cotta for those who only received a bob. The money was to be paid out in silver coins and there were worries these would run out.

As the first Pension Day dawned a rush was expected, but it was a raw morning and few of the old folk were astir early. In the main Cambridge post office the clerks with their mass of silver coin ready to hand had a quiet start until eventually the first pensioner arrived at 9.30. He was cordially received and so overcome with his reception that he tottered away leaving his spectacle case on the counter.

But at Mill Road one old gentleman was there clutching his cheque book when the doors opened. Later everywhere numbers built up with several old men, worthy though poor, entering hesitatingly, then taking off their hats and caps with the greatest respect as they waited to receive the payment that was their right – not a charity, it was emphasised. The elderly had to sign for the money which caused an embarrassment as some could not write their names. Kindly officials told them that a cross was a good substitute.

Across the county it was a similar story: Swaffham Bulbeck saw 15 residents receive their allotted five shillings, at Histon the old folk could hardly realise they were getting five shillings in exchange for a piece of paper, at Cottenham nearly 40 people were fortunate enough to receive a pension though sadly two claimants died just days before the payment was due.

In Longstanton John Bell had the distinction of being the first to receive the pension in the village and at Isleham the Vicar gave permission for the church bells to be rung in celebration.

But inevitably things did not always go smoothly. Residents of Haddenham had to leave empty-handed. There were various reasons, one of which was that the list of the applicants had been sent to the Parish Council for their approval.

Once the money was received the pensioners left the post office positively beaming with happiness, clutching the precious five shillings tightly in their hand or carefully bestowing it in a safe pocket. One old lady of past eighty made direct for the nearest butcher's shop for the luxury of a fresh piece of meat. "Poverty was written upon her worn face and corroborated by her rusty, though scrupulously clean frock", the News reporter observed

Not all were satisfied: one gentleman years ago had been a poulterer who regularly took his stand on Market Hill. But he had not married and was now lonely: "I've seen better days, it's a little. It will help", he moaned.

Perhaps those most contented were those who had formerly occupied responsible positions and in their old age been reduced to penury. Yet they had fought with such a will against the indignity of poor law relief that they were now able to claim more than they would have received from the Guardians.

At Stretham it was agreed that the best way of celebrating the advent of Old Age Pensions would be to give a tea to all persons in the village over 70 years of age. This went ahead, though as some got more than others and others none at all, it would have been interesting to have listened in to their conversation!

A recent picture of a long-gone building has prompted several readers to share recollections.

It showed Queen Anne Terrace, a long red-brick building on Gonville Place overlooking Parker's Piece. It had replaced a building whose accommodation was far less pleasant: the former Cambridge Town Gaol which was pulled down in 1878. [PHOTO OF THE OLD GAOL OVERLOOKING PARKER'S PIECE]

In 1963 it was visited by Erica Dimock as part of her 'Down Your Street' articles in the CDN

At that time nos 1-6 Queen Anne Terrace was home to the University Correspondence College, better known as Burlington House. This had been founded in 1887 to provide a complete University education by postal tuition and had expanded to cover a wide field of educational activity. The majority of its students were taking courses to improve their career prospects with expert tuition supervised by tutors of high academic ability, Erica noted.

Valerie Beavis (nee Stokes) from Little Shelford remembers it. She writes:

“On leaving school at Easter 1959, I worked for the next two and a half years as a Junior Clerk at the University Correspondence College in Queen Anne Terrace. The stairs were narrow and steep and the rooms small in comparison with the open plan buildings of today. The only heating in each room was a little gas fire. I was in the reception office, dealing with all the post and telephone calls. The exchange was old fashioned, pressing a button, turning a handle on the side to make the telephone ring in the appropriate office. The person who taught me my duties was named Cynthia Howell. The only other names I remember are Nina, Val, Margaret, Miss Johnson Miss Hornsby, Mrs French, Rita Reed, and Daphne a shorthand typist.

Mrs J.M. Jones from Cambridge knew it somewhat earlier. She took a post running the filing department there when she was demobbed in 1946. Everything was committed to paper in those days and she had rooms full of files, she recalls.

Next door was the University Tutorial Press, founded like Burlington House by Dr William Briggs, but by 1963 an entirely separate organisation. Its printing works were at Foxton where it produced a wide variety of textbooks for schools and universities.

Then came the offices of the National Industrial Fuel Efficiency Service which had started at Brooklands Avenue in 1953 before moving to the Terrace four years later. It was set up to investigate the tremendous amount of fuel wasted through faulty plants, poorly insulated buildings or by untrained stokers. They helped bring industrial plants up to high standards of fuel utilisation enabling savings of 15 per cent during 1955-56 – but do you know more of its work? Earlier it had been used by the Ministry of Health – Miss Dorothy Foreman of Cambridge recalls that when she worked for Denton-Smith architects in 1946-47 she had to bicycle there with piles of specifications which had to be rubber-stamped to show they confirmed to the ‘Restriction of Ribbon Development Act’

Completing the occupants of the red-brick Terrace was a nurses’ home comprising 31 bedrooms with a kitchen, sitting rooms and even a television lounge. Mrs Sylvia Heinemann (nee Jacobs) of Cambridge knew it between 1955 and 1958. She was one of about 20 trained nurses working at Addenbrooke's Hospital who lived there together with a few midwives working at the Maternity Hospital. A room at ‘Q.A.T.’ was coveted and there was always a waiting-list of nurses wishing to move there, she recalls.

Helen Sharpe agrees: “It was a lovely old building. Afternoon tea was wheeled into the staff sitting room and it all felt very genteel. When I returned to Cambridge in 1968 I lived there for about 18 months until the building was demolished to make way for the multi storey car park. At that point another nurse and I were transferred to Coton House (flats) on the present hospital site. We asked to share a flat as we were the first and only two people in the building for quite some time. However, because Dorothy was a Sister and I was a Staff Nurse our request was turned down and we each had to live on our own in separate flats and on different floors in the block. Such was the red tape in nursing during the so called Swinging 60's!”

Everybody remembers that at the back of the Terrace there was a secluded walled garden with a tennis court and beyond that the Fenner's Cricket Ground. When the Australians played the University the staff had a ‘station’ on the garden wall where anyone on a coffee break could watch the game.

Queen Anne Terrace was demolished to make way for the present car park, which opened in 1971.

There must be more to be said about Q.A.T. – can you add to its story

Memories Special on Cambridgeshire Technical College students, 26 January 2008, by Mike Petty

A recent Memories article featuring Tony Kirby's recently-published history of the first 150 years of Anglia Ruskin University has prompted various readers to get in touch

Several have put names to faces on the pictures I featured, but Dawn Wilkin writes from Jersey with the comprehensive guide to the youngsters attending a two year Business Training Course from September 1947 to July 1949.

She was amongst them and has been spending the last seven years tracking down each of her fellow students from 60 years ago. Not only does she know who's who but she knows where they lived in 1949, where they are now and also has a summary of their subsequent careers.

One worked as a personnel officer and is now having great success as a bobbin lace maker in Salisbury, another became PA to the headmaster of a Public School before working in the City, a third was Property Secretary at a Stately Home until she retired. Others went on to secretarial careers with banks, solicitors, auditors, schools and nursing while Eveline Thulborn who used to live at the Rose and Crown in Teversham has retired from a golden career in Geneva, Switzerland where she now lives.

Thirteen of them came together for a reunion in Cambridge in March 2003 and they plan another for later this year.

But there are three or four classmates that Dawn has been unable to locate despite placing advertisements in magazines and newspapers and appealing on the radio. Nor does the Ruskin Alumni Association's own records go back all that way

So please, she asks, can anybody supply information on the following:

Dorothy Matthews who was then living in Barton Mills whilst her father was working for the Ministry of Defence (on the left of the main front row)

Michael Dear (middle of the middle row) who in 1949 lived in Roseford Road, Cambridge

Michael Hodge, formerly of Bell Hill, Histon who stood to the right of Mike Dear

Dawn Wilkin would be pleased to hear from you; email dawnwilkin@jerseymail.co.uk or contact me and I'll put you in touch

But amazingly we can already solve one of her mysteries, for a letter from Derek Chapman of Oakington tells me that Michael Dear later had a stall on Cambridge market and died about 20 years ago. Derek also knew Michael Hodge as the three of them attended St John's College Choir School and then moved up to the Tech at the same time.

Michael Taylor from Cottenham has lent me a photo of the Technical College staff v pupils cricket teams taken in the Summer of 1948 [PHOTO OF CRICKETERS]

They are: umpire Sharp, then Mansfield, Russell Brown, Mr Charles Leeson, Mr Newman, Douglas Oliver, Lionel Marsh, Mr Islip, Reggie Hill, Mr Cyril Cornell, Dennis Savill, Peter Cotterell and Michael Taylor.

He sadly cannot remember the name of the attractive scorer, though thinks her first name was Betty.

At that time the college principal was Mr Mumford, the headmaster was Mr Hoffman and Nicholas Johnson was head of the building school. After two years at the Tech five apprenticeship years followed culminating with two years National Service which in Michael's case took him to the Canal Zone and Cyprus. That was, he says, a typical life of the youths of those days.

Memories, 3rd February 2009, by Mike Petty

Newspapers are an important resource in the local historian's armoury. My email inbox recently included a message that read 'Did Hilton Hang?' It came from Neil Storey of North Walsham and relates to an incident out in the fens at Parson Drove in 1861.

There farmer Augustus Hilton and his wife had been to the corn market at Wisbech after which they had got into a squabble when he claimed she'd kept back some of the money. It resulted in him cutting her throat, then going to her father's house where he was found by the police sitting by the fire smoking and drinking brandy and water. He'd admitted the offence, been tried, convicted and sentenced to death.

But Neil could find no actual account of the hanging in The Times newspaper and, finding problems getting to the Cambridgeshire Collection at Milton Road library, was getting desperate as the deadline approached for him to submit the manuscript of his new book.

However just as the modern Cambridge News can be read electronically, so other databases are available to researchers. One of these carries a number of articles which describe the unfortunate man's end on the gallows at the County Gaol on Castle Hill. Crowds of people – male and female – came into town from Chesterton and other villages to witness the event. In the words of one reporter the condemned man "partook of some slight refreshment furnished by Mr Gibson, the governor. When he reached the summit of the scaffold, he had one hurried glance at the thousands assembled round the hill, and then hung down his head as if deeply affected". The cap was placed over his face by the hangman and as the clergyman prayed the bolt was withdrawn and the hapless man ceased to exist in a very brief period.

The paper also furnished the news that the previous execution had been on 13th April 1850 when Elias Lucas and Mary Reader had been hanged for murder. That double execution had been witnessed by between 30 and 40,000 people, "many of whom conducted themselves, as such crowds generally did ten years ago, in the most disorderly manner".

Anyone interested in such activities should read Glenda Goulden's book 'Foul deeds and suspicious deaths in the Fens' (Wharncliffe Books, £12.99 - ISBN 1-8456370-27-6)

One person who spent a lifetime recording Cambridgeshire's past and its traditions was Enid Porter, curator of the Folk Museum for 30 years, who died in January 1984. Amongst her publications was a monumental survey of 'Cambridgeshire Traditions and Folklore'. But now it appears that a supplement may be necessary – if a recent newspaper report can be relied upon.

For 'Evil spirits were driven away when villagers in Stretham held their traditional annual wassail', it read, adding that crowds had gathered at Orchard House, in High Street, with bottles of cider which they poured on the roots of apple trees in a centuries-old tradition accompanied by lots of noise and singing. It was part of a celebration by the locally-based 'Pickled Pig Cider' company to celebrate some recent awards.

Wassailing apple trees is a tradition that is carried on in Somerset. There it involves the blowing of horns as cider is poured on the roots and a wassail cake placed in the branches as an offering to the tree spirits. Then the beating of kettles and firing of guns loaded with powder are used to drive away the witches and ghosts believed to reside in the crown of the apple tree. This is followed by a wassailing song sung to the tree

Wassail, wassail all round the town;
The zider-cup's white and the zider's brown;
Our zider is made vrom good apple trees,
And now my vine vellows we'll drink if you please.

I must admit I never knew that my fellow villagers have also performed such ceremonies for generations. But then I've only been researching Stretham history for the last 60 years. I've consulted village elders and also quizzed the assembled brains who gather at Burwell Day Centre but nobody can recall such happenings occurring in this area..

So has this 'tradition' been going on in Cambridgeshire for generations without anybody noticing? Or is the Pickled Pig telling Porkie Pies?

Queen Anne Terrace was an imposing building on Gonville Place, Cambridge, that was demolished for the building of the present car park which opened in 1970. Since then it has largely been forgotten

But now News readers have recalled something of the various activities that were carried on there. They include a wartime secret, now revealed by Margaret Mason of Cambridge for the first time since she signed the Official Secrets Act.

She writes:

"From 1939 to 1949 Queen Anne Terrace housed the Eastern Regional Headquarters of the Ministry of Health, headed by some very senior civil servants transferred from Whitehall. They dealt with matters of general health services, welfare, social services, building and planning matters, and war emergencies, throughout East Anglia.

“I was among the first women conscripted either to the Forces, Industry or the Civil Services in 1942, and drafted to Cambridge in the Civil Service where I anticipated working somewhere similar to Whitehall.

“It was a surprise to arrive at Queen Anne Terrace. The houses were obviously past their best, creaky, draughty, with inadequate heating and lighting. Conditions were cramped, even the attics were used. There were no connecting doors between the houses and in bad weather we used umbrellas to get from house to house

“I was allocated to the Typing Pool in house no 12, which was said to be haunted by the ghost of a man who died in the prison previously on the site. There were about ten of us in the front room on the first floor. We took letters and reports in shorthand, using pencils and notebooks, and typed on heavy upright old typewriters. We had to learn the jargon of the professions represented in the offices. Usually we worked ordinary office hours, but extended hours in an emergency - as we were so frequently reminded "there's a war on".

“The Regional Office was expected to take over in East Anglia if Whitehall was bombed. If Cambridge also became untenable, a small group had to be ready to move further out into the country and we had to keep an emergency suitcase packed. Fortunately, it was never used. In 1949 the whole establishment moved to Brooklands Avenue.”

Monty Goding knew Queen Anne Terrace in the 1960s; He emails:

“In 1961 I had just graduated from the University of Leeds and my first job was with the National Industrial Fuel Efficiency Service at Queen Anne Terrace. The Manager then was Mr E.Tickner, who lived in Great Shelford as did his deputy, Ted Vousden better known for forming the Riverside Jazz Band, which he ran for four decades.”

NIFES had been formed in 1954 from the Ministry of Fuel and Power to assist industry to increase fuel efficiency and overcome the problems associated with the lack of coal in the early 1950's. Funded by the National Coal Board, Gas Council, the Electricity authority and two major oil companies, it started its own scheme for the training of boiler operators and moved to no.8 Queen Anne Terrace in February 1957.

The senior staff had come from the Ministry and amongst other things had been responsible for the drafting of the Clean Air Act 1956. They were assisted by a number of scientists with specialist knowledge in combustion and for implementation there were a number of former Navy Artificers employed as stoker demonstrators.

Mike Brown phoned from Cherry Hinton to say that his dad was one of the engineers who travelled around the region in an old Bedford van checking the efficiency of boilers in breweries and other such works. Mike would often go with him for the ride.

NIFES developed into a Consulting Engineering Practice specialising in the design of large steam producing plant, oil-fired conversion, incineration etc. The Company still exists, but not in Cambridge.

Coal fired boilers generated steam for engines that drained the fens, shifted sewage at Cheddars Lane, pumped water at Fleam Dyke and heated buildings such as Ely Cathedral. Do you have memories of working with them?

Memories, 16th February 2009, by Mike Petty

January 29th 1934 started as just an ordinary day for Percy Titmous. By the time it was over he was world famous, In the words of the New York Herald Tribune he had become a "motorized knight", a Launcelot who'd rescued his Queen from dire distress.

Queen Mary was a regular visitor to Cambridge: her honeymoon train had paused here briefly when en route to Sandringham in 1893. In 1918 she visited Papworth Hospital and the Cambridge military hospital in Burrell's Walk with King George V. Three years later they returned to inspect the National Institute of Agricultural Botany where crowds glimpsed a tall Imperial lady inside the smoothly running Royal car,

It was the car that betrayed what was to have been a secret visit in 1932 to the Fitzwilliam Museum when it was held up at the Northampton Street traffic lights. The Royal car had again been spotted in January 1934 parked outside the Cambridge Tapestry Works in Thompson's Lane and then in St Andrew's Street whilst her Majesty chose numerous tiny ivory objects for her famous Dolls House from Woolston's antiques shop.

Three weeks later she was due to return. The police were alerted that the Royal car had left and were keeping the route clear so that the Daimler should have an unimpeded run. In fact it was nothing of the sort. Three times the limousine broke down through overheating, once just outside Ely where it was noticed by Harold Sedgwick of Egremont Street, Ely. He had thought of stopping but as two chauffeurs were at work on the engine he left them to it. The car was restarted but finally came to rest outside the Slap Up public house at Waterbeach.

It was here that Percy found them. His wife suggested he stop to see if they needed assistance so Percy paused some way off and waited for a sign. Soon the Lady in Waiting approached to explain the predicament and ask whether the Queen might hitch a lift to Cambridge in their little car.

The constables charged with keeping the road free from traffic tried several times to intercept the Titmous vehicle, only to jump aside when they recognised the passenger. Even Cambridge crowds normally used to anything were stunned they saw the Queen emerge from the car wearing a coat and hat of brilliant purple and carrying an umbrella of the same colour. She appeared intensely amused at the reaction to her somewhat unexpected arrival

As Queen Mary visited Collins and Clark's antique shop on Regent Street her attendants were busy. They telephoned Walter Riddy, proprietor of a garage in St Andrew's Road, Chesterton, requesting the hire of a Daimler saloon. As soon as he realised for whom it was required Walter changed out of his working clothes and drove into town to convey her Majesty on to her next port of call, the K.P. Café on King's Parade and then on to Exning. On arrival there the Queen personally thanked him for his services and invited him to remain for lunch. Sadly he had another urgent engagement and could not accept.

Meanwhile Percy Titmous had tried to slip away unobserved. But somebody had taken his car number and a call to the Council offices soon elicited his name. Soon pressmen, news agencies and even film companies were hot on his trail.

The American newspapers were full of the story: “Queen Mary Thumbs Ride as Auto Quits” ran one headline which went on to describe how “townspeople stared in amazement from the sidewalks”.

The Queen herself seemed unperturbed by the incident; her visits to Antiques shops continued unabated, as did her motoring adventures. In May 1939 her car was involved in an accident and in August 1948 the Royal limo again broke down again at Lt Thetford Corner. History was not allowed to repeat itself however and this time she continued her journey in a police car.

Then in early March 1984 another Royal in a motor car hit the headlines. Shoppers on King’s Parade were surprised to see Prince Edward sitting at the wheel of a London taxi whilst a couple in evening dressed danced on its roof. It was his off-beat way of publicising a charity show he was producing for the University Light Entertainment Society in Cambridge Rag Week. But the elaborate stunt almost flopped when he failed to find the old London taxi he needed. Finally he turned to the News for help and they arranged for Londoner Maurice Hamilton to make a special trip to Cambridge with his cab. Edward fixed a temporary dance floor to the roof and tied bunches of balloons to the bonnet as it stood stationery in King’s Parade.

Another tale, not previously told, relates to an incident whilst the Prince was producing one of his ‘Crown and Country’ television programmes. I had been invited to say something about the history of the fens and suggest locations where sequences might be filmed. One part of the story was of how William the Conqueror had fought his way on to the Island of Ely, overcoming the resistance of Hereward the Wake. What better location could there be than the Aldreth Causeway, the ancient trackway through the fens. So there the film crew travelled in the production van and the sequence was recorded. It was obvious however that Prince Edward could not really appreciate just what the problems could have been – the area was quite passable. Until it rained. Having spent some time in the back of the van he had to leave – he had a meeting with King Charles I at Earith. Only by then the track had turned to a quagmire and the vehicle got very stuck. Eventually it took a traveller with a four-by-four to tow the van to hard ground – and receive a souvenir of the occasion in the form of a portrait of the Queen as engraved on a £20 note!

Elliot Farnon has emailed from Australia to seek help. He is trying to locate Haig Road in Cambridge. Elliot remembers it from when in 1961 attended he attended a course run by the Pye Training School and thinks it was near their head office. But he’s searched Cambridgeshire maps on the internet and can’t track it down.

It’s still there, but under a different name.

Haig Road was listed for the first time in the 1924-5 edition of Spalding's Cambridge Street Directory at a time of massive housing development which also saw Hawthorn Way, Harvey Goodwin Avenue and Coleridge Road added to the maps.

It ran from Chesterton Road to link up with Cam Road, part of the De Freville Estate, and provide residents of Montagu and Humberstone Roads with a new access to the north. At the other end of Cam Road was Lovers Walk, part of which was widened and renamed St Andrew's Road in 1904

Haig Road was busy when the Pye Radio employees flocked out of work, a scene captured in one of the albums compiled by the company in 1932. At that time they were making 4,000 sets a week but demand was greater than supply and they were planning to increase the size of the works by 50 percent. They held an open day when they invited people to inspect their works and queues five or six deep stretched halfway up the road. It was amazing, said the News, that a non-industrial town should have such fine works and few realised that we in Cambridge had such an important and highly organised industry in our midst. In these times of depression it is a novelty to find a works which is really flourishing, it commented

Rodney Dale recalls it as a quiet area on which he could practice on his friend, Micky Mansfield's, home-made trolley. Once they put a sail on it and went for an exciting speed trial down Haig Road – he still has the scars as a reminder, he records in 'Halcyon Days', his recollections of post-war vintage motoring in Cambridge

The peace of Haig Road was never destined to last. There had been plans in the 1930s for a new route from Milton Road to run down Haig Road, Cam Road and across the river to Walnut Tree Avenue and Newmarket Road. It finally arrived in 1971 when the name disappeared from the maps to be replaced by Elizabeth Way.

At first the new route eased traffic problems but by 1977 it had become a noisy and polluted choked artery. Residents lamented how Cam Road had once been a tree-lined quiet residential street with front gardens. Now they lived in back rooms and looked forward to the relief that would come with the opening of the Northern Bypass

Photographs in the Cambridgeshire Collection show Haig Road in the early days when residents included Samuel Haddow, Alan Mills and Herbert Burley – but there must have been many more. Were your family amongst them, if so what do you recall of the road

More letters have flowed in following recent Memories articles about the earlier days of Anglia Ruskin University.

Then Dawn Wilkin wrote from Jersey seeking help with locating students who attended a two year Business Training Course at Cambridge Tech from September 1947 to July 1949. She had been tracking her classmates down and was planning a reunion. After years of search there were just four she had been unable to locate despite placing advertisements in magazines and newspapers and appealing on the radio. However thanks to the Memories article that number is down to just two. For a letter from Derek Chapman of Oakington tells me that Michael Dear later had a stall on Cambridge market and died in 1975. Derek also knew Michael Hodge but he had since lost touch. However another News reader knew that he now lives in Hellesdon, Norwich and forwarded the cutting. Now Mike has written in, and Dawn can send out another invitation to her reunion party. It just leaves two to find: Dorothy Matthews who was then living in Barton Mills whilst her father was working for the Ministry of Defence and Arthur Stockdale then of Mildenhall.

Meanwhile Liz Tubman from Wells in Somerset has a photograph of Engineering students at that same period while Richard Peacock from Newton was taught engineering by Mr Purvis – a very clever man – between 1938 and 1940

Sheena Dale emailed to say she recognised her father, Garry Dale, who now lives in Ashdon, while Joan Fischer made contact all the way from Fayetteville, North Carolina. She finished a business course in July 1947 and still has happy memories of her teenage years in Cambridge. If you remember her then email FISCAD2@cs.com or drop me a line.

Other Tech memories have come from Betty Parker from Thriplow who spotted her late husband Cliff amongst faces from 1944; it was very poignant for he had died that very morning.

Viv Blunt of Cottenham identifies the Building Science Room where he was a student from 1942-45. He also has other information that I am passing on together with the other correspondence to Tony Kirby, whose history of Anglia Ruskin University sparked this outburst of interest in what is obviously a much-loved institution.

West Dereham is not exactly on the main road to anywhere.

Approaching along the A10 from the south I turned into Southery where the ruins of an old church recall an era when the parish was ‘most reprobate, abandoned and a stronghold of Satan’ while its Victorian replacement contains a stained glass window erected by Robert Sayle of Cambridge in memory of his father. It is a story told in a recent church history by local farmer’s wife, Judith Legge.

Then it was out along Poppylot, the bouncy road towards Feltwell, before turning off left where, at night, the bulk of the Wissington Sugar Beet Factory looms in the darkness wreathed in steam which drifts across the river making the whole scene somewhat spooky. Still the rural road continues until suddenly there’s a turning on the left that leads along a narrow, winding, mud-lined road to a T-junction with little sign of any habitation nor indication of which way to turn. Down there on the right, behind a high wire fence, lies a village hall which will win no prizes for beauty and whose stage has now been removed leaving yet more open space to be heated by the overhead electric fires.

Here the other evening a dozen people turned out to investigate websites on which they could pursue their studies into their community’s history, if only they could get a broadband connection. Amongst them was Christopher Shaw who has just published a study of the area around Hilgay, Little Ouse and Southery including an account of the devastation caused by the floods of 1947 despite the struggle of troops to control the rising waters.

Other members of West Dereham's Heritage Group have written histories of their round-towered church and their long-departed abbey whose site was supposed to be haunted by the ghost of a monk with a face like a pig. Last year two of their numbers, Pam Bullas and Cyril Marsters turned their attention to their abandoned railway, the Downham and Stoke Ferry line.

It was set up by Act of Parliament in 1879 and the arrival of 150 navvies provided a welcome income for local hostels. The line opened on 1st August 1882 when a two-coach train on its inaugural run from Stoke Ferry to Downham Market stopped to pick up passengers at West Dereham's 'Abbey' station where Pam's father was later to be station master. The passenger traffic was never extensive but the goods business thrived with the construction of a Light Railway to Wissington where a beet factory was constructed in 1925. The last wagons ran at the end of 1981 and the railway past into history.

Cyril Marsters also has memories of life at a small village station for his recollections of being a boy on a branch line at Wilburton were published some years ago. Now he has turned to another form of locomotion, horse power. For in 1944 Cyril got a job at Chivers of Histon. Unlike thousands of others he did not work making jam: he worked on their farms as a horse boy. Cyril has a wonderful memory for detail. He started with Sid Parker, the head horse-keeper at Park Farm, from whom he learned to handle, harness and lead a trace horse as it pulled the plough.

But horses did more than that: there was muck cart, water cart and hay cart together with a mass of other jobs in the various areas of Chivers' farming enterprise – the blackberries, blackcurrants, apples and plums, not to mention their poultry farm on Arbury Road. Cyril recalls the pruning and all the other farming activities while he was employed there between 1944 and 1948. He pays testimony to the skills of the men and boys with whom he worked, some grumpy, some friendly. If your father was one of them then 'In harness at Histon: working on Chivers farms in the 1940s' is essential reading at £8.50 including postage.

Like all the booklets it needs to be tracked down – email clr@marstersvoice.co.uk for details or check the West Dereham website www.westderehamheritage.co.uk. Chris Shaw's 'Fordham, Hilgay & Ten Mile Bank, Little Ouse, Ryston & Roxham and Southery: a brief history' costs £5 plus postage – c.j.shaw@btinternet.com & Judith Legge's 'Little history of Southery and its churches' is available from bill@leggefarms.co.uk

If you're not into emails then drop me a line and I'll put you in touch. And if you have tales to tell, then please share them.

Memories 9th March 2009, by Mike Petty

My mention of the day that Queen Mary got a lift into Cambridge with a brewer's assistant has brought me a fascinating letter from Vera Hedge of Cottenham.

She writes

“Having read in the Cambridge News ‘Royal motor adventure turns Percy into a star’ prompts me to write about my late husband. He was a young airman in the Second World War and during part of his time was stationed on Witchford airfield. One day, due for leave and hoping to get a lift home, he was walking along the Ely Road when a black car passed him but stopped a short distance ahead.

“He was beckoned to the vehicle and as he approached he realised it was the Royal car and the passenger in the back seat was Queen Mary. He was invited to have a seat in the front and had a ride into Cambridge where he alighted at the bottom of Castle Hill in order to continue his journey home to Toseland, St Neots. My husband saluted Her Majesty, who nodded and smiled and said ‘Thank you’. What a day for him! The car then turned into Magdalene Street, no doubt Queen Mary was going to visit the antique shops, as she often did.”

The story doesn’t end here, Vera continues:

“Many years after the war a young fellow (a distant relative of my husband) was helping with work that needed doing in a house in the St Neots area. The workmen were removing the floor covering and years ago newspaper was often placed on floors before linoleum was laid. What did they discover? Nothing other than the old newspaper with the account of my husband’s surprise ride in the Royal Car! The young workman was unaware of this story until he went home and his father told him all about it”

Vera still has the newspaper together with a cutting of the article which she keeps in one of her family albums alongside a picture of Sam, the airman who was given a lift by his queen. Perhaps Queen Mary felt she should repay the favour shown to her by Percy Titmous all those years before.

Do you have memories of riding with Royals – email Mike Petty

Mr G.S. Badcock from Swaffham Bulbeck has also written to me following a photograph of a group celebrating plough Monday in Swaffham Prior in 1929

He writes: “In 1935 when I was ten years old I went with a dozen other boys to get Mr C. Ambrose’s horse plough from his farm yard and pull it through the village to his farm house where we stood beside the plough and started to sing. He came to the door with his long whip and walked up both sides of the plough cracking the whip as he went. We thought he was going to hit us. Then he put some money in our box. I went out on Plough Monday to pull the horse plough through Swaffham Prior for a few more years when we would black our faces by burning a cork”

When he started on Mr Ambrose’s farm in 1939 they only had one tractor and most of the work was done by 25 working horses. The fen in Swaffham Prior had no hard road then so all the corn sheaves were carted out by horse to the village to be thrashed out in winter. Mr Badcock worked on that farm for 50 years and has lent me a snap of himself and a group of other workers that was taken about 1947

More memories of working with horses can be found in a little booklet of reminiscences by Charles Wood who lived in Swavesey until 1933. He was the schoolmaster’s son and visited many of the elderly residents to record their recollections. They include Joseph Ellis the doctor, Harry Wells the coal merchant, Walter Thorp the carpenter who made his own coffin and stored it in his cottage till it was needed and Charles Culpin, the blacksmith.

Culpin’s forge was a wonderful place for children. Charles Wood recalls the anvils, the bellows, bags of horse shoes and the dust: “As you walked from the hard earth floor of the stall into the forge itself, so you walked into an ever-increasing depth of dust, which reached four inches and more around the anvils. This dust was light and floury, pale grey in colour and rose in puffs around your feet at every step. It looked of medieval vintage and it intruded into trouser turnups and infiltrated into lace hole on boots and shoes. ... The roof space overhead was filled with long lengths of all sorts of iron and steel. From every rafter hung huge festoons of dusty cobwebs from whose shelter hairy spiders of large size and ancient lineage maintained a malignant and disapproving watch on the activities going on below”

Now John Shepperson has published Wood’s essays for the first time, adding extra biographical notes on the characters who were once part of Swavesey’s community.

This week’s postbag has brought wonderful letters following my Memories article of March 2nd.

Harry Bye of Ely writes to me after reading Cyril Marster’s recollections of working with horses at Chivers’ farms, Histon. Harry lived with his father in a nine room farmhouse on Chivers Station Farm, part of their Shippea Hill estate, from 1926-1942. He worked for them for 12 years, mainly with horses, pigs and cattle, before leaving the land for a job at Shippea Hill station.

Harry remembers the horse-drawn railways which ran from the Prickwillow farms to Shippea Hill station and from Redmere Plantation Farm and the Decoy to their own railway sidings at Duck Drove. They had their own steam locomotive until 1934 when it was cut up for scrap and replaced by Tilling Stevens petrol electric loco, built by Chivers engineers.

It hauled out trucks of fruit, cauliflowers and celery while wagon loads of seed potatoes, manure, cattle and coal for the farm houses were brought in. Lots of chicory was grown as Chivers had their own factory. They also grew peppermint and had their own distillery.

Chivers had their own village shop, chapel, school, tennis court and football and cricket teams. They also had their own electricity system. Alf Wilderspin was in the charge of the engine that provided the power for the lights, bakery, chicory factory, sawmill, the engineers and blacksmith’s shop. Two men started the engine at seven in the morning and it ran till five that afternoon when a back-up engine would provide lighting. They also had a private telephone so you could ring the office, shop or any of the farms.

Harry recalls that the estate was a picture in spring when the fruit trees were in blossom but with cheap fruit coming in from abroad they were pulled up with a steam ploughing engine and the farm workers had an abundance of firewood.

But it was not always easy in the fen. His late wife's uncle and aunt who lived in the Little Ouse area got so fed up with being flooded that they moved out and found employment in the steel works at Corby – somewhat different from the peaceful flatness of the fens.

Gwen Lister from Girton also spotted something of interest in that issue of Memories. She writes: "I was surprised to see a photograph of my husband amongst the people helping in the Southery floods. He was the middle one in a greatcoat. We were at his mother's house in Southery and he was helping his uncle who had a farm in the fen to get his potatoes out of the heaps and bagged before the water broke the culvert and blew a hole in the Southery road. I remember walking along the road when the sandbags were six feet high and it was very eerie hearing the water lapping the other side. It was an awful moment where the water took the side out of the house and the furniture went across the fen towards Feltwell. His other uncle on the other side of Feltwell Road had to leave his house and move into the village. His house had been flooded in the first fen flood when water had got as high as the bedroom windows.

Maureen Addicott from Cambridge recalls the opposition to the building of Elizabeth Way. Her family lived on the corner of Cam Road and St Andrew's Road, then a beautiful, tree-lined quiet area. She writes: "We had a large, corner house with gardens all the way round it and walked to Brunswick school down 'The Lane' and across Pye's Bridge. It was very safe and traffic free and in the summer Midsummer Common was our playground. The best thing for us as small children was a sweet shop opposite our house owned by a Mr Nunn. It sold all the old favourites you could think of and we loved spending our pocket money there. We knew most of the families along the road but of course lost touch when everyone moved out."

Maureen has some old photographs of the area that she got from the Cambridgeshire Collection as a reminder of those days before their house was compulsorily purchased. Its site is now a garage forecourt.

But can anybody remember a large house that used to stand behind Mill Road bridge, close to the former Mill Road library. S. Bristow remembers it as a child and was quite upset when it was demolished. Do you know its history, who lived there or have any photographs?

Or do you have memories of the chalk pits at Cherry Hinton. They are an important aspect of local life; in fact it was the cherry trees in Lime Kiln Close that gave the village its name. Over the years, the pits have been host to school groups and walkers and had their own nature trail. They've also been the scene of less peaceful pursuits. During the war the Home Guard utilised them for training in the art of mountain climbing – essential in the fens - and in September 1947 5,000 spectators thronged there to watch Cambridge Centaur Motor Cycle Club's second scramble of the season. For five exciting hours, the competitors urged their snorting, bucking, skidding mounts over a gruelling course which comprised nearly a mile of the toughest ground in the county.

Today the Wildlife Trust and Cherry Hinton Community Archives Group are staging an exhibition at Cherry Hinton Village Centre on Colville Road, 10am -3pm. If you miss it you can call Laura Watson on 01954 713500 or see the website www.wildlifebcnp.org. Their new East Pit nature reserve will be opened on 20th June, so add the date to your diary

People have been bemoaning the loss of 'Old Cambridge' for centuries. But few have done anything to record just what has disappeared. One of those who did was William Beales Redfern, a most interesting character in late Victorian Cambridge.

Redfern's name was connected with various businesses; he was a politician, Mayor four times, leader of the Conservative party, chairman of this, leader of that. He was also passionate about plays and became Director of the New Theatre when it opened in 1895. It was a post he held at his death in 1923

He was also an Antiquarian, lecturing on many topics and amassing his private museum of medieval gloves, shoes and spurs. It included the actual shirt King Charles I had worn on the day of his execution. Sometimes items from his collection were used as props on the stage.

He is best remembered today as an Illustrator. Born in New Square, Cambridge in 1840 Redfern became a pupil of William Herring the artist, who lived in Fulbourn. Later he journeyed to Scotland where he painted Highland Cattle. But it was in 1875 that he started to record the ancient and interesting buildings of his home town before they were lost for ever in the demolition that was then the rage.

The engravings were issued in monthly parts but then brought together into a volume entitled "Old Cambridge" which was published in 1876.

Over 30 years later, in March 1909 some of his pictures were exhibited at a crowded meeting of the Cambridge Antiquarian Society. The CDN reporter gave a brief resume of his talk which has resolved a mystery. For amongst those he featured were two pictures of a house reputed to be the residence of Oliver Cromwell when his troops occupied the castle during the Civil War. But where that was had since been forgotten.

However the News report reveals that Redfern told the Antiquarians it stood in Shelley Row, Castle Hill. It had been built, he speculated, about 1556 and retained some of the ancient timbers. Some of the rooms were panelled and two contained some rather handsome fireplaces which he had removed to his own home, Inveruglas House, Parkside.

Nearby stood The Three Tuns, also known as Whyman's Inn, doubtless frequented by Cromwell's troops, but more famous for being the last house at which Elizabeth Woodcock called in February 1799 before starting the fateful journey back to Impington which would see her buried in the snow for eight days. It was demolished in 1936.

In Petty Cury Redfern singled out old houses which he felt should never have been pulled down. They dated back to the 16th century and were the most striking and perfect in Cambridge. But they had been demolished for new shops. Nearby was the Falcon Inn, parts of which had only recently been removed in 1909. The site is now occupied by Lion Yard.

Redfern also turned his attention to Christ's Lane when a jumble of picturesque gables gave it an exceedingly quaint appearance. His artistic accuracy can be judged when compared to an old photograph of the same area recently lent me by Barbara Blows of Cambridge. Now, as Redfern anticipated, time has swept them away and even their replacements have passed into history.

Redfern's views can still be found in the Cambridgeshire Collection, Folk Museum and antiquarian bookshops. They retain their fascination of a reminder of what was lost through redevelopment in the Victorian era.

During my visit to the 'Forget-Me-Not Club' at Royston last week, the conversation got around to washing. One lady had worked in the town's laundry during the Second World War and recalled the sheets arriving regularly from Cambridge colleges for cleaning, pressing and returning. It was hard, hot work whilst some jobs were worse than others, apparently starching collars of men's shirts was one of these.

Then while compiling my 'Looking Back' articles I spotted the report of how the Mistress of Girton College had opened a new dry-cleaning department of the Wellbrook Laundry in March 1934 and been shown round the various processes which included the sorting of customers' work by tape recording and sheets automatically folded by machine. The laundry had been originally opened in 1896 for the benefit of Girton College in the days when they sent the clothes by horse

This sent me searching for other snippets amongst my files.

In 1897 a laundress from Gloucester Street, Cambridge, was fined for keeping a woman at work for more than 14 hours. Annie Sindell told the court she had started at 9.30 am on Friday and worked until ten past six the next morning. The day was supposed to be of 12 hours, less meal times, and for that she got 1s.3d. She had never agreed to work all night but the laundress would have the work done. The overtime pay was a penny an hour and she earned 7s.6d. (32p) for the whole week.

Laundresses could earn good money if one Newmarket man was to be believed. In September 1907 during a cinematograph entertainment given by the Gaumont Company at Newmarket a piece of hot lime had ignited one of the films. In trying to extinguish the flames he'd knocked over the lantern, the cylinder of gas ignited and there was a rush for the door. One lady was so terribly injured that she died in hospital. Now her husband demanded damages: she had earned 10s a week at the laundry he told the court.

But it was a complicated process: in April 1926 an inquiry was set up into the working of the Cambridge Workhouse laundry. They were doing wrong with the washer, boiling the dirt into the clothes instead of rinsing it out. Soap was not put in properly, the waste steam was wrongly used, they had wooden rollers in the mangle and people swore about their buttons coming off, the committee reported.

By 1932 Cambridge had various laundry companies. The Stokesay Laundry of Histon Road was a happy hive of industry where women and girls worked under ideal conditions in a healthy atmosphere.

They had installed a wonderful ironing machine which was the last word in efficiency, the paper reported. Nearby an 'automatic laundry' opened in Hartington Grove Cambridge. Dignitaries inspected the Forum Cleaning and Dyeing Company machines where several garments were cleaned and dried before their eyes in less than ten minutes. After cleaning clothes went on to a dusting wheel where they were tumbled and dried in a current of cold air before passing the eagle eye of a 'spotter' to the pressing room so that obstinate stains could be removed

By August 1948 Cambridge had five laundries which handled college washing. During term time they handled something like 150,000 pieces every week. Stiff shirts and white waistcoats were a feature of the college wash - especially during May Week. Before commercial laundries came into being the students' washing was usually done at home by the bedmakers. Each would undertake to wash for 20 to 30 men, and collect the bundles in a handcart. Village carriers too used to come in to collect washing which was undertaken by cottage women in nearby country areas, the News recalled

There was rivalry about who could wash best. In November 1948 laundry girls from Haverhill and Ely travelled into Cambridge for a competition aimed at increasing the status of both the laundry girl and the laundry. The winner was Miss Vera Morley, a 22-year old girl with six years experience with Coldham Model Laundry, Coldham's Lane. She was crowned "Queen Lorna" and received a cheque for £5

Laundries hit the news for other reasons. In February 1952 the "Homewash Laundry" in Abbey Street, Cambridge, was almost completely destroyed by a disastrous fire whilst in 1953 the Swiss, Scotsdale and the Cherry Hinton Steam Laundries were busy washing and ironing articles sent from flooded laundries at Lowestoft following the north sea surge which caused such devastation.

But trade declined. In Easter 1974 Cambridge Co-operative Laundry in Cambridge in Histon Road closed. At their peak 100 people worked there compared to the 60 at the time of their closure. "The problem was getting staff. It was terrible," said the Chief executive.

Were you one, and what do you recall of the conditions and friendships you made whilst ironing other people's dirty linen?

The News' photo files has a picture of Newmarket Laundry in the mid 1960s showing women working on what was then the latest machinery. But who were they, and what were they doing?

Hayley Fabb has kindly responded to my appeal for unusual pictures of Cambridge by emailing me a couple that have been saved by her dad. Coronation celebrations are obvious times for people to bring out the camera but I had never seen the remarkable picture taken inside Cambridge Corn Exchange for the celebratory tea for the Coronation of King George VI in May 1937. It shows hundred of excited faces – were you one. [PHOTO SENT BY MR FABB]

Other pictures show that Cambridge streets were decorated with bunting, Oakington held a tug-of war as part of a programme of sports, there was a Coronation queen at Sawston and Burwell decorated their shops. Huntingdon Town Hall was transformed, not just by decorations but by the removal of the stucco which had covered the red brickwork; when the flags and bunting had been put away it would remain a reminder of the Coronation. [CASTLE HILL DECORATIONS, CAMBRIDGE]

The Coronation procession in London became the first BBC television outside broadcast with pictures transmitted to a tent in Sedley Taylor Road, Cambridge. There was even a new coin to coincide with a new King. It was the eight-sided threepenny bit. Do you still have one? [TV OUTSIDE BROADCAST TENT]

Last week's memories of laundries has brought an interesting email from Roger Cork of Stretham. He writes:

"Several of these laundries were in the Cherryhinton Road area, and I remember them well. The Forums in Hartington Grove was near to our house which I passed on my way to the Morley School from 1943 - 1950. During this period lots of American Army Air force vehicles called with rails of uniforms for cleaning and us boys were fascinated to see all their Medal Ribbons and Stripes that were attached to them. Needless to say that we all started to collect Buttons and Badges, and scrounged Wrigley Chewing Gum from the very generous Americans, with 'Got Any Gum Chum' that usually did the trick.

"There was a great interest in bomb fragments and bullet cases etc and I well remember exchanging an 8th Air Force badge for a half burnt out incendiary bomb that came from the Eastern Counties Bus Garage on Hills Road that was fire bombed. The Forums, at this time seemed to employ many girl workers that walked passed my gate, and gave me lots of bits and pieces that they picked up. One gave me a pennant, that I now suspect was nicked off a staff car parked outside the laundry!" [CHERRY HINTON ROAD IN 1960s]

Peter Oates from Godmanchester emails to say that his daughter who is at Hills Road Sixth Form College has chosen to do an 'art project' on laundry in the fens and would welcome any guidance as to museums or collections of old tubs, washing lines, mangles pegs etc where she might get some inspiration. I have sent him a couple of washday snaps, do you have more. Email captoates@aol.com or let me know and I'll put you in touch [WASHING AT LONG ROAD, TRUMPINGTON]

Margaret Ayres, nee Heffer, writes to say that Harry Bye's account of his life at Shippea Hill jogged many memories. "My parents moved to Decoy Farm, Sedge Fen in 1944 when I was just nine years old. I was the oldest of four children, with my two brothers Geoffrey and Malcolm and my sister Mary Heffer. We all attended school on the estate and I used to push my little sister to school in a pram, as three miles was a long walk for a five year old, along fen roads in all weathers and crossing the railway line twice a day. Two sisters, both called Miss Pack, were our teachers and we used to get given wonderful school dinners cooked by Mrs Dunham, for which we were charged 2/6 per week. Leaving school at fifteen, I started work in the estate shop and sub post office and remember a Mr Bye collected the mail each evening to take and put on the train at Shippea Hill station - was this a relative of Harry? We also attended the lovely chapel in Sedge House on the estate - Sunday school in the morning and the evening service. We walked the three miles twice on Sunday. I'm sorry to say that the estate was sold and in 1953 my family moved to Cantelupe Farm in Haslingfield, also one of the Chivers Farms. It was in Haslingfield that I met my husband, Arthur, who was living with his family at Penn Farm Haslingfield. We are still together and have been married for over 50 years now".

Memories 13th April 2009, by Mike Petty

James Reynolds Withers, Cambridgeshire's hedge-side poet, was born at Weston Colville, near Newmarket in May 1812. His father had been village shoemaker but had fallen on hard times and when James was born he was a less than welcome addition to the family's precarious budget. There was no money for schooling so the lad was sent out at an early age to pick stones, weed corn and scare birds. As he watched he absorbed something of the natural life around him, the flowers of the fields and the birds he was employed to keep in the air.

When aged 12 he went to work for a market gardener at Fordham, finding reading matter in the tattered pages from Shakespeare amongst the waste paper from which he made seed bags. Good fortune came his way in the form of a legacy from his deceased grandmother with which he entered into his father's old trade. It was not a success so he went back to Fordham, took a wife, started a family and failed to earn enough to support them. In 1846 in desperation he turned to Newmarket workhouse for relief, describing his impressions in verse:

“Two days in the week we’ve puddings for dinner,
And two we have broth, so like water, but thinner”

All the while he was composing rhymes, though his lack of writing made it difficult for him to set them down. Eventually a farmer's wife took notice of him and funded his first volume of poetry, published in 1854. Two years later a second volume appeared, then others. Today his ‘Poems Upon Various Subjects’ are digitised on the ‘Google Book Search’ internet site.

As his fame spread he received letters of encouragement from Charles Dickens, Queen Victoria – who included a welcome gift of £50 – and Tom Hughes, author of “Tom Brown's School-days”. His output and his income increased but soon his literary friends passed away and his capital was lost in a disastrous investment. However villagers in Fordham rallied round to ensure he could continue to live a thrifty life in his cottage until his death in 1892. It was a place he immortalised in verse:

Home is home – and this is mine,
Nothing grand, not even fine:
A cottage, in a shelter'd nook,
Beside an ever flowing brook

Some crock'ry-ware, a little delf,
A few old books upon the shelf:
A few old pictures on the wall,
My wife and children – this is all

That cottage holds many memories for his great, great granddaughter, Irene Elmer. She was born in Fordham in 1938, attended Ely High School then moved away to Berkshire. But when she learned that Withers' old home was up for sale she decided to pay a visit to the village of her youth.

In the churchyard she found the poet's grave, despite his wish for "no sculptur'd stone, when I am gone, to flatter me with eulogy" preferring to sleep "calm and deep, beneath a mound with briars bound, where strings of ivy creep".

The village hall with its own memorial to the poet was locked and the caretaker nowhere to be found so Irene sought out the cottage itself, a crumbling shell with cobwebbed windows and a garden overgrown with brambles where once a neighbour's cows had caused Withers problems:

"And when I try and frighten her, and stamp and loudly bawl,
She licks her nose and coughs and stares, and does not mind at all"

Later, after it had been restored and repaired Irene visited once more; the floor had been lowered, the old pantry incorporated into a larger living space and an inside bathroom replaced the Victorian 'throne room' at the bottom of the garden. She fantasised about buying it but somehow the spirit had gone.

So she returned to her own home and garden in Cookham where she reflected on her experiences and has now produced her own poetic tribute to the poet's cottage

I am always delighted to hear from readers who recognise themselves or members of their families on the pictures I feature in 'Memories'

Margaret Hunt from Cambridge wrote in to say that a snap of the Leys Laundry taken in 1934 shows her mother-in-law, Ruby Everard. Ruby was then 16 years old and has just celebrated her 90th birthday. Mrs A. Pauley from Cottenham tells me that she started work at the laundry on Histon Road when she was 15 and worked through the war years, leaving when she had reached the age of 28. Both her sisters worked at the Model Laundry at Coldham's Lane.

But in the same article I featured a picture from a much earlier era. It showed washing in the garden of a property in Long Road, Trumpington with children playing in the road outside.

Now Gail Cooke emails to tell me more:

The lady doing the laundry was Sarah Careless (nee Barker). Family lore tells how Sarah's husband Cornelius died in January 1889 and she bought the children up "at the work tub" - taking in washing to provide for their large family. One of these was Louie, the young girl shown in the picture, who was born in 1878. Louie married William Hayden and went to live in his home village of Thriplow. She died on the 4th April 1929.

In the background of the washing photograph stands Long Road windmill. In 1928 Miss Moore, daughter of the last miller, recalled that the mill stopped working in the spring of 1887 and a year later was sold to John Peile, the Master of Christ's College. He tried to let it but failing to do so had it pulled down.

The photograph was taken by Ralph Herbert Lord who had studios on the corner of Market Place and Market Street, Cambridge where pictures like this were displayed in the large shop window and attracted much attention.

Lord liked to compose and title his photographs. One he entitled "The Grinder" shows the scene at Milton including a labourer with scythe, children and a woman with pails and yolk. Another, "Try Again", depicts the interior of a cottage where an old lady is making fruitless attempt to thread her needle, to the great amusement of a gentleman in the same room. The windmill picture he entitled "Work and Play".

Lord's work achieve international acclaim. He won bronze medals at an exhibition in Vienna in 1888 for three pictures he entitled "Netting", "The Blacksmith's Forge" and "Neddy's New Shoes" which shows a smith at work.

After I featured a picture of a mystery blacksmith some weeks ago Geoff Axe emailed me to say it showed Bill Spicer, the last working smithy in Thriplow and was probably taken in 1961. Writing in 1969 Fred Gambie remembered: "Before the days of the farm tractor there were 85 to 100 horses in Thriplow, including the young ones in training. It was an interesting sight to see the farm men taking the horses out in the fields to plough, sometimes as many as 20, two or three to each man. A Mr Fordham had all his horses (85) on one big field at Thriplow at the same time as he wanted it done quick".

And of course Fred would probably have remembered William Hayden, husband of Louie the washer-woman's daughter!

Concetta de Martino has emailed me after she found an old photograph at the back of a picture frame whilst sifting through the family archives following the death of her dad, Mr. Vincenzo De Martino.

Vincenzo came to Cambridge in around 1952 from Naples in Italy. He worked in farming for a number of years before becoming a chef at Chesterton Hospital in Union Lane for 35 years. He sadly passed away in 2003, very much loved by the very strong local Italian community who like her dad left their families in Italy to start new lives here in Cambridge.

But the photograph seems to have nothing to do with Vincenzo's family. It was taken by Mason and Company who had studios near Robert Sayles in St Andrew's Street just before the Great War and through to the 1930s. It shows a group posed in front of a large, academic building which carries the University motto 'Hinc Lucem et Pocula Sacra' ("From here, light and sacred draughts") around the top of the stair turret. It is part of the Downing site opened by the King in 1904

But who are these men and women, boys and girls of all ages? They are dressed in their finery with hats and watch chains and several of the gentlemen seem to be wearing ribbons or favours on their lapels.

Is there an Italian connection? Certainly their countrymen were in Cambridge at that time, though the snippets that I've featured in 'Looking Back' tend to emphasise the occasions that they come into conflict with both town and gown alike.

It was the music that was the problem: there were frequent complaints from academics and residents disturbed by the sound of Italian organ-grinders. But not everybody objected. In 1902 Antonio Arpino was grinding out the strains of "When the boys come marching home once more" at Newmarket races as King Edward VII drove past in an open carriage. Arpino raised his hat and held it out for a coin and the King ordered the carriage to stop. Arpino ran to catch it up, saying in Italian, "Good morning, King" which obviously caused His Majesty considerable amusement for he threw him a florin before the carriage drove off. Arpino claimed the King had "patronised" him and promised to have the Royal Arms painted on his organ.

And did you realise that it may be Italians who brought us out-of-town parking? The University Vice Chancellor told members of the Town Planning Institute in 1929 that in certain Italian cities there was a rule enforcing motorists to leave their cars outside and proceed into the town on foot. Anybody who suggested such a thing in this country would be cried down as a faddist, but it was a practical proposition. "Of course I don't think I should like to see people stopping four miles out of Cambridge", he added.

Many Italians came to know Cambridgeshire as Prisoners-of-War and several stayed on when hostilities ended. But it seems to have been in the 1950s and 1960s that people like Vincenzo made the move. By 1976 there were more than 1,000 Italians in Cambridge forming the largest immigrant group in the city.

Many had earned enough to start their own businesses and establish their own homes. The head of one Italian family told the News that he had emigrated from Naples in 1961 to achieve a standard of living in which he could raise a family. But he spent 88 hours a week on running a continental corner shop and bakery so there was not much time for family or social life.

And as summer heats up, where would we be without Italian ice-cream, despite conflicts such as that in May 1977 when two rival companies set up their stalls side by side in Lion Yard and proceeded to give away free ice cream. "It's poisonous" said one schoolboy to another who was clutching no less than three chocolate cornets to his chest.

But what are your memories of Italians in Cambridge – and can you shed any light on that mysterious picture.

John Everett has emailed after finding my website. He was researching a postcard-backed photo he owns which that was postally used in 1911. It shows Scott and Wilkinson photographers' premises which were in St Andrew's Street opposite the old Police station, near the New Theatre and old Cambridge Daily News building. It will appear soon on John's own website 'Footsteps' at www.footstepsphotos.co.uk

But can anybody identify people in another picture of St Andrew's Street that was taken by the News in the late 1950s. Who is the man with the sandwich board or do you see anybody on the pavement?

In a hollow six Miles from Newmarket racecourse is a small community with a pub, a windmill and some large houses. One was formerly home to the half-sister of Lord Byron, who visited several times. It later belonged to Herbert De la Rue of the printing family who enlarged and remodelled it into the Swynford Paddocks stud. Now it is a hotel.

A second residence was inherited by William Henry Bullock in 1871 from his uncle, General John Hall, so he changed his surname in gratitude. The new owner took a great interest in his inheritance, built good cottages and reading rooms for the labourers and founded a co-operative store. The Six Mile Bottom estate became famous for its excellent sport: the Duke of Cambridge was an almost yearly visitor during the shooting season and the Prince of Wales occupied the house for four weeks one winter..

William lavished money on his picturesque thatched country residence, in every way typical of an English gentleman's home. But in September 1899 a maid noticed smoke coming out of the thatch close to the kitchen chimney. Help flocked in from all directions but it was too late. The News reported the devastation: "All that remains of the house, covered from end to end with creepers just turning into rich autumn tints, snugly hid among well-laid-out grounds and surrounded by leafy trees, are bare tumbled-down walls with chimney stacks, grim and gaunt, ready to topple any moment, charred beams and tons of loose scorched bricks."

When William Hall got to the scene his grand piano stood safely out of harms way but much of his antique French and Chippendale furniture had been burned to ashes. However he seemed more concerned for the plight of the swallows who sought to fly home to their roost in the projecting eaves of the now destroyed mansion. He set about building again, a new residence with all the latest inventions.

After William's death the family decided to move away but planned a parting gift to the people of Six Mile Bottom - a church to be dedicated to his memory. A bank account was opened, to which the Halls were the main contributors and a suitable plot of land identified. Progress was delayed due to the Great War and disputes between the clergy but slowly the funds accumulated until in 1931, the newly arrived rector of Little Wilbraham, Rev. Lindsay Chaplin wrote to the then widowed Mrs. Favell Helen Hall, asking her about the possibility of finally building the church.

Mrs. Hall responded positively to this suggestion, and promptly engaged her young god-son, (Henry) John Seely (2nd Lord Mottistone) and his partner, Paul Paget, as the architects. They had finished their plans for both the interior and exterior in 1932 and contracted the local Cambridge builders, Rattee & Kett, to construct the church. The foundation stone was laid with due ceremony by Mrs Hall on 1 April 1933 and the church was consecrated on 17 December 1933.

Since then the building has changed little but the congregation has dropped. These days the church is closed apart from one annual service which is held there in September, and regular Thursday morning prayers.

Now plans are in hand for special 75th anniversary church service on Sunday 31 May 2009 to be attended by representatives of the Hall family. Jane Lane has compiled a church history but would welcome further memories of people who have known the church and community. You can email her through the parish website at www.bvsda.org.uk/fulbournpcc or drop me a line and I'll put you in touch.

Probably the most dramatic event to have hit the headlines from Six Mile Bottom occurred in July 1947 when the station master noticed that fire had broken out in one wagon of a train carrying American mustard gas bombs.

Fireman Alfred Chandler jumped down and uncoupled the burning truck from the rest which was steamed out of the way. Then the railwaymen tried to subdue the fire with buckets of water, fully aware of the dangerous nature of the contents of the wagon.

An eye witness told a "Cambridge Daily News" reporter: "It was a spectacular sight. About fifty per cent of the bombs exploded with a 'whoosh' and a burst of flame which shot fifty feet into the air. Poisonous fumes spread over a range of fifty or sixty yards". Seven members of the Cambridge National Fire Service were taken to Addenbrooke's Hospital after suffering burns and the main line between Cambridge and Ipswich was closed to traffic.

Later Alfred Chandler together with fireman Joseph Westland and drivers, Frederick Smart and William Thorburn, all of Cambridge, were presented with the L.N.E.R. Medal in recognition of their bravery.

There was a similar incident in August 1974 when a convoy of lorries carrying 50 one-ton bombs to an American air base were diverted on to the half-built Newmarket by-pass after some of the loads were found to have shifted dangerously near the railway crossing at Six Mile Bottom. Explosive experts examined the bombs for damage before they were reloaded by a crane brought from USAF Lakenheath. The scare lasted for five hours and involved dozens of firemen, police and American military personnel.

Memories 11th May 2009 by Mike Petty

Within the last few days my talking commitments have led me to two areas of the region that are somewhat different in style.

Both were to meetings of Probus clubs, one a ladies' group in Peterborough, the other at Great Yarmouth, and both were held co-incidentally in Masonic buildings.

Peterborough has a fine cathedral and excellent shopping but there is another side too: when we drew up at the venue, in one of the new townships just off their orbital ring road, a kindly lady suggested that the club's carpark would be 'more secure'. This involved driving into an enclosure protected by high steel fences, feeling like it should be the approach to Whitmoor. Usually it is nice to explore the environs after a talk but a glance at the boarded-up windows of the houses nearby was enough to persuade us that this time it would be better to head off again back into the fens as soon as the meeting was over. Otherwise it was a typically interesting group of business ladies whose interests and careers had spanned a wide area.

By contrast the opportunity to reacquaint ourselves with Great Yarmouth was not one to be a merely straight-in and straight-out experience. This time we decided to make an overnight stay and booked into a hotel, not on the Golden Mile but on the South Quay.

This was the traditional area of the hard-working fishing community whose boats once filled the quayside and whose nets once dried on the denes beneath the memorial to Nelson that was designed by William Wilkins, architect of many Cambridge college buildings.

It was here that hundreds of ladies would annually journey down from Scotland to gut and process the harvest of herring. They also needed accommodation and found it in the warren of rows and lanes in houses that had once been Merchants' mansions and had become squalid tenements before 'town clearance' through the devastation of German wartime bombs. Yet there are reminders everywhere of its rich heritage, not least in two of Norfolk's museums which recreated some of the rooms as they would have been at various periods. In one of these sat a model seaman at his supper who, from a concealed loudspeaker, related some of his experiences.

Next morning it was easy to find the Probus venue in a magnificent building opposite one of the piers. And there too was the usual audience of gentlemen who had pursued professional careers. Some of them knew Cambridge: one had worked for a while at 'Butlins' – the Government offices in Brooklands Avenue, another had lodged in Elfleda Road whilst repairing Stirling aircraft at Marshalls during the war.

But some made even more of an impact: one tall gentleman had skippered his own boats and was now working to support the remaining members of that now almost-extinct breed of men in the former fishing-town whose Fishermen's Hospital still provides accommodation for old sailors as it has for centuries, looking for all the world like a Cambridge college.

John Ball also went to sea, but made little of his experiences. He has however recorded those of his father, William 'Billy' Balls. Through the pages of his excellent book, 'Out of Yarmouth Harbour' he has charted the hardships and everyday problems of one of the hundreds of fishermen who fought the sea to produce the catch that the herring girls gutted along the Quay where visitors now stroll.

He presents a vivid picture of a side of seaside life that is easy to miss amongst the amusements, of a once hard-working town where today there is precious little work. These men, proud of their community, told me of the large numbers of third-generation unemployed – why should a lad work when his grandfather never had? And what would he do now the associated trades of basket makers, shipwrights and the rest are no longer needed to service the fishing fleet?

There over scampi in the restaurant of the Masonic club I was meeting men far more fascinating than the museum models whose recorded voices had made such an impression only the day before. They will remain a memory long after they themselves have disappeared.

John Ball still has a few copies of 'Out of Yarmouth Harbour' at £5.50 plus postage – write to him at 16 South Garden, Gorleston NR31 6TL or phone 01493 600270

Memories 18th May 2009, by Mike Petty

Generations of Cambridge folk have enjoyed a leisurely boat trip down the Cam from Cambridge to Clayhithe. They float beneath Victoria Bridge, admire the magnificence of the former sewage pumping station in Cheddars Lane, glide past the site of the great Stourbridge Fair and catch a glimpse of Fen Ditton and Horningsea churches before they arrive at Baits Bite lock.

But very few of them realise they also pass an isolated farmhouse which has played an important part in the history of England.

In the early 13th century, something about a low-lying, marshy spot between Fen Ditton and Horningsea caught the eye of the Bishop of Ely. There Bishop Hugh de Northwold (1229–1255) built himself a palace conveniently near – and far enough away - from Cambridge, where the student population was already growing following the foundation of the University.

His princely mansion became known as the 'Biggin' and proved a suitable stop-over for Royalty. Henry III stayed there for the first time in June 1238. Other Royals followed though they were not always greeted with enthusiasm by the locals as they brought with them their chief officers and a large retinue – all of whom had to be accommodated and fed!

In those days the King acted as Judge, treasurer and international negotiator, making war and peace in England, Wales, Scotland as well as in France. Anyone who had a complaint about a neighbour, a wife or a merchant would follow his Majesty around the countryside until he managed to get his dispute heard. And they all would have come to the Biggin!

In 1276 Bishop Hugh de Balsham was given permission to fortify the building and construct a moat. Edward I visited several times before and after his accession to the throne. Edward II came in 1314 and seems to have taken a liking to the Biggin as he returned in 1315 and remained off and on for three weeks. From 1316 however he seems to have taken to staying at Barnwell, rather nearer Cambridge, and after his death things became rather quiet at Biggin.

The Bishops still regarded it as an important asset and presented it with other prime buildings to Queen Elizabeth I – though she never got around to visiting. By this time the building had declined in grandeur and became the farmhouse it has been ever since.

In 1768 Reverend William Cole, then vicar of Milton, came to see it for himself. He had some caustic comments to make about it:-

“Having a desire to see an House in which the ancient Bishops often resided with great Hospitality I went on July 29 1768 to look at the old decayed Manor, or Palace of Biggin, now the estate of Mr Panton of Newmarket. It is seated on the Bank of the Cam, in a very low and moist situation, just between the parish churches of Ditton and Horningsey. It is now in the occupation of one Mr Woollard, a farmer. The Distance from the River is about a furlong, all marshy ground; but the House itself is on a little elevation not liable to be drowned, as is all the ground from it to the bank. Must have been a cold damp situation for the Winter”!

The farming story of Biggin continues to this day. In May 1906 it was sold at auction when it was divided and let as two tenements. The adjoining buildings were used as henhouses, piggeries, looseboxes, cowsheds, carthorse stable, barns and cartsheds. There was a good orchard at the back of the Abbey and a stackyard. The nearest neighbour was the “Pike and Eel” public house at Baits Bite lock. “The Abbey could be converted into a charming Country Residence and is surrounded by park-like grass lands prettily timbered” the auctioneers suggested

Now as part of the Ely 900 celebrations the parishes of Fen Ditton, Horningsea and Teversham have invited the Bishop of Ely to re-visit Biggin for the first time in 550 years.

On Sunday 24th May he will travel by boat from Clayhithe Boat Club to St John’s Lane, Horningsea and then walk up to the village church for the Service of celebration. Then after a picnic lunch in the Churchyard everyone will make their way to Biggin Abbey by boat or on foot.

Mediaeval entertainers – jugglers, dancers, musicians - will be there to greet them and pupils from Fen Ditton school will sing and dance.

The organisers hope as many people as possible will come and take part at some point during the day and that children may like to dress up as medieval princesses or jesters! They look forward to seeing you at St John’s Lane, Horningsey at 10.30 or at the service at 11am or at the picnic at 12.30 or at Baitsbite at 2.30 ... or at all of the events!

Sue Parlby emailed in some time ago seeking information on the history of Romsey House, near the corner of Mill Road and Coleridge Road.

She knows that it has in the past been a theological college, and then a GP surgery before it was bought by EF, a Swedish company, in around 1971, and is now the EF Corporate Executive Centre teaching international students. But any other information, recollections or reminiscences would be welcome.

At the time I had very little on my files. Sara Payne in her wonderful 'Down Your Street: East Cambridge' traced its origins back to a cottage built about 1840 and owned by a plumber named Edward Favell. It was sold about 1880 and incorporated into the new Romsey House which was home to a solicitor, James William Prior.

But when I continued reading the past issues of the News for my 'Looking Back' column I came across an article which added much more.

An editorial of 11th June 1909 reports that Romsey House had been purchased by the committee of the Romsey Town Institute for £1,435.

The red brick, Tudor House standing in about half an acre of ground had been designed by Mr G.H. Shackle, an architect of Marlborough. It contained several exceptionally large rooms that would be ideal for its new use.

The central hall, morning room, drawing room, library and dining room could easily become a billiard room, concert room, committee room and reading room. The large paved court with its glass roof that had been used as a winter garden, together with a well-built span-roof conservatory would make an ideal smoking room, they thought in the days when smoking was still regarded as a social asset.

The whole had been occupied by a Mr W.E. Curry who was a supporter of the Institute – one of his last acts had been to write a cheque for their funds.

So what was the Romsey Town Institute? It appears to have been flourishing in 1911 providing a hot bath that its members could use for twopence – though few did. By December 1915 its closure was being anticipated and it seems to have shut in October 1916.

But this is only a small part of the house's story. Can you add more. You can email Sue - sparlby@hotmail.com - or drop me a line.

Charlotte Jordan from Oakington was sifting through her late mother's photo when she came across a snap taken in the village WI hut in 1932. It shows the cast of a play, 'The Fairy Ring' in which her mother took part. "What fun we had", she used to recall, "organising our own entertainment. One paraffin heater, if we were lucky, and only rudimentary sanitary arrangements – the field. We made our own costumes, wrote, produced and advertised all our own plays". The little hut was used most days and maintained by the village. Now there is a new 'multi-use games area' – how times have changed, Charlotte reflects

Harry Bye from Ely has sent me his memories of an Italian ice-cream seller, Adolph Baigie who lived in Newmarket in the 1920s and would push his ice cream barrow around the villages. "When my two bothers and I were coming home from Snailwell school one afternoon we walked along with him part of the way. As we neared the railway bridge he said, 'Pushey. Pushey' so we helped to push his barrow up the slope. He rewarded us with an ice cream cornet each", Harry recalls. Dorothy Grainger took a wonderful photo of a travelling ice cream seller in Burwell in 1933 – do you know who he was?

Dr Colin Forbes of Cambridge has kindly solved the mystery of a picture taken in the University Downing Site that I featured on April 27th. It shows the south, courtyard, face of the Sedgwick Museum of Geology and was taken in the afternoon. He can positively identify one person seated in the second row as Professor Thomas McKenny Hughes who was Woodwardian Professor of Geology from 1873 until his death in 1917. The Museum was opened by King Edward VII on 1st March 1904 when he unveiled a statue to Adam Sedgwick. Dr Forbes believes that the photograph shows a group of people who had come to the opening ceremony.

Alf Lawrence from Cambridge has written following the closure of the Gala Bingo Hall in Hobson Street, Cambridge. He has lent me a picture of a Burns Night celebration held there which shows his late wife Jessie smiling in the background, behind the lucky winner of the Haggis and the large bottle of Scotch.

Alf writes: “Jessie loved her Bingo Saturdays and used to go to the other Bingo halls by coaches organised by a lady named Mrs Jean Nightingale. She once won £1,000 at the Mecca Bingo Hall in Harlow”

Several News journalists have reported on the Bingo phenomenon over the years.

In July 1966, when the boom was beginning, Dereck Harvey visited the Kinema in Mill Road, Cambridge where the manager, Mr A. Pink told him: “I’ve never seen anything like it. We had 9,000 members in the first nine weeks”.

The caller sat at a large transparent container in which numbered ping-pong balls jostled with each other before being pushed up a tube into his hand. He called out the numbers and illuminated counter-markings on a big display board at the back. Three hundred people were concentrating hard, hoping for the big break – like the one enjoyed by Mr E. Brauerski, head porter at the Blue Boar Hotel, who had just the week before hit the jackpot with a massive £1,000 in a national competition. But there were even bigger winnings at the Rex in Magrath Avenue

By January 1977 the Central EMI Bingo and Social Club in Hobson Street boasted 10,000 members. It had opened in March 1972 to offer enthusiasts an almost non-stop programme six days a week. Every afternoon and evening hundreds congregated in the theatrical, almost surreal surroundings, a brash, psychedelic mish-mash of colours – silver, yellow, red, green, rust, cream. It was a place with its own special vocabulary – “last’un”, “flyer”, “ling double”, “quickie”. The players were perfectly normal people – police officers, traffic wardens, doctors and housewives. They were all quick to acknowledge that it was an addiction – especially the fruit machines that paid out up to £30 in 50-pence pieces; people dashed to them in the brief intervals between games, and long queues formed during the interval. But the main money was to be made on Bingo itself, especially the jackpot when the Cambridge club linked up by phone with that at Oxford and there was £400 on offer.

Then in the 1980’s the national newspapers discovered the magic of bingo. A Cambridge man won £40,000 in ‘The Sun’, a Cambridge woman won £20,000 with the ‘Mirror’. Once more a News reporter was sent into the Bingo Hall. This time it was Chris Elliott who took the afternoon away from his desk in March 1983 for a return to the Central. Now there was the additional attraction of Parti Bingo, the kind of 20p-in-the-slot machines found in seaside arcades, before the main games started. Queen of the Club was Mrs Daisy Driver who’d been playing bingo since 1948. She went four times a week, paying 23p admission – pensioner price – and £1.70 for a couple of books. If they won – and prizes went right up to £1,000 on a Saturday night – then that was a bonus. It was a home from home where regulars had their favourite seats; they met their friends and enjoyed the social repartee, it got them out of the house and kept them mentally stimulated.

If you have memories of Bingo, write to Mike Petty at the News

Last Sunday a flotilla of boats carried the Bishop of Ely from Horningsea to the Biggin Abbey, near Baits Bite Lock. It all jogged memories for Rosa Bates of Elmdon, near Saffron Walden who was born there in December 1932.

“My grandparents lived in the original building. I was brought up in London but returned to Biggin with my mother just as war ended, this time living in the other half. I have so many happy memories of the place where I lived until my wedding in Fen Ditton church in 1956. I remember the bad winter of 1947, sliding down the snowy slopes of the old moat on Gran’s large metal tray and the sight of water for miles when the thaw came. Cycling down the leafy avenue and coming back to face the bull that had broken loose. Cattle in the yards in winter. Leaping over the ditch that was originally the waterway that brought the boats from Baits Bite Lock to the Biggin.

“Inside there is an old worn stone staircase which, according to rumour, joined a secret tunnel underground. A window at floor level in an upstairs room, cupboards within cupboards, all of which I found utterly fascinating. Outside the stables and cowsheds were finally converted to bungalows. The large barn where the cows were milked has now gone. In my old age I wonder how many others were born there”.

If you were one, please get in touch

Last week Cambridge University announced a change in a long tradition, that of the results of examination being announced on boards outside the Senate House. Candidates have complained that they might learn of their fate from friends who had got there before them. So from next year students will be emailed with the results before they are displayed to public perusal. It will reduce stress.

A until a century ago crowds of dons and undergraduates congregated inside the Senate House to learn the results of the Mathematical Tripos. This was the most prestigious of the University degrees – attracting the same sort of world-wide interest that now devolves on the winner of ‘The Apprentice’ or ‘Big Brother’

The examiners stood in the gallery and read through the names in order of merit before tossing down printed lists to be scrambled for, while the friends of candidates dashed off to impart the news to those who dare not come to hear for themselves.

The News described the scene June 1909 - in days before women were treated as equal (or superior) to their male colleagues:

“Long before the doors of the Senate House opened sweet girl graduates clustered round the gates. Women easily beat the men in early rising. The most critical eye could discern no signs of hasty or slovenly dressing among the ladies who were waiting for places a good half-hour before any undergraduate turned up. And when the men did arrive, breathless and in haste, it was obvious many had slipped on the clothes that had been nearest at hand and had finished the buttoning process on the way.

“When the doors opened there was a scramble helter-skelter up the staircase for places of vantage in the gallery. The floor of the Senate House filled in almost equally quick time. Coaches and pupils, dons and undergraduates, men and women, jostled each other without any thought of University decorum.

“Towards nine o’clock the examiners flanked by tier upon tier of anxious but silent women, took their accustomed places in the gallery. Still people poured into the Senate House and were surprised to find themselves bulging around the doors in most disadvantageous positions. Late arrivals ran from one door to another in frantic haste.

“The clock of Great St Mary’s still pointed one minute to the hour when Mr Birtwistle, himself a former Senior Wrangler, consulted his watch. A round of applause was instantly greeted with ‘S-s-s-h-h’. A moment of dead silence. Mr Birtwistle carefully replaced his watch and with Mr J.M. Dodds (the Moderator) stood inscrutable as the Sphinx. The time had not arrived! A laugh broke the tension. Nerves were strung up again by King’s College clock striking the hour. Again the babble of conversation was hushed. But King’s was premature by about half a minute. Those last minutes to the anxious ones seemed prolonged indefinitely. At last Mr Dodds raised the paper in his hand, and in dead silence announced slowly and distinctly: ‘Mathematical Tripos, Part 1. Old Regulations. Senior Wrangler ...’

That was stress!

Later came the actual award of the degree in the Senate House when the Senior Wrangler was greeted with applause from undergraduates packed into building. But the successful candidate with the lowest marks was rewarded with a large wooden spoon. The handsomely decorated trophy was suspended by strings from the galleries and as he left the recipient was handed a pair of garden shears, decked with his college colours. With these he cut the string, bravely shouldered his trophy and marched out of the Senate House accompanied by a perfect tornado of cheers.

This ceremony was held for the last time in 1909. After that the results were published in three classes – wranglers, senior optimes and junior optimes, arranged in alphabetical order so there was nothing to distinguish between the merits of the first and twentieth wrangler. It was intended to minimise specialisation in mathematics and give more scope to newer branches of study.

The award ceremony remains the culmination of hard years of study and all taking part need to look their best. It was traditionally a busy time for people like Henry Collins of Cambridge who was one of the team of hairdressers at Joshua Taylor from 1946 to 1972. Dressed in white suits and white shoes they built up a rapport with their customers, knowing who wanted to chat and who preferred to be silent. Henry has lent me a photograph of himself at work inside the shop in October 1952. Were you one of those who had your hair cut there, in the days you had hair?

I have recently been lent six photographs in a somewhat battered frame. They show a number of different vans bearing the name 'Somerlite'. So what was the story, I was asked.

It was about 1887 that Charles Brown had the idea of supplying groceries and paraffin oil to outlying villages. He believed he could establish a successful business and at the same time provide a service to residents. His son Robert C. Brown joined him, amalgamating it with a similar one of his own, and soon many other members of the family were engaged in the paraffin-selling business from the base in Gwydir Street, Cambridge

The early deliveries were made by horse and cart. The family's travelling shops became well-known outside Cambridgeshire and after the Great War spread to 17 counties in Eastern England. Their vans were loaded with saucepans, frying pans, crockery, tea pots, soap and brushes and at one time they sold enough matches to stretch from Cambridge to Cairo. But their biggest seller was Somerlite Lamp Oil.

To Robert Brown 'Somerlite' was his life blood; he bought oil from various sources of supply, mixed it together and told the public it had no equal. And people seemed to agree: he sold two million gallons a year and was concerned to protect the quality of the product.

So when a Fordham retailer started to obtain paraffin from another supplier he went to court to try and prevent it being sold under the 'Somerlite' name. It was as part of this legal process that the photographs of the vans were produced. They show various horse-drawn vehicles including one used at Fordham from January 1919 to November 1920 clearly proclaiming 'Somerlite Lamp Oil has no equal' and the name 'Robert Charles Brown, Wholesale Oil and Hardware Merchant, Gwydir Street, Cambridge'.

There is also a snap of a motor delivery tanker. One such vehicle made news in November 1930 after it caught fire in a shed at Barley that housed a tank containing about 200 gallons of paraffin. The driver had started the engine and gone to fetch some water for the radiator. On returning he found the whole vehicle enveloped in flames. To make things worse the tap at the rear of the van came off and a jet of flames 30 feet long shot out across the yard, igniting a pig sty. If the Fire Brigade had pumped water on the fire it would have carried the burning oil along the High Street so they allowed it to burn itself out.

Robert C Brown died during the Second World War and his wife withdrew from the business in 1960 when it was taken over. By 1964 the vans were still touring the area under the name of Johnnie Call Weekly

Today the name is famous since Corgi toys made a model of a Somerlite delivery tanker which is highly sought after by collectors and widely advertised on the Internet.

But do you remember the Somerlite vans visiting your part of the county or have more to add to the story?

Ian Wallace from Burton-on-Trent has been writing books on birds and birdwatching for 30 years. He's been beguiled by birds but absolutely fascinated by a young lady he met over 50 years ago.

Ian came up to Cambridge in 1954 where he read Economics, English and Scots law at Clare College. In those days undergraduates fell into two main groups: those who had already done their National Service and those who had not.

Ian was in the former category and after experience of the Mau Mau and Suez he felt University rules were at odds with his more advanced experience of life. For many like him Cambridge became less a great seat of learning and more a ticket office on the way to a career.

But there was more to Cambridge than study. Ian had a town girl-friend, a bonny lass called June Roberts who lived on the Newmarket Road. They had great fun together in jazz bands but parted when she found someone to be serious about. Through her, however, he was introduced to a circle of other girls who took up with undergraduates.

Their leading light was a stunning dark five-foot-six brunette with hour-glass figure, called Pauline. What was unusual about Pauline was the fact that she was not, as he first thought, a 'gilded hawk' - although her boyfriends included one with a gull-winged Mercedes sports car and another with a title - but actually a fine person, thoroughly admired by the other girls.

Among them was her best friend, a more overtly challenging mop-haired blonde, and together they would dazzle the lads at dances, parties, jazz and flamenco sessions. They were given the title of the "Cambridge It Girls" in about 1955 and the Merc owner arranged for them to have a walk-on / look decorative appearance on an early TV pop show almost certainly Pete Murray's '6.5. Special'.

Pauline was a beautician, who probably worked at Boots. She must have lived in the city or within bus distance. Her surname was a common English one, but he can't remember what it was.

Ian finds it increasingly reluctant to allow such a peerless young woman to disappear into the mists of his memory. She certainly made an impression and now – with the backing of his wife – he would like to discover anybody who may have known her or who can share their memories of those distant days.

And although there may have been several 'Paulines' surely there can only have been one gull-winged Mercedes car – do you know who owned it?

You can phone Ian on 01283 872364 or contact me and I'll put you in touch.

By co-incidence another Pauline has written to me; this one is Pauline Anderson (nee Saddington) from the Cherry Hinton area. She has been a regular contributor to this column and wrote to me some years ago about Brunswick School. However she did not keep a copy of her letter and now Cambridgeshire Archives are seeking ex-pupils' memories so she'd like to know what she said. I can't keep all my letters either, but this one was so interesting that I added it to my files – and actually found it! Somewhere Pauline has a snapshot of the winning relay team at the Town Schools Sports Day in 1931-32. They all got a certificate and had the picture taken on the grass lawn in front of the school with Miss Gilson, the coach, she recalls.

The tradition of presenting a wooden spoon to the student who finished bottom in the University Mathematical Examinations died out 100 years ago. Now St John's College is hosting an exhibition at which five surviving wooden spoons – from Corpus, Emmanuel, Selwyn, and St John's are on display. Its being held in St John's College Library Exhibition Area, until next Friday, 26 June 9am-5pm.

Odd things can start people remembering

It happened to Ken Isaccson of Soham when he spotted the name of Janet Street Porter. He writes: "Early in the war years a man by the name of Mr Street Porter kept poultry at Kennett near Newmarket. He had cages made for these chicks which were the first I had seen where when the hens laid their eggs they rolled down to the front of the cages. When he decided to sell up my father and I went to the auction and we were amazed that we were the only ones there as the price of eggs was so high. My father started bidding at a very low price and had the lot knocked down to him. My brother and I carted them home by our tractor and trailer.

"Eventually we set some of them up in one of our Nissen huts but these had only dirt floors we knew that the hens would throw their food pellets about and they would spoil in the droppings. So we bought some 70 ducks and let them loose on our nearby pond, knowing they would find the pellets. It worked a treat and we had duck eggs, hens eggs and goose eggs to sell when the egg collector came round."

Tony Boyce has also been recalling geese at Soham. His dad, Algy Boyce, kept eight breeding geese and two ganders on his field near Brook Dam. From these he would rear 50-60 birds which his mother, Annie, was responsible for feeding and watering so they were at peak of perfection to send by train to butchers around Liverpool Street station and Tottenham ready for the Christmas table.

Later Algy diversified into turkeys. Some kindly person told him the best way to fatten them up was to feed them fishmeal for a month before Christmas. It worked a treat and produced fine plump birds that would provide many families with a magnificent festive treat. Tony remembers: “We had our own small plump hen turkey on Christmas Day, which mum cooked and dad carved. It looked and smelt delicious, but it was impossible to eat. It tasted very strongly of fish, and as Dad realised, all his birds would taste the same. He was reduced to tears!” Valued customers were either furious, embarrassed or humiliated amongst their friends and family. It marked the end of turkey rearing for them!

But there were many other triumphs and disasters that befell the Boyces in the Soham of the 1930’s and 40s and now Tony has set them down in the latest publication from Soham Community Museum Association. ‘Old Curiosities, volume seven’, costs £3.50 from Soham bookshop or OC Box 21, Fountain Lane, Soham CB7 5PL (Email museum@soham.org.uk)

Readers have been quick to respond to my request for memories of Romsey House, Mill Road

David Shackle from Chorleywood tells me that the architect was his grandfather, George Harry Shackle of Marlborough, Jill Pratt recalled that Dr Simpson, her family doctor, used two rooms in the house from 1943/44 to about 1961 when she retired.

Later Romsey House it became a theological college. Margaret Perry from Haslingfield was one of its students in 1988 when it provided theological education for African, Indonesian and other foreign students wishing to serve in their homeland churches. The courses ranged from basic recreational to the London University Bachelor of Divinity degree which Margaret took. She recalls the lovely oak hall with sweeping oak stairs and how the students lived under very strict rules: they had to be in by 9pm and no alcohol was allowed, not even to celebrate Christmas.

Margaret herself has a claim to fame: she was the first nurse at Addenbrooke's Hospital to own a motor car. She recalls: “I bought it from an Australian surgeon who was going home. It was a 1935 Austin 7 with a handle at the front to crank it into life. He taught me driving it round the front of the hospital in Trumpington Street, having started it with a hairclip from my cap! My terror at being caught dissolved when he told me I could have it for £35.

“At this time what is now Brown’s restaurant was the hospital’s outpatients’ department (the clock is still there). The elderly working men patients sat on benches in their large boots with their caps in their hands and each speciality had a small room off the main hall. People were called by their surnames – terrible really, but they seemed to expect it in those days.

“As a student nurse at the old site, going off duty from the ward I would stand looking out over the front car park as the sun set and watch the lamp lighter climb up the street gas lamps and light them. Then he would polish each glass door, shut it and move on to the next lamp. Life was so much less of a rush in those days, and one had much more time to devote to patient care than is the case today”, she laments.

John Pickles, Librarian of the Cambridge Antiquarian Society, seeks your assistance.

Back in the 1930s the Society set out to supplement its Cambridgeshire Photographic Record by collecting original sketches and watercolours. Now he is preparing some of them for publication. The collection features works by well-known figures such as Edward Vulliamy, Louis Cobbett and Dorothy Bradford but also include a neat little view of the junction of Fitzroy Street and Burleigh Street taken from the roof of Laurie and McConnal's Stores about 1935. It was painted by Miss Beryl Pickering who at the time lived in Clarendon Street but John can find very little about this lady. Can you help – email jdp1003@cam.ac.uk or drop me a line.

Other paintings were submitted by a Mrs Pollock who is also currently a mystery. Her contribution includes a watercolour of the Little Rose in Trumpington Street dated 1943 and a pencil sketch which is labelled as 'Old buildings near Coldham's Lane'.

Coldham's Lane seems an unexpected area for an artist's attention, which makes this somewhat dull view suddenly interesting. The Cambridge Antiquarian Society photographers photographed the junction with Newmarket Road in 1929. By then the road was busy with traffic en route to the cement works. Five years earlier Councillor Doggett had reported that Coldham's Lane was a veritable slough and almost impassable. Its condition had got to such a pitch that one ratepayer proposed to sow it with potatoes!

Quite separately I have been shown three little paintings by Florence Severs who worked as an illustrator for the Cambridge University Press. More information on this lady would also be welcome. One of these depicts the old entrance to the Red Lion Yard, another shows Seymour Yard, but where was this and what can you tell me about it? If you have similar views I'd be pleased to know.

My recent article about Somerlite has jogged memories for Joy Northfield who emails "I always read your features with great interest and was really surprised to see the article about Robert Brown. Both my father and uncle worked for Browns for many years - my uncle longer than my father. The picture that was used in a legal battle could even be them. I was wondering if you had any replies from other readers".

Indeed I have:

Mrs Margaret Brown (no relation) has written of her life in Fulbourn and the traders that came around the village. 'Somerlite' was one such, she recalls: "My mother always bought her oil from Mr Brown's van plus many other items like matches, candles and sometimes a saucepan or kettle". When these started to wear and a tiny hole appeared she would buy tin plugs to repair them; these worked very well and extended their working life. She also got her galvanised bath, scrub brushes and soap from them. "We did not have the luxury of a bathroom so had to bathe in front of the kitchen range in the galvanised bath, it was also used to do the washing before it was put in the old brick copper to boil", Margaret recalls.

Peter Hullyer from Ely tells me that his father, Hubert Hullyer of Babraham worked for the company as a tanker driver collecting bulk fuel from places such as Thames Haven and Shell Haven on Canvey Island for resale to the travelling shops. He has sent a photograph of Hubert with his tanker.

Peter recalls that the Brown family ran the company for many years. The heads were the two Miss Browns who lived at 'Many Coates', a large house between Red Cross Lane and new Addenbrooke's Hospital which was demolished for a block of flats. They then moved to Gresham Road in the house that became base for the National Farmers' Union. The company was brought by Emile Litler, the owner of London theatres. In one of the plays at the time there was a line 'Johnny calls weekly' and this became the new name on the lorries.

'You've never written about Donkey Common', I was reminded on Thursday. Well I have never really thought about this area of land at the junction of Mill Road and Gonville Place and certainly have no memories of it. But many others will have, so here are some gleanings from my files to start the ball rolling.

One man who did know the area was a Mr B. Nevinson of Willis Road who wrote to the News in April 1959. He had spoken to an old man who remembered it still being used as a common grazing ground for ponies (and presumably for donkeys). It had been crossed by an avenue of well-grown limes as well as haphazard trees such as acacia, hawthorn and copper-beech. Under these mothers with young children would sit in the afternoon, away from the danger of the cricket balls on Parker's Piece, though it was out of bounds to bigger children and to youths with footballs.

Then came the Second World War when the Royal Engineers built army huts on the land, carefully avoiding the trees. Originally intended to accommodate three officers and 224 other ranks by June 1949 they were occupied by a Women's Royal Army Corps unit and a small detachment of Pioneers, comprising three officers and 76 other ranks in all. The Senior Officer Commanding did her best to maintain the grazing rights by getting a flock of geese to keep the grass down.

After the war the huts were used as emergency accommodation by the Ministry of Housing who agreed in December 1954 to hand them over to the city council. Planning permission for their continued use was granted until 30th September 1957 or until such time as major repairs were required. The huts could then be removed and the land reinstated as a public open space.

By 1955 the condition of the huts had steadily deteriorated and some were so bad they would have to be abandoned earlier than planned. They were an eyesore, 'a cluster of rusty scraps on the corner of Parker's Piece, Coun D.O. Ash described them, and should be removed as soon as possible. Councillors were urged to purchase old premises due for demolition and carry out minimum repairs to enable them to be occupied temporarily instead.

There was much debate on the future of the site and in April 1955 the Council decided to erect a giant super-modern heated indoor swimming pool with space for 230 bathers and 600 spectators, together with parking for 35 cars and 200 cycles. There would also be a roof-top restaurant with a view over Parker's Piece and changing rooms for footballers and cricketers could be installed later. There were also proposals to allow the site to be used for car parking until the pool was ready to start. In the event it was to be 1963 before Parkside Pool was finally opened.

Many people objected, wanting the land kept as open space, though the common rights had not been exercised for 50 years and had lapsed. But if it were to be developed either as a swimming pool or car park, Mr Newinson pleaded, let it perish under its old and correct name of Donkey (not Donkey's) Common.

So what can you add to the story?

Readers have been quick to record their memories Beryl Pickering and Grace Pollard, two artistic ladies who contributed their work to the Cambridge Antiquarian Society.

Marie Burrows emailed to say she knew Beryl Pickering who lived at 27 Clarendon Street, Her father was a tailor and her aunt was Miss Enid Porter, who was for many years the curator of the Folk Museum. Beryl was educated at the then Cambridge & County High School for Girls in the 1930s and later taught at the Cambridge School of Art (where Marie was one of her pupils). Beryl married a Mr Tittensor & moved to the North of England, she had one daughter and died in a nursing home about two years ago.

Marjorie Hillier from Cambridge has copies of the school magazines in which two of Beryl's lino-cuts appear. She was the school's outstanding art student, taught by Miss Woolstenhorne, and almost invariably won the annual prize for art awarded by Mrs Gwen Pollock, herself a well-known artist, Marjorie recalls.

The noted fenland artist, Anthony Day has good reason to remember both ladies. He writes: "After a few weeks part-time study at the Cambridge School of Art in 1947 I became a full-time student in January 1948. At this time Beryl Pickering was a part-time teacher there, where she had originally studied in the 1930s or 40s. On the day of my arrival I spent my time painting from a studio window before joining the class heading for the Intermediate Examination in Arts and Crafts. Beryl was the teacher. I still have the laboured watercolours I did under her tuition. Grace Pollard was a respected member of the Cambridge Drawing Society and I was given one of her watercolours after her death."

Tony's own paintings of the fens, town and country can be seen at his studio on Pond Green, Wicken as part of Cambridge Open Studios 2009 each weekend throughout July, 11am-6pm.

Jenny O'Dell emails to say that her later father Frederick J. Foster also sketched areas of Cambridge. He, and his father before him, had a shoe repair shop on Mill Road which opened about 1930 and closed about 1973, although Fred continued to live in the flat above the shop until he died. He won a few prizes with the Boot Trades Association for shoe repairing in the early 1950s. This was not a normal repair but a repair with artwork on the sole and heel outlined with tiny brass nails. He was quite well known in the area at the time, do you remember him?

Alec Forshaw grew up in a house on the corner Histon Road and Roseford Road, Cambridge in the 1950s and 1960s. There were few shops but a variety of travelling tradesmen supplied the family's needs.

Alec recalls: "Several times a week a Hovis baker's van would stop outside on Histon Road and the driver would come and knock on our side door. My mother would always buy a large brown loaf. On Thursdays there was a well-stocked fish van, and we were probably one of its early stops as it trundled out to Histon and the villages beyond. The fish man didn't come to the house, but had a hand bell to alert the neighbourhood.

"Our house depended on coal for heating, with an open fire in the front room and an enclosed fire in the dining room which also heated the hot water. The coalman was ordered through Underwood's hardware shop and came several times a year, a shifty character with filthy hands, smudges of black on his face and a greasy black cap perched on his mop of tousled black hair. His open lorry had flaps at the side so that he could ease the grey sacks onto his back, and then half run, half stagger up our gravel drive to the corrugated iron coal bunker beside the garage. He spoke with a gruff mutter, and I made sure I kept out of his way.

"The rag and bone man was even shiftier, and he used a short whip to urge his pony to a trot. 'Any old iron?' was his cry, but he seemed grateful to take anything. He was so thin and poorly dressed that I assumed that the rags and bones applied to him.

"Our favourite caller was Mr Wiseman. He ran a market garden in Cottenham where he grew potatoes, carrots, turnips, cauliflowers and cabbages, and on Saturdays he did deliveries around the local villages. He worked long hours, and often didn't come until late in the afternoon or early evening. His veined cheeks were cherry red and he always wore a light brown working coat, cloth cap and woollen gloves with the fingers cut off. He would knock on the door, take my mother's order, then scuttle back to his truck, returning with the vegetables and to take the money. One of his pockets chinked with coins. He always seemed in a hurry and out of breath, and my parents often said that he worked too hard and too late, particularly on dark winter evenings..

"The dustmen and their smelly cart came on Mondays, a gang of men who my mother described as 'uncouth'. We had a metal bin with a metal lid which made a loud clatter as they threw it on the paving. As if to irritate everyone, they never put the lids back on the bins and usually managed to scatter some rubbish on the road. We did our fair bit of recycling, with a compost heap at the bottom of the garden and a separate pile for the ashes from the fire. We kept paper and cardboard to burn on bonfires, and milk bottles were always washed out and put in the crate for collection. Nothing much came in plastic, so it was only tins or cartons, or uneaten meat and fish bones which went in the bin.

"Less frequent callers included a window cleaner who somehow managed to ride his bike carrying his ladder and pail, and a white-haired lady who only had her own two feet for transport and who sold clothes pegs, buttons, ribbons and reels of cotton. Most exciting was the chimney sweep who had a little Baby Austin van to carry his equipment. On his word we would rush out into the garden to see the brush pushed up on its rods and thrust out above the chimney pots. My mother was less enthusiastic about clearing up the dust afterwards.”

Alec grew up in Cambridge, attending Milton Road Infants and Cambridgeshire High School for Boys from which he went to Jesus College, spanning the town-gown divide. Now he has moved away to central London but set down his reminiscences in ‘Growing up in Cambridge: from austerity to prosperity’ (History Press, £12.99 - ISBN 978 0 7524 5004 9)

Pauline Robson seeks your help. She emails: A friend and I are in the process of writing the life story of a 94 year old living in Yorkshire. During the war this gentleman served in the army and after Dunkirk he remembers coming back to Dover. On his arrival the troops were served tea and packed off by rail to Cambridge where they marched through the streets. There was no military accommodation for them and in these desperate times there was a general appeal to householders to take soldiers into their homes for a few days. He remembers women in white aprons standing by their doors in the terraced streets, shouting out how many men they could take. ‘I can take three,’ ‘Send me four,’ ‘Two over here,’ ‘Go to the Church Hall.’ We would love to pin the above down to a specific area in Cambridge and bearing in mind its proximity to the station we think it could be around Mill Road.

If you can help email Pauline Robson at probsonis@googlemail.com or drop me a line and I’ll put you in touch.

And whilst mentioning ‘Pauline’, you may remember we had an appeal from Ian Wallace of Burton-on-Trent who was trying to track down a lady of that name who he knew in the 1950s. Thanks to News readers we have identified her, but there will be no happy reunion as sadly it seems that she has passed away.

Last week the latest report on Cambridge traffic problems was published. Amongst all its suggestions there was nothing about reopening New Square car park.

But as a photograph lent me by Christine Newman of Cherry Hinton shows, this was once a major facility for both visitors, residents and tanker owners – or at least it was when Somerlite oils chose to line up their tankers for a publicity photograph. Her dad drove one of the small delivery vans that toured various villages throughout the week and Cambridge town centre on Saturdays. It could be dangerous work: he always wore leather spats which came almost to his knees as some of the customers’ dogs would nip his ankles, she recalls.

I remember parking on New Square as being one of the perks of working for Cambridge City Council in the decade before Local Government Reorganisation in 1974. In those distant days the central Reference library in Wheeler Street was open until nine at night and so it was handy to have a parking place just across Christ's Pieces after the late shift.

New Square was developed by Jesus College as a spacious urban development in the 1830s, the houses overlooking a green park. Postcards from the Edwardian age show elegant ladies and gentlemen strolling across as they make their way to the town centre. By the 1920s photographs show a truly rural area with cows grazing on grass which resembles a meadow.

But change was in the air. With the growth of the motor car came the demand for somewhere to park them. In 1925 a small piece of Christ's Pieces was taken as part of a scheme for a combined bus station and car park at Drummer Street. This caused great protest with a mass meeting lobbying the Mayor to demand that the council change its mind on the desecration of such an important open space. Nevertheless the scheme went ahead.

Within a few years the car parking problem was again acute and eyes and in February 1929 Cambridge councillors debated converting New Square into a parking place. One commented: "If I lived in New Square I should not be at all pleased at the idea of that nice little patch of green giving way to a parking place, but if I had a business establishment in Fitzroy Street I should say 'Yes, let the cars park there by all means'. There was a danger of New Square being built upon in the near future and residents might consider a car park the least of two evils. Opponents urged the Cambridge Daily News to take a stand but the paper commented: "Most people smile when they think of the tremendous agitation worked up against Drummer Street ... but nobody is one penny the worse. The only fault is that Drummer Street was not big enough ..."

In 1932 after all the controversy and heated arguments there was no excitement at the opening of the New Square parking place. The council turned up in force and from under the shelter of umbrellas watched the Mayoress drive her car through the pale blue ribbon that had been knotted across the opening. At last motorists had a place where they could leave their cars and not come into the police courts. The Master of Jesus suggested that path inside the trees should be known as Coleridge Walk.

At first nobody seemed to use it: a correspondent to the News commented in April 'Sir – as motorists do not appear to need the new New Square car park I suggest something useful should be done with it. It could be turned into tennis courts or used as a model yacht pond, a skating rink or the site for the new Guildhall. Meanwhile the surface should be coloured an appropriate shade of green as the white grey of the desolate expanse of concrete hurts my eyes. And could passers-by spare a few books for the attendant to read while he is waiting for the customers who never come". Soon motorists discovered it and it was packed with 188 cars.

But it also provides a suitable venue for a demonstration of the wonderful non-skid properties of Michelin Zigzag tyres. About 5,000 people turned out to watch in July 1933 when it was drenched with water and two Austin Sevens, a Morris '14' commercial van and a Citroen saloon went whizzing round at a dizzy speed, twisting, turning, swerving abruptly to right and left, corkscrewing and turning figures of eight in a perfectly hair-raising fashion. Their tyres gripped like octopuses.

By 1950 over 43,000 vehicles a year were using it, despite the increase of other parking areas. Park Street multi-storey car park opened in 1963, Queen Anne Terrace in 1971 and Lion Yard a few years later – but still New Square continued. It was improved by the addition of a pedestrian bridge in 1966. Then came proposals for a comprehensive redevelopment of the Kite Area to include more provision for cars. One element of the plan was that New Square should revert to grass. Thus it was that the concrete was removed and in 1983 nature regained ground previously lost to the motor car.

But do you remember it?

Memories 3rd August 2009, by Mike Petty

Last Wednesday's News contained two stories that caught my eye. One was the restoration of the lock gates at Jesus Green, the other a report on plans for the future of Cambridge transport.

Jesus Green lock is a picturesque part of the river scene but when it was constructed in the 1830s it was an essential part of the town's commerce. In those days many of the commodities on which the town relied came down the river from King's Lynn. The construction of Denver Sluice in the 1650s had blocked the tides which formerly swept boats well inland and led to the need to construct a series of works to enable the trade to continue.

One of these was to cut a new straight River Ouse between Littleport and Ely – something commemorated in the name of the Cutter Inn. The other was the building of a number of locks to allow barges to reach Cambridge. One of these had been in front of the Fort St George public house on Midsummer Common but this was replaced by a new one at Jesus Green. Yet within a couple of decades all that work was rendered superfluous when a new form of transport, the railway, arrived in 1845. Its metal lines could carry more weight, more quickly and the old system was doomed to a slow decline.

Now the Cambridgeshire Transport Commission report considers new systems of transport including trams, metro or an elevated trackway. Others say there should be an underground tunnel. All these have been debated, and rejected before. There were proposals for a tunnel under New Square in 1968 and a plan to tunnel under The Backs surfaced in 1981. The elevated railway became a reality near Earith until the project was scrapped because of cost in 1973

In Cambridge the tramway did become a reality. It opened in 1880 to convey people from the railway station into the town centre. It killed off the previous system of horse buses but the horse-drawn trams were slower than the newly-developed petrol buses which arrived in 1905. One proposal was electrification but this would have meant power lines which would have disfigured the streets.

The trams faced other problems: they relied on specialist vehicles and when these wore out they were expensive to replace. Such vehicles could only go where there were tram lines and these were very costly to install. They were also expensive to maintain. It was these infrastructure costs that were cited as the reason for the trams' closure in 1914. Today small fragments of tram lines are museum pieces.

By contrast the nineteenth-century investment in the locks and sluices is still proving beneficial although the boats that now use them today are vastly different from the horse-drawn barges they were designed for.

So how will the future look back on plans for elevated trackways (or indeed guided bus routes)?

The search for Pauline is over.

Back in June Ian Wallace from Burton-on-Trent got in touch with me seeking information on a young lady he met when he came up to Clare College in 1954. But there was more to Cambridge than study and Ian met a stunning dark five-foot-six brunette with hour-glass figure, called Pauline. She made a great impression on him in the few months they knew each other but then their worlds moved apart.

However her memory never quite left him and after 50 years Ian felt increasingly reluctant to allow such a peerless young woman to disappear into the mists of time. So he set out to discover anybody who may have known her. Sadly he had forgotten her surname and task seemed impossible. For years his search proved fruitless, then he phoned me and I promised to mention it in 'Memories'

As soon as she read my column of 22nd June Mrs Ann Brown realised that she might know the identity of the Cambridge belle of the mid-1950s. It could be that it was Pauline Jenkins, one of five children in a local family. I put Ann in touch directly with Ian and over two weeks they slowly worked out memories and clues. Everything fitted and so Ann approached Pauline's relatives, starting with her sister. The news was not good: Pauline had died in 2005 within months of Ian starting his search. It seemed he would still end up without knowing about her later life.

But happily on 16th July Ian got a call from Pauline's daughter Karen who was willing to meet him. From the moment he saw Karen he knew the search was over: she was a vividly beautiful as her mother! For four hours they put together their two families' stories and compared photos and other mementoes of Pauline. In short, she had indeed turned the heads of many undergraduates in the 50s and won the hearts of several up to the rank of an Indian Prince!

Pauline Jenkins stayed lovely all her 69 years and her sense of fun and compassion for others is particularly remembered by her two children.

And Ian Wallace has proved that even without a surname you can find lost loves. You just have to keep telling people how wonderful they were.

Over the five years of search for Pauline over a dozen Cantabrigians tried to help Ian. I am really pleased to have been the one who provided the penultimate piece of the jigsaw that means he can put the final full-stop to this chapter of his memories.

Avril Tabor from Hauxton can identify the Somerlite tanker drivers I featured in Memories on the 17th July.

From the left they are Harold Tabor (her late father-in-law), Dennis Tabor (her husband), Mr Crinks, Mr Howchin and, far right, Phil Clarke. The two suited gentlemen by the fourth tanker were the Company secretary, Mr Ingamells and the Managing Director, Mr Bass. One of the fleet was missing from the photograph taken in late 1949 or early 1950 as it was working that day, it was driven by Don Stearn Avril also lends me a picture of one of R.C. Brown's Foden vans from around 1920 when it was used as a removals lorry. The driver was Bert Moden, her husband's late uncle.

Such unusual vehicles stimulate interest. Recently contributors to the News' online Messageboard have been discussing the old Sentinel steam wagons that were used by the Cambridge gasworks

'AJT' remembers when there used to be two of them trundling up and down Coldham's Lane all day long. They used to load at the Company's railway siding, where the Beehive site now is. There the coal trucks were lifted up and turned over onto the tipper/elevator which loaded the steam wagons for transport to the gasworks off Newmarket Road.

'60's Man' recalls: When I was a nipper I lived with mum and dad and little sister at Brandon Place. It was a lovely terraced house, a bit like Coronation Street, with two up and two down, a cold water tap, gas lighting and a toilet down the bottom of the garden, (chilly in winter). On Saturdays we took the wheels off the pram and went to the rag and bone man on Newmarket Road, next to The Bird in Hand pub, with our potato sack full of rags. We got our pennies for them and then it was a walk up to the gas works to get our sack filled with coke. At the main gate sitting on the weighbridge on numerous occasions was a Sentinel Steam Wagon. It was a monster truck, getting up steam, puffing, hissing and blowing before it took off to Coldham's Lane and came back with its load of coal.

Things changed in March 1956 as the News reported: A fire-eating gargantuan of a bygone era made its final journey when a steam-powered 'Super Sentinel Wagon' completed its last run at the end of a degrading tow from another vehicle. For the monster, which started service with the Gas Company in 1928, is no longer able to run on its own steam. It now stands in Messrs Silverman's scrapyard in Ditton Walk awaiting the oxy-acetylene cutters which will render it a heap of metal.

But the Sentinels were not finished with just yet. In November the second steam-powered lorry was brought back into commission as a means of conserving petrol. This one had been delivered to Tarmac new in 1933 SIX WHEELER and bought by the Gas Company after the war. Now preserved and owned by the Worshipful Company of Paviers, it is unique in being the only wholly original 6-wheel tipper in existence with a top speed of 40 mph on the open road.

Such vehicles were not the most manoeuvrable: in April 1930 one crashed into the taproom of the White Lion public house at Melbourn. The wagon was about to pass a Co-op van when the driver saw another vehicle approaching. He swerved and crashed through the wall. Two men were in the taproom at the time but they escaped injury as did the driver and his mate. Fortunately the building was of plaster, or more serious injuries would undoubtedly have resulted to the men. Part of the house had to be propped up and traffic was diverted for some time.

Do you have memories of such vehicles or were you a furniture remover?

On the right is a notice that reads 'Bridge Taxis' with the telephone number 57080. I'm fairly sure it's a Pye works outing near the Barnwell railway bridge, Newmarket Road in June 1954. The search for Pauline is over.

Back in June Ian Wallace from Burton-on-Trent got in touch with me seeking information on a young lady he met when he came up to Clare College in 1954. She was a stunning dark five-foot-six brunette with hour-glass figure, called Pauline. who made a great impression on him in the few months they knew each other. But then their worlds moved apart.

However her memory never quite left him and after 50 years Ian felt increasingly reluctant to allow such a peerless young woman to disappear into the mists of time. So he set out to discover anybody who may have known her. Sadly he had forgotten her surname and task seemed impossible. For years his search proved fruitless, then he phoned me and I promised to mention it in 'Memories'.

As soon as she read my column of 22nd June Mrs Ann Brown realised that she might know the identity of the Cambridge belle of the mid-1950s. It could be that it was Pauline Jenkins, one of five children in a local family. I put Ann in touch directly with Ian and over two weeks they slowly worked out memories and clues. Everything fitted and so Ann approached Pauline's relatives, starting with her sister. The news was not good: Pauline had died in 2005 within months of Ian starting his search. It seemed he would still end up without knowing about her later life.

But happily on 16th July Ian got a call from Pauline's daughter Karen who was willing to meet him. From the moment he saw Karen he knew the search was over: she was a vividly beautiful as her mother! For four hours they put together their two families' stories and compared photos and other mementoes of Pauline. In short, she had indeed turned the heads of many undergraduates in the 50s and won the hearts of several up to the rank of an Indian Prince!

Pauline Jenkins stayed lovely all her 69 years and her sense of fun and compassion for others is particularly remembered by her two children.

And Ian Wallace has proved that even without a surname you can find lost loves. You just have to keep telling people how wonderful they were.

Over the five years of search for Pauline over a dozen Cantabrigians tried to help Ian. I am really pleased to have been the one who provided the penultimate piece of the jigsaw that means he can put the final full-stop to this chapter of his memories.

IAN WALLACE'S SKETCH OF 'PAULINE'; NOW HE FINALLY KNOWS HER STORY

Monica Smith from Cambridge responded to my request for information as to where the soldiers rescued from the beaches of Dunkirk were billeted in Cambridge. She writes that some stayed with her family in Gwydir Street: "I remember the soldiers being lined up in the road and each householder was asked how many bedrooms we had. It was expected that there'd be two adults to each double room and as we had two doubles and one single we took in two soldiers. They slept in a double bed and were still staying with us when the bombs dropped on Vicarage Terrace", she recalls. In 1945 families who had given a home to the evacuated troops organised a street party to celebrate of the end of the war in Europe

Community magazines are excellent ways of keeping in touch with the local area. Recently in 'Duxford Chatterbox' Philip Wade reflected on the names on the village's Great War memorial. About 100 men had gone out to fight from that small community, fifteen of whom did not return. Afterwards in commemoration of peace Albert and Ellen Haylock gave their son, Herbert, the second name of "Armistice".

The peace did not last and Herbert was captured in Singapore whilst serving with 287 Field Company, Royal Engineers. He died as a POW on Saturday 25 September 1943 and was buried near the River Kwai in Burma.

A few days after the magazine was issued letter the postman brought a letter from Mary Wakefield of Great Shelford. She wrote: I am Herbert's sister, now 96 and I must thank you for the trouble you have taken to remember him and my parents. Herbert worked for Mr Marriott the butcher and used to deliver meat to his customers, so he was well known. One of the “highlights” of his job in December was to take joints to the Rev Browning who labelled them to be delivered as Christmas presents to various village folk.

It is appreciations like this that make all the hard work put in by volunteers to compile such newsletters well worth while.

The Castle Inn in St Andrew’s Street was one of Cambridge’s most famous old hotels situated immediately opposite Emmanuel College.

It was one of the rarest of places: an old house whose story was told in its architecture, a generous table and comfort without glitter. A writer in The English Illustrated Magazine for 1904 described how on alighting at the inn door he received a courteous welcome from the host and enjoyed happy conversations with farmers who left their horses in the inn’s yard. He dined on soup of a quality expected from a chef who had been at Queens’ college followed by cod cooked at the moment of perfect firmness and washed down by a glass of Worthington’s beer, then there was a kingly sirloin before finishing with baked apple and cream.

But above all it was the atmosphere of the place: the old beams and old staircases which seemed to speak of the thousands of people who had enjoyed its hospitality for centuries.

All that changed just 75 years ago in August 1934 when smoke was spotted pouring through its ancient gabled windows. Within moments St Andrew’s Street was almost completely obscured in a great cloud of exceptional blackness and density, reported the Cambridge Daily News, whose offices were just down the street. Soon the adjacent shops – Collins’ Typewriters and Domestic Servants’ Agency, Richards and Rees the art needleworker - were being advised to remove what they could.

Dozens of volunteers rescued furniture as ancient tiles showered down from the crumbling roof. One room that attracted their attention was that in which Oliver Cromwell was said to have slept, still containing furniture from that period. They also carefully removed crates of beer from the bar, though bottles of liquor were heard breaking in the intense heat.

Firemen were quickly on the scene – their station was almost next door – and every available policeman was withdrawn from other duties to play their part. Together they fought the ever-increasing blaze and, although their efforts hindered at first by a shortage of water, eventually the powerful jets of the brigade’s two motor fire engines began to win the battle.

Despite their efforts the front of the old gabled inn was destroyed along with the bars and 14 bedrooms above. It was thought these had been rebuilt about 1620. A large dining room and about 30 bedrooms in the more recent extension of 1891 survived.

Plans were made to rebuilt but the damage was just too great and the hotel was demolished in January 1936 to make way for a new Regal Cinema. Its name however lives on in the pub nearby

Last week's picture of a day trip to Brighton has sparked memories. David Burling emails:

I was on this day out and I guess I am somewhere in the crowd but cannot identify myself. Going all the way to Brighton by train from Cambridge, no changes, and by a long circuitous route around London, it turned out to be a very long but very enjoyable day. The weather was generally kind to us. There were two trains that day taking the large number of employees from Pye and some of its smaller associated companies from the Cambridge area, so you can imagine how crowded Cambridge station was, and the large number of visitors that hit Brighton on our arrival. I do remember one very amusing incident from this trip and that was at Brighton station late that evening awaiting the train for the return trip. We had to make sure that we got on the right train and the announcer, who was located on the platform itself, was informing us of this. But, as with all these trips it wasn't long before some of the girls had moved into his booth and took over the announcing themselves, announcements which amused not only us, but also the many other travellers on the station. It certainly would not happen today!! Interesting Memories Mike, well done, keep it going!

Thanks Dave – but I do need help from readers like yourself digging through your old files

John Wakefield can tell me more about the vehicle featured in the picture. The double decker County of West Suffolk was HVE 402, one of three identical Daimler CVD6 double decker coaches with Wilks & Meade bodywork that were new to Premier Travel in 1950. The other two were County of Cambridgeshire (HVE 401) and County of Essex (HVE 403). Premier Travel intended to operate the three double deck coaches on express services, but the licencing authorities at the time put restrictions on the intended routes. Apart from some private hire & excursion work the vehicles were later relegated to more mundane local service bus work. Quality problems with the bodies despite rebuilding at one stage, resulted in all three being scrapped by 1966. Premier Travel had contracts with Pye in the 1950's & 60's to provide works transport from outlying areas, he emails.

Memories, 31st August 2009, by Mike Petty

Did you see John, Paul, George and Ringo in the 60's? If so Martin Creasey wants to hear from you.

He is researching a new book aimed at telling as full a story as possible of the six UK tours of The Beatles between the beginning of 1963 and the end of 1965.

He has already interviewed fans, reporters, photographers, musicians from bands that toured with them, plus staff from the boarding houses where they stayed and the venues where they played. Now he's researching it gig by gig, town by town, and would like to hear from fans who saw either the Montez/Roe tour at the Regal in Cambridge on Tuesday, March 19, 1963 or The Beatles own headline winter tour performance there on Tuesday November 26, 1963.

The same principle applies - are any of the Regal staff such as projectionists or usherettes still around today – or even the girls who sold the ice creams? Reporters/photographers who covered the show will also have a story to tell. And where did the Beatles stay afterwards? he asks.

Martin's previous book - Legends On Tour, the Pop Package Tours Of The 1960s, included a section on The Beatles, but this book is devoted entirely to them. People may think it has all been told, but there are those who were there with a story to tell and he's interested in talking to them.

One who has already done so is Michael Howard, MP was present at the performance given by The Beatles at the Regal cinema in Cambridge that March. Mr Howard recalls: "My most abiding memory of the concert at the Regal was that it was impossible to hear any of the music because of the screaming of the fans. I don't suppose that was unique later on but I imagine that was one of the earliest examples of that phenomenon."

Just to jog your memories it was at the Regal cinema on 19th March 1963 that Cambridge fans got their first glimpse of "a four man 'rock' group with weird hairstyles as a gimmick" who sang and played their current hits "Love Me Do" & "Please Please Me". The four lads from Liverpool, John Lennon, Paul McCartney, George Harrison and Ringo Starr were part of a bill that included bigger name stars such as Chris Montez, Tommy Roe, Debbie Lee & the Viscounts. Despite the wealth of talent the News reporter was not impressed: "The fast moving show was not the best Cambridge audiences have seen"

But then Cambridge audiences were used to these touring shows; Cliff Richard, Adam Faith, Billy Fury & Phil Everley had played the venue in previous months, as had Eden Kane, Dave Clarke and various others. One of the biggest names of all, The Rolling Stones were to appear that September.

In November 1963 The Beatles returned, but by then their debut album "Please Please Me" had soared to the top of the album charts and a subsequent single, "She Loves You", sold 1.6 million copies in the UK alone. Beatlemania was in full flow. Wherever they went, they were mobbed by screaming fans.

The queue for tickets stretched round the building controlled by members of Cambridge Police's 12-strong Vespa motor scooter squad including Roy Coxon, one-time goalkeeper for Cambridge Town Football Club & Jock Urquart. The Red Cross had dozens of men ready for fainting or hysteria amongst the 4000 in the audience.

Rosemary Preston was there. She recalled in previous a 'Memories' article: "We heard nothing because of the screaming, but had a really good time just seeing them. They had the Shelford rugby club at the front of the stage to stop people trying to get onto it. The next morning my mother came to my room with a copy of the Daily Express in her hand with a photograph of me and a couple of my friends at the concert screaming. The caption was 'City of learning and culture bends to the sound'. The date November 27th, 1963"

After the show, the Fab Four were smuggled out. The News reported how it took the four young Beatles less than a minute to run down a flight of stairs back-stage and scramble into their van. A Black Maria, with headlamps blazing, headed along Downing Place to where the screaming fans were waiting. But the Beatles were not in it.

They were in another van driven by police sergeant Arthur Quinney, who went through a back gate into the University Downing Street site and then along Tennis Court Road, Lensfield Road, Gonville Place and Parkside to arrive at another back door – that of the University Arms Hotel where they spent the night. Getting them out next morning was another matter as hundreds of fans blocked the road causing traffic chaos as they waited for the Beatles to continue their journey to the next venue, York.

So what can you add to the Cambridge side of the story. You can email Martin.creasy@talk21.com or drop me a line and I'll put you in touch. But please also share your memories and any snaps with other News readers through 'Memories'

Martin is also anxious to track down people who saw them at the other venues during 1963. He tells me that there are some of the earliest performances that seem to have been almost forgotten – do put him right!

Jim Goodrum is seeking information on 'Goodrum's Dairies'. He emails: "I visited the Edenbridge & Oxted Agriculture Show in Surrey recently and whilst walking through the various stalls I caught sight of a painted milk churn embossed 'Goodrum's Dairies, Cambridge'. As this is my name you will appreciate why this caught my eye! The seller had no details but I bought it as a feature for our garden."

It seems the dairy was based at Hemingford Road, just off Mill Road until the 1960s or 70s and at one time drove their cows along to Coldham's Common between milkings. In 1999 David Sharpe of Darwin Drive told me his father had driven their de luxe milk float which featured car type wheels and hubcaps, chrome handrails & a lovely padded seat. Can you tell me more or email jgoodrum@hotmail.co.uk

Such once-familiar sights prompt memories. Back in 1999 Mrs Peggy Brutnell then of Howard Road, Cambridge recalled how her Granddad, Bob Beamiss worked for Arnold's Dairies. He rose at 4.30 in the morning to milk the cows which were housed in a cowshed in Abbey Street then drove them along Newmarket Road & down Auckland Road onto Midsummer Common. She also remembered being taken in her uncle's pony & trap on the daily milkround, sitting on a little seat beside the huge churn of milk & watching him skilfully tip a pint into the customer's own jug.

Despite the care it was difficult to ensure absolute cleanliness and inevitably some customers got more cream than others, all of which lead to new laws and regulations.

There was another major problem: in the days before refrigeration milk very quickly went sour and needed to be market as soon as possible. With the spread of a network of railway lines village farmers delivered milk in churns to the station for onwards transit to a town dairy. Any that was off by the time it arrived was not paid for, adding to the problems that were seeing farmers going bankrupt.

In the 1930s the Government established a Milk Marketing Board to collect and market milk, ensuring the producer a guaranteed price for each gallon. This was by no means a straightforward operation and from the 1960s it was Bert Collacott's job to make sure that it ran smoothly in this area.

In those days the farmer left the heavy churns full of milk on a raised platform by the roadside so that they could be more easily lifted into the collection lorry. But the churns became dented making it difficult to ensure they contained the precise amount of milk specified. Later bulk collection in refrigerated tankers was introduced. This had to continue each day, every day, no matter what the weather or the state of the road leading down to the farm. Then at the dairy the milk was checked, processed and bottled ready for delivery.

At every stage hygiene was essential and Bert recalls various instances when he had to remonstrate with farmers whose standards had slipped, with the ultimate sanction of stopping the daily visit of the milk tanker.

On one occasion he went with a chemist to visit a producer who was disputing a hygiene test result. After inspecting the milking equipment and premises they were invited to the farmhouse kitchen to discuss the issue in detail. "The kitchen was not particularly clean and at one point we spotted a mouse roaming around the furniture. The lady of house produced a brush and pan and calmly without comment swept the mouse into the pan and deposited it in a kitchen bin. Shortly after this we were each given a mug of tea. Fortunately we were left alone in the room for a few minutes, the chemist deposited his tea in a flower pot and mine went down the sink. The chemist and I thought the mouse incident was a regular routine, and the mouse was quite used to it. It was probably released or escaped after we left", Bert recalls

Now similar co-operative schemes are being proposed in Holland, Belgium and Germany. But in Britain the Milk Marketing Board became a casualty of EEC Bureaucracy in 1994, leaving producers at the mercy of the supermarkets. Since then dairy farmers receive 10% less than they used to whilst consumers pay 50% more for their pinta. And the morning visit of the milkman has largely passed into history.

Bert Collacott has written a most amusing but detailed book 'Black Sheep, Cattle Breeding and Orderly Marketing of Milk'. It should be essential reading for anyone whose family once kept a cow and sold the surplus milk. Sadly it will not be, for very few copies have been produced. They cost £12.99 including postage from Bert on Cambridge 564804 or email him – A.Collacott@ntlworld.com.

In recent months some 50 groups have been busy searching out and scanning photographs as part of the Cambridgeshire Community Archives Network. Now hundreds of images can be consulted at their website <http://www.ccan.co.uk>. But for the Swavesey group this is not enough and they have now published a book entitled 'Swavesey: a pictorial history' with the aid of a Lottery Grant with all the proceeds going to village organisations. Copies can be obtained from Roger Holland at 45 Gibraltar Lane, Swavesey CB24 4RR (01954 230077) price £10. It includes a picture of milk churns being loaded on to a train at Swavesey station in the 1920s

One of the all-time greats of aviation, Wing-Commander Ken Wallis, is seeking your help in adding the final details to one chapter in his remarkable story. It revolves around a plane built in a garden shed in St Barnabas Road, Cambridge.

He writes: “My father, Horace, & his younger brother, Percival, were the middle brothers of four, in their father’s wholesale grocery & tea importing & blending business. Early in the 1900s the Sunlight Soap Company offered a ‘Rex’ Motorcycle for some enormous number of coupons that went with their soap. Being in the trade my father & uncle purchased a large number from a retailer which is how they got their first motorcycle”. The brothers soon acquired on old Blacksmith's forge where they made their own versions.

Then in 1908 they went to France, where they saw a Wright ‘Flyer’ aeroplane with a Prestwich aero-engine. The moment they returned home they started to build a monoplane in a shed in their garden utilising the same materials they’d previously used for the motorbike. Their father subsidised them as there was to be a £1,000 prize for the first ‘All-British’ aeroplane to fly a mile. He paid £300 for the aero-engine only to find it was fitted with a German ‘Bosch’ magneto, so could not have qualified as “All-British”.

In May 1910 the brothers exhibited their ‘Wallbro’ aeroplane at their home. Over 200 people flocked to St Barnabas Road and paid sixpence for admission. The machine was staked down securely and the motor set running twice each day. But while it was going the brass boss of the propeller became unscrewed and fell off on to one of the blades, causing some slight damage.

A month later it was put on display again, this time in Few’s Barn near the river in Old Chesterton during the May Races where it attracted large numbers of visitors. A News reporter described it as “a large and graceful-looking craft and looks a real flyer although its capacities have not been tested as it is only just completed”. It had been designed by the Wallis brothers together with C. Knightley, P. Booth and E. Muller, all of Chesterton, in their spare time. Can you add any details about these men?

The report goes on to give a detailed technical description: its framework was of spruce and bamboo, it was covered by a special aeroplane fabric and it was fitted with elm skids to take up the shock of landing and there are details of the controls. But, says the paper, it was to be initially tried as a glider mounted on a carriage with three cycle wheels so it could be pushed downhill to give the glider a start. If the experiments were successful a petrol motor of 25 to 30 horse power might be installed. It was hoped to try it in the air within a fortnight.

By early July a motor had been fitted and the plane was taken to a field near Abington. Percy Wallis made a successful run to test the pulling power of the engine, covering half a mile at a speed of a little over 20 mph. Then he turned the machine round and started back. At first the monoplane skimmed lightly along the ground on its pneumatic-tyred wheels but then it suddenly rose completely off the ground and sailed along at a height of three or four feet. It appeared to lift quite evenly, both back and front, being nearly horizontal and continued like this for several yards. Then the back was seen to lift in the air and the front to sink towards the ground. It slid forward on its skids but the tail continued to rise. Finding himself unable to right the machine Percy stopped the engine and sprang off. He was only a few feet from the ground and was unhurt but the monoplane slowly turned a complete somersault, eventually landing upside down with its wheels in the air like some giant insect on its back.

The propeller was smashed to atoms and the left wing considerably damaged. It was thought that either a sudden gust of wind had lifted the tail or the balance of the craft was not quite right. Probably the driver's seat was too far forward and made the machine too heavy in front. It would take a fortnight to repair, they thought.

By the 1st August 1910 the repaired plane was on display again, this time at the Mammoth Show on Jesus Green where hundreds more flocked to see it. Organisers decided that the crowds were so great that it would not be safe to attempt a flight. But what happened to the Wallbro Monoplane after that?

Aviation was dangerous and the papers carried reports of disasters and accidents that resulted in the death of the Hon. Charles Rolls and a Belgian aviator. It also seemed that rising costs would threaten aviation meetings. Ken Wallis believes his grandfather realised there was to be no quick return from the monoplane project and ordered his sons back to the family business. The machine was apparently destroyed in its shed during a freak windstorm in mid December 1910.

But the story does not end there. In 1912 Horace Wallis married Emily May Barker, who had been a school-mistress in Cambridge. She'd got very annoyed when her pupils left their desks to watch the strange apparition of the "Wallbro" Monoplane being towed past their window, wings folded, behind a Pratt 's Motor Spirit van, itself pulled by a giant cart-horse!

Ken is their son. He learned to fly at Marshall's airfield on a 'Gypsy Moth' gaining his licence in April 1937. A few days afterwards he drove to a field near Caxton Gibbet where he hired an early 'motorised glider' and went off solo in this very different type of aircraft. Later he developed a new type of autogyro in which he won numerous world records – one when flying from Wyton in October 1984. He is still flying today from his home in Norfolk

He also reconstructed the 'Wallbro', using the newspaper reports as a guide for some of the technical details, to see whether his father and uncle had got it right. They had: the plane took to the air in 1978 (though, as Ken says, he did have the advantage of knowing how to fly!) It is now preserved at the Norfolk and Suffolk Aviation Museum at Flixton, near Bungay, where they are preparing to mark the centenary of the first plane to be built in Cambridge.

If you can add anything to the story please drop me a line or email Ian Hancock, Ken's biographer - ianhancock@tinyworld.co.uk

extra information

The brothers certainly became very active in the early days of motorcycle racing & Ken has cuttings in which it said "The Wallis brothers sorted out the opposition, then fought to see who would be First". They had soon acquired an old Blacksmith's forge & were making their own racing motorcycles, bracing the frames with Accles & Pollock steel tubing & "Chater Lea" lugs, making wheels & belt rims with spokes & nipples, & using a 2¾ hp J.A. Prestwich engine.

Then in 1908 they went to France, where they saw a version of the Wright "Flyer" demonstrated and a V-4 J.A. Prestwich "Aero-Engine". The moment they returned home they started the build what became known as 'The Wallbro Monoplane' in a shed in the garden of 12 St.Barnabas Road. They made all the primary structure of the same materials they'd previously used in their motorbike and their father subsidised this project, as there was to be a £1,000 prize for the first "All-British Aeroplane to Fly a Mile". He paid £300 for the V-4 J.A. Prestwich aero-engine, such as the brothers had seen exhibited in France.

The project then suffered a serious setback when it was discovered that the J.A.P., engine was fitted with a German "Bosch" magneto, so could not have qualified as "All-British". It did indeed do a few hops", on a field beside which is now the A-11, with the Fulbourn/Teversham Flyover just to its North and was then destroyed in its shed in a freak windstorm. My grandfather, realising there was to be no quick return from the Monoplane project, ordered his sons back to the family business.

However, in 1911 it must have been realised that war with Germany was imminent. There were to be big Army manoeuvres in East Anglia. . The Army had no skilled motorcyclists to act as Despatch Riders & asked for skilled civilian volunteers to undertake the task.

My father & uncle quickly volunteered & their quite patriotic father agreed to release them for this. It proved to be the way the brothers escaped the family business. Uncle Percy started a motor business in Cambridge. He also acquired the Central Cinemas &, later, the Tivoli.

My father, & his younger brother, Garnet, in 1912 set up the "Walbro", (this time with one "I"), Cycle & Motorcycle Works, at Lynn Road, Ely.

In 1912 my father had married Emily May Barker, who had been a school-mistress in Cambridge. She had been very annoyed when her pupils left their desks to watch the strange apparition of the "Wallbro" Monoplane being towed past their window, wings folded, behind a Pratt 's Motor Spirit van, itself pulled by a giant cart-horse!

Subsequently, through the Cambridge Photographic Society, she met Horace Wallis. She must have determined to keep him in order in future by marrying him. So, but for aircraft & photography I would not be here!

Father quickly bought his brother, carnet, out of the "Walbro" at Ely. It was certainly in that business that I gained my practical experience.

I notice with interest you mention, under "1910", "Wallbro" airplane exhibited at 'Mammoth Show, destroyed in storm when hangar collapses (3,23,5,5)

The latter part is indeed true, though "Hangar" is a very polite word for the shed that had been at 12 St.Barnabas Road, Cambridge, to be re-erected by a disused railway embankment at the edge of the test site. However, I had no idea that it had been exhibited at the Mammoth Show.

It had been on display at 12 St.Barnabas Road on the Whit-Monday & Tuesday, 16 & 17 May 1910, before going on trial.

By incredible chance thanks to James Bond's "Little Nellie" I got a poster announcing this, the public being required to pay 6d --"All Who Have Not Seen A Fullsized Flying Machine should Avail Themselves of This Opportunity"

I understood the "Wallbro" was then transported to the field beside what is now the A-11. I suspect the Mammoth Show would have been about mid-Summer. I would certainly be grateful for any further information concerning it being exhibited in the Mammoth Show.

Through father's contacts I went many times to see the R-101 Airship in construction at Cardington & I went up the mooring mast when she was tethered to it. When the overweight R-101 crashed the successful Vickers R-100, which had done Atlantic crossings had to be scrapped. I later got to know one of the crew of the R-100 well. He was a fabric specialist & worked on the gas-bags.

Mention of Sir Arthur Marshall & his airfield brings back memories. I had gained my "A" Licence at the old Cambridge Airfield, on DH "Gypsy" Moths, in a total of 12 hours & 10 minutes, dual & solo. That was on the 11th April 1937.

On the 25th April I drove to a field by the "Caxton Gibbet". There I hired an early "motorised glider, a "B.A.C.,Drone", with a Douglas motor-cycle engine & propeller above the wing & I went off, solo, in this very different aircraft. It cost 7/6d per hour. It was owned by a Mr.Dimmock, who was in the early days of Electricity Supply in Ely.

Many of the emails I receive relate to Cambridgeshire photographers.

Andy Amos is seeking details of a less-well-known picture taker, William Pugh who had his studios in James Street, Cambridge, from the 1860s to the 1890s. He is listed in the 1881 census when he was 64 years old and a widower. Andy has portraits he took of Emmanuel and Eliza Pugh, his own great, great grandparents but few other pictures seem to have survived. [PICTURE OF EMMANUEL & ELIZA PUGH]

J. Smith is interested in the Farren brothers photographers and in particular their branch in Chatteris. I was speaking to the Probus club there last week when members got to reminiscing about the late Maurice Kidd, who researched many aspects of the town and would probably have known all about it. The two brothers, Robert and William Farren set up in business in Rose Crescent in the 1860s as printsellers, framemakers and photographers. The partnership was dissolved in 1870 when Robert concentrated on his work as an artist and William stayed with photography. But on Guy Fawkes' day 1874 tragedy struck when fire broke out in the kitchen of William's shop. All the cameras, lenses, negatives and photographic apparatus were destroyed together with over twenty of his brother's paintings. William found a new shop on the corner of Market Street from which he traded until about 1884 when the studio was taken by R.H. Lord. [FARREN ADVERTISMENT]

John Goodrich from Palm Springs, California is researching his great uncle, Charles Edward Goodrich, who worked from studios in Post Office Terrace until the 1920s. He took portraits of many famous people such as Lord Rutherford - Goodrich said he looked like a farmer - very nervous of camera and difficult to photograph, Sir Arthur Quiller Couch, F.R. Leavis, and Arthur Hamilton, the Christ's college man who was chosen as the model for the Cambridgeshire War Memorial at the end of Station Road. Many of Goodrich's negatives are preserved in the Cambridgeshire Collection, soon to reopen in Lion Yard. The library also has a number of billheads relating to household items that Charles bought. A Girton couple have been delving through these and have supplied John with many fascinating domestic details he would never have hoped to find.

Amongst the people who recorded Cambridgeshire's past was Percy Salmon who died in August 1959 at the age of 87. Percy was a photographic prodigy. The son of a Cambridge policeman he started photography as a hobby as a lad of 12 winning the Cambridge Camera Club's Silver Cup in 1892. Many awards were to follow along with a Fellowship of the Royal Photographic Society in 1898. Percy studied photography in the Paris studio and workshops of Levy et Fils and went on to travel the world with his camera, visiting many countries including Egypt, the Sudan, Asia Minor and Turkey. He met Kings, Queens, Emperors and Statesmen and contributed to nearly all the English and American newspapers and magazines, often using the name of 'Richard Penlake'. [OBITUARY OF SALMON]

Percy maintained his contact with his home town through a series of articles in the Cambridge Daily News which recorded his journeys abroad. After he retired to Melbourn he continued to exercise his journalist skills as village correspondent for the "Cambridge Independent Press" and the "Royston Crow". His interesting and faithful recording of village happenings made his column very popular. He was too modest and retiring to say much about his own adventures though one week (when village news was scarce) he told how he once photographed and reported the doings of Queen Victoria when on a visit to the French Riviera. He did however share his photographs through many lantern lectures illustrated by his views. Years later several boxes of his glass lantern slides were discovered in the basement of the Worker's Educational Association and passed on to the Cambridgeshire Collection. [PERCY SALMON PIC OF FRUIT CART]

Now they have another collection to treasure following the death of Michael Sawyer at Eltisley. Michael spent many years amassing pictures and information about that village which he shared with anybody who was interested. Despite his modesty his knowledge was appreciated well outside his local community and I recently had the privilege of presenting him with a 'Dedicated Service' award on behalf of The Cambridgeshire Association for Local History. Now Michael has joined the other Cambridgeshire local historians who will live on the memories of those who knew him, while the material he collected will be shared by generations of historians yet to come. What do you know about Bandy?

I've had an email from Carl Giden, the President of the Swedish Ice Hockey Historical Society who is researching the origin of stick-and-ball games on the ice. And much of it goes back to Bury fen at Bluntisham, near Earith.

This low-lying area of land is easily flooded and still used for skating whenever the temperature allows. But during the exceptionally bad winter of 1813-1814 the rivers froze solid, trapping many gangs of lighters so the younger bargees spent their enforced leisure playing 'Bandy' with the local farmers and labourers.

In those days Bandy and hockey, or 'Shiney' as it was known, were favourite sports played on the quiet village roads. So it was natural to transfer to the ice where an area about the size of a football ground was cleared, the goals being about 150 to 200 yard apart.

It was played with a 'cat' or 'kit' made by the village tailor who wound material into a ball about three inches in diameter. Cricket or India rubber balls were also used, although often a bung of cork or wood did service.

The curved sticks known as 'bandies' were cut from the lower branches of pollarded willow tree. A good bandy was eagerly looked after, carefully preserved, and became the pride of the owner. As it hung up in the cottage it recalled many an exciting game, and started many a fireside talk of how matches were lost and won, thus stimulating the young to become players.

Teams from Swavesey, Over, Willingham, Cottenham, Chatteris, St.Ives, Godmanchester and Huntingdon flocked to challenge the local Bluntisham and Earith lads who boasted they had not been beaten for 100 years. All that changed in 1890 when they were defeated by a club from Virginia Water, London.

A Bury Fen Bandy Club was established and the rules written down. Then in 1891 with Charles G. Tebbutt as Captain, they set off for Holland to introduce the game to the Continent. Other tours followed to Norway, Denmark and Germany. Then in 1894, when visiting Stockholm, Tebbutt arranged for a Swedish Athletic Club to try it. Hence the email.

Although England won the European championship in 1913, organized Bandy seems to have disappeared from the Fens after the Great War. However scratch games continued on Bury Fen up to the 1940s whenever skating was possible. They were played in the old way: every sort of stick and ball were used, few rules hampered the players and the area of play could be enlarged to accommodate almost any number on each side. It has been superseded by a variant version of the sport, Ice Hockey

Documents relating to the sport are preserved in the wonderful Norris Museum at St Ives and in Cambridgeshire Archives. The Swedish researchers are planning a visit to consult it but they'd also like to meet anybody who has other material. So do you have photographs, trophies or newspaper cuttings to tell us more? Email Carl Giden - c.giden@gmail.com or drop me a line.

Did you play hockey in the street. My files report how in March 1900 four Ely youths were summoned for playing the game in West End. PC Green said they were running about and knocking the ball into the middle of the road. Thomas Larkins and Henry and Walter Martin pleaded guilty but Robert Smith claimed he did not touch the ball. Play had paused for a while but was resumed in St John's Place. The lads ordered to pay 8s.6d., the court expenses, between them.

And, talking of hockey, can you shed any light on a picture of a ladies' team taken in 1953. The players' badge reads something like 'USFHP', if that helps. In March 1950 the News reported that a feature of that season's Cambridge ladies hockey club was that it included three sets of twins, from the Harris, Macleod and Cook families. The club started about 1900 on one of Mr Nutter's fields at Grantchester but moved to the paddock at Pinehurst. They then played on the Perse girls school ground. Past members of the club included Miss Rose Macaulay, the authoress, Miss Irene Flanders and Miss Margaret Field Hyde, both well-known in the musical world.

What were you doing at 7.45 am on 29th September 1962? George Bainbridge was delivering milk with his horse-drawn float – at least that's according to a pencil note on the back of a photograph loaned by his daughter, Mrs. J. Badcock of Cambridge. George had his farm and Star Dairy in Vinery Road – it is now Danebury Court. But where was he photographed and who is the young lady standing with him?

Often when I talk to groups – especially real Cambridge folk like those who gather at the Cherry Trees Day Centre in St Matthew's Street just off East Road - they will speak of the old days and the characters they recall.

Last week they told me how the picture on the front cover of the latest 'Our Time' magazine had generated great discussion: it shows a heap of rubble that was once Vicarage Terrace before German bombs cleared the site where the present club meets. One lady had lived there before the war and remembered the neighbourhood well.

It never was the most prosperous area of Cambridge but over the years various attempts have been made to improve conditions for the people who lived there.

In 1903 the London Express newspaper described Cambridge as having incurable slums and possessing filthier homes than Whitechapel. In reply Mr Campkin, a Guardian had said: "There is no doubt there is an amount of poverty and squalor in Cambridge but there has been a vast improvement in the St Matthew's district over the last 40 years".

That year St Matthews' church held a service of thanksgiving for God's mercies in delivering many from small-pox, scarlet fever and diphtheria. The Vicar said that since the parish had been formed 37 years ago nobody had known anything like the amount of sickness. In eight months they had been visited by three terrible diseases, each taking a large number of victims, 12 of which had proved fatal.

Just 50 years ago, at the end of September in 1959, an Inquiry was held into conditions in the district between East Road, Norfolk Street and St Matthew's Street. The Deputy City Surveyor, Raymond Gibb, described the narrow streets and courts. "In general the dwellings are of the demolition standard and many of the businesses are conducted in old and dilapidated buildings creating a general impression of decay". The whole area should be demolished and rebuilt, he told the Inspector.

More detailed evidence was given by J.F. Edwards, the Chief Public Health Inspector. He reported on twenty-nine houses on the corner of Staffordshire Street and Norfolk Street: "All the houses in this area are, in my opinion, unfit for human habitation. Every one is damp, some roofs are sunken and leaking with displaced and broken slates. Brickwork of walls and chimney stacks is loose, perished or open-jointed. Roof spoutings are missing or leaky.

"Some houses are dark owing to the narrowness of the street, needing artificial light on a normal day. Woodwork and internal plaster work generally is perished and decayed. No house has proper ventilated food storage. Water closets are not readily accessible, some being across the street from the houses they serve, and several are shared between houses", he continued. Two other 'clearance areas' – St Matthew's Street and Leader's Row – were very similar.

The Council wanted to rip them down and build maisonettes, shops and a public house, giving existing shopkeepers first refusal. But not everybody agreed. One 80 years old lady was totally blind and living in Staffordshire Street. But her home was only 21 years old and she should not be compulsorily moved, her daughter told the Inspectors. There would be a set of old people's homes in Christchurch Street providing 29 bed sitting rooms, a central lounge and people to look after the residents, the council responded.

For traders the disruption would be immense: Mr Harrison, a 74-year-old hairdresser in Norfolk Street said he had been in business there since he was 20 and would find difficulties in relocating. But Lacon's Brewery had already agreed a new site for their Norfolk Arms public house.

Since then redevelopment has taken place with new homes and shops. But have you grown up in the area, either then or now, and what do you remember of it?

As Halloween approaches once more people will start telling spooky stories. Tales of unexplained happenings, lights being turned on and off, a sudden chill in a heated room will be happily shared.

Other people will quietly reflect on profound personal experiences, convinced they have re-met loved ones after they are known to have died. Some of these experiences will be comforting, others terrifying. Sometimes people want to know what, or perhaps who, is causing it. Other times they just want it to stop.

Damien O'Dell was 12 years old when he saw his first ghost. Now he spends his time looking for them. Has set up the Anglia Paranormal Investigation Society whose members go out with a range of equipment and their own six senses, visiting pubs, houses or priories to see what they can detect Damien has already published books on haunted Hertfordshire and Bedfordshire, now he's turning to this area. Cambridge is a special place for the student of the paranormal. The Society for Psychical Research, Britain's leading organisation for such investigations, was founded in Cambridge in 1882 and its first President was Henry Sidgwick, Professor of Moral Philosophy at Trinity College. Phenomena have been reported from any number of colleges including Girton, Sidney Sussex, Emmanuel, Corpus Christie and Peterhouse. Then there's Abbey House off Newmarket Road which at one time was regarded as the most haunted house in England, long before Essex's Borley Rectory claimed that particular accolade.

Other tales relate to Fenland: Spinney Abbey is haunted, Ely Cathedral notorious for its ghostly monks and Oliver Cromwell's former home in Ely has reported strange happenings it is claimed. But is it all a load of bunkum?

"If people are sceptical then I don't try to convince them otherwise, just let them know the stories and make their own minds up.", says Damien, who will be speaking at the 'Fenland History on Friday' meeting in Ely Library on 23rd October, starting 10.30 am. If you have a story to tell or know something that you feel should be investigated he would be delighted to hear from you. Email damien.odell@yahoo.co.uk or drop me a line and share your experiences.

Last week's Memories article on the St Matthew's area of Cambridge brought an instant response from Ron Hartley of Duxford who felt conditions were not quite as bad as the 1959 Inquiry was told.

He emails: "I lived at 54 Staffordshire Street from the time of my birth in 1932 till the houses were demolished in 1960. The damp and squalid houses that are referred to in the article were at Staffordshire Gardens, off the main street. These faced onto the back garden of our property and were separated from it by a small footpath. Only one house had a water closet down the street, the rest had them across the road with the number of the house painted on the doors. In the row of houses in which I lived we had wcs attached to the houses but we still had to go outside to access them.

"The majority of houses in our row were decorated regularly. My father was a painter and decorator and there was frequently the smell of drying paint in our house. Some of the neighbours used to scrub their front doorsteps and the pavement outside. One of your pictures shows Mr Taylor's bakery shop. I remember going there and buying freshly baked rolls for a halfpenny each from an old lady who served in there.

"The corner shop opposite the Norfolk Arms, now the Man on the Moon, was once a cobbler's shop run by a one legged old man, who had lost his leg in the First World War. Then it was a grocer's shop which was taken over by the Co-op. The Swan Inn was run by my uncle and aunt during the war when because beer was in short supply they used to lock the front door and the regulars used to go around the back for their tippie. On Derby Day I used to collect all the bets from Staffordshire Street and take them round to my aunt at the back of the pub before twelve noon when the milkman came to collect them!"

Ron remembers the night that Vicarage Terrace was bombed: "We slept through the siren and were woken by a tremendous bang and the house and windows shaking. We dressed and sat in the living room, thinking that the world had come to an end. Our neighbour, Mr. Rouse, came banging on the back door to say that Vicarage Terrace had been flattened and that my father should accompany him to see if there was anything they could do. I was so intrigued that I pestered and pestered until my father to allow me to go up and have a look. So we went down Leader's Row to the corner of St Matthew's Street where I saw a stretcher, covered in blood against the wall. There were a few people around and a policeman in the middle of the road. The corner shop on Vicarage Terrace/ St. Matthew's Street was still standing but badly damaged. In Vicarage Terrace there was brick rubble all over the road and people climbing all over it."

That truly was an experience never to be forgotten.

One of the regular features in the Cambridge Daily News of the 1950s was a 'Mainly for Women' column edited by Gillian Maltby. It covered topics such as fashion, housekeeping and other domestic subjects. But on 2nd October 1959 Gillian focussed on the issues concerning 17-year-old girls. Some of these were still at school, other had been working for some years and had different outlooks on life

The girls in the sixth-form of a local Grammar School studied most evenings and at the weekends, which left them little time for relaxation. However the majority belonged to clubs, practically all listed swimming and tennis amongst their regular pastimes and three-quarters attended church each week.

Most of them made their own blouses and skirts and more than half had made the main portion of their wardrobe. They all helped in the home, made their own beds, washed-up regularly and did a proportion of the shopping. They rarely watched television except when there was a good play on and went to bed at ten o'clock during the week, an hour later at the week-ends. The girls read an extraordinary amount of books, mainly light novels and biographies, almost all had learned to play an instrument and half had been abroad, the majority on exchange visits with other Continental teenagers

The sixth-formers received pocket money of around five shillings a week which was spent on sweets, stamps, nylons and make-up which most had started to wear when they were 15. Lipstick and powder were generally used while a few also liked eye-shadow and mascara – though only when they were going out and not as a matter of course.

The majority had not considered marriage seriously, indeed only one had a 'steady' boy friend. Virtually all wanted to wed ultimately, but not until they were well into their twenties - 25 was quite early enough – as this would give them time to attend university and work in their chosen careers, probably teaching or nursing. However once they married over half wanted large families of four or more children.

But the majority of the seventeen-years old girls out at work felt they should be engaged by the time they were 18, otherwise they were obviously 'on the shelf'. Unlike the schoolgirls, most had boyfriends and insisted on sharing expenses on 'dates' – though not the first one, because a boy would feel offended. They could afford it, for having often worked for two years they were receiving an average weekly wage was £4 out of which they were left with about 30 shillings (£1.50) for themselves. Much of this went on clothes, holidays and entertainment.

The working girls were interested in clothes and their general appearance and went to a lot of trouble to make the best of themselves. Like most teenagers they collected jazz and pop records, were keen on dancing (jive of course), were regular cinemagoers and generally enjoying life. They either took a women's magazine or read the one taken by their mothers.

Generally the characteristic picture of the jiving, fun loving teenager was right for many of the girls in this age group. But whatever her interests, occupation and beliefs, each was full of life and very much in character with the bustling 1950s. And far removed from the 17-year-olds of twenty years earlier.

But what do you recall of the days when you were seventeen?

In the 1950s Hockey was a popular sport and Myra Carpenter was one of its keenest exponents. She has emailed with details of a picture of a hockey match that I featured in Memories on 28th September. It showed a game between the East Women's Hockey Association and the United States Field Hockey team which was played at Homerton College in November 1953. The US team had come over for the International Federation of Women's Hockey Associations Fifth Triennial Conference cum Tournament in Folkestone, one of 16 international teams present. Myra has the programme together with the cutting of this Cambridge game.

Memories 26th October 2009, by Mike Petty

A couple of weeks ago I related how in 1959 Cambridge City council told a planning inquiry of the deficiencies of the area around Norfolk Street, off East Road. But readers say it was not as bad as councillors claimed!

Incredibly three of them once lived in the same small street: Blossom Street.

David Rumbelow from Lincoln writes: "I was born and lived at No 5 Blossom Street from 1942 -1966. My parents had six children and we all had a good life with many good friends in the area. There was exceptional community spirit. My father died in 1949 leaving my mother to bring up four children under nine years of age and two older children. Times were hard and money was short. All of us have gone on to have successful lives.

"My memories are of wonderful characters that lived in the area. These include Harry Pauley, the butcher, who used to give me jobs and pay me with meat to take home for the family. Vi Smith and her husband, the greengrocer in Blossom Street, would let me have wooden orange boxes that we used to chop up for firewood while Gordon and Ann Taylor ran a chip shop on the corner with Norfolk Street. Nearby were Terry Whitehead the greengrocer, Bridgeman's Bakers while my brothers Donald, Peter and I did paper rounds for Newman's Paper shop in Norfolk Street. There was Masons, the chemist: Ken Mason was more like a doctor. He was able to take out splinters, foreign objects in our eyes and cure other ailments.

"All of these wonderful people played an important part in my young life. They taught me respect and a huge sense and importance of community spirit, which has given me a lot of pleasure in my adult life.

"I returned to Blossom Street with two of my brothers and their wives recently. We found carvings of our names still on the wall. We visited St. Matthew's Church. We were all christened there and sang in the choir. Mr Lister was the choir master at that time. We walked down Norfolk Street and looked at the house where my Aunt lived, which is next to the passage to the churchyard and cemetery. Wonderful memories. I did leave with a tear in my eye remembering such characters and events. God Bless Blossom Street and thank you!"

Jean Clements, now in Campkin Road, also lived in Blossom Street, as did her grandparents. Their house was on the corner of Flower Street and is now a parking place for cars. They brought up nine children there and the house was spotless. It is true there were some very dilapidated and run down places in the area, she concedes. One was the Popjoy Building in Gas Lane, a block of one-up and one-down dwellings. They shared toilets between houses and had a communal wash house. After it was demolished in the 1930s an air raid shelter was built there during the war.

From Harston, Beryl Green writes to say that her father, Arthur Rose, had a butcher's shop on the corner of Blossom Street, now a hair-dressing salon. She phoned her brother Arthur in New Zealand members who recalled various other tradesfolk in the area including Sadie's second-hand clothes shop, a dress shop kept by the Frost family and Burgess' hardware shop.

Janet Claydon from Cottenham remembers that Rose's shop was almost next door to Taylor's fish and chip shop. She also recalls Bridgeman's bakery, previously run by Mr Norman and his wife (lovely Chelsea buns and doughnuts), a wet fish shop operated by Sonny Thurston and his wife – Sunday treat was winkles, cockles and shrimps. Townsend's cycle shop, a second-hand shop run by Ada Warwick ... the memories pour out. "What a wealth of history and so many wonderful characters", she concludes.

Memories 2nd November 2009, by Mike Petty

Cambridgeshire local historians have been remembering some of the people who have contributed to a fuller understanding of the area.

One of these was William Mortlock Palmer, a country GP from Linton who in the early 1900's journeyed many miles on horse, dog cart, bicycle and later a somewhat erratic motor car to visit his patients, often taking antiques in payment for services rendered. Somehow he also made time to continue an interest in local history stimulated as a lad at the Cambridge Free Library while he was an apprentice chemist. Now library shelves hold dozens of his publications, many of them reprints of newspaper reports of the lectures given to Women's Institutes on the history of their local area. After retirement in 1925 Dr Palmer devoted much time to a photographic survey of Cambridgeshire's villages, houses, windmills and customs that was being compiled by the Cambridge Antiquarian Society. He died 70 years ago but his legacy lives on.

One woman who had more call than many to remember him was Enid Porter who ran the Cambridge and County Folk Museum virtually single handed for 29 years until she retired through ill health in 1976. She would spend as much time as she could in her little office with a single bar electric fire and the door just open in case anyone came in. When she heard people talking about the artefacts she would be out there engaging them to find out their experiences. Enid set down that accumulated knowledge in books and articles and encouraged Arthur Randall & W H Barratt from the Fens to publish their tales and traditions.

This is the centenary year of Enid's birth and as a special tribute Decker Murfitt, a horseman from the fens, will be giving a talk on his life with horses. When Decker started at the age of fourteen with Cole Ambrose in Stuntney they had 3000 acres, 100 men and 200 horses. He had already worked horses since the age of eleven and all of his forbearers were horsemen of some description. Decker will tell of the ways and secrets of the old horsemen, the control of difficult animals, old cures and even the pagan custom of not burying the afterbirth which is still in use to this day. The meeting will be introduced by Neil Lanham who has himself devoted a lifetime to recording such oral traditions. It promises to be a fascinating evening at Swaffham Prior Village Hall tomorrow, Tuesday, at 6.45pm – contact Cambridge & County Folk Museum (Tel 01223 355159.) for tickets, which are £5.

Elsewhere folk have been gathering to pay final respects to other local historians. St Wendreda's church at March was packed virtually to its angel rafters for a tribute to Peter Hewitt, a retired teacher who shared his passion for history with classes and groups up and down Cambridgeshire. He also participated in many other areas of community life, from choral music to Whitemore Prison, touching many lives in many ways. March's wonderful town museum owes much to his support.

Then last week at Chesterton church friends and family gathered to remember Derek Stubbings. As Alan Brigham recalls, Derek's great achievement was to connect with others and to pass on his care and his enthusiasm for the past to the present generation, while enabling those whose childhood WAS that past to have the opportunity to reflect and remember together. Many people got great satisfaction, enjoyment and companionship from attending meetings of the Chesterton Local History Group that Derek helped to establish 25 years ago. His knowledge of Chesterton, Barnwell and Fen Ditton areas was prodigious and his support to Enid Porter at the Folk Museum and to the staff of the Cambridgeshire Collection was greatly appreciated.

A wonderful tribute of a completely different nature has come in after I featured a picture of two girls on a motor scooter. It brought an instant response from Harry Chalklin, aged 13. Harry writes: "The young lady on the front of the Vespa happens to be my grandmother, Thelma Hill. It was taken shortly before she met my grandfather when she worked in the motorcycle shop Hallens. My grandfather was a motorcyclist, and met my grandmother through a friend who also worked in Hallens at the time. She made the red dress she's wearing in the photo. She's still as pretty today."

Arguments over the changing use of fenland are not just confined to Wicken. Just a few miles away is Quy Fen, an area of quiet open land linking Quy, Horningsea and Fen Ditton.

Kitty Watts remembered it as it was just before the Great War. "About twice a week, after an early tea, my cousin and I would help my father harness the old horse to the tumbrel cart and off we would go down the wide leafy droves to Quy Fen to cut grass or hay for our cows and horses. Oak, Ash and Elm trees had been planted alternately on each side of the droves and were now almost full grown. Willow, Whitethorn, Wild Rose, and Blackberry bushes grew in profusion along the sides of the cart tracks.

"Once we reached the fen we helped unrein the horse so that it could wander around and feed. While Dad sharpened up his scythe and got busy mowing swathes of the grass, some patches thick with white clover, trefoil and wild tares, my cousin and I would wander off for half an hour or so collecting an armful of meadowsweet, purple loosestrife and other wild flowers which grew in the marshy places among the rushes and round the Cut, a big pool of water where fossils had been dug.

"With larks singing overhead and all kinds of warblers and tits among the bushes, a startled snipe or plover joining in with their cries, and many different kinds of butterflies, moths, dragonflies or occasionally a glimpse of a grass snake or lizard sunning themselves along the chalk hills, the time passed very quickly. By the time we returned Dad had long swathes of cut hay all around and we got busy with forks and rakes making it into heaps and filling the cart with it. Once we had loaded a good load we all climbed on to the top and set off for home again"

In later years Quy Fen Cut became a very popular bathing pool, and in summer people came by cars and bicycles from Cambridge and other villages around to picnic among the bushes. Fishermen would come too, for there were plenty of fish in the smaller cuts around that were not suitable for bathing. Although Quy Fen was a long way from the village one rarely visited it without seeing someone else enjoying its beauties", Kitty recalled.

But things could not last. During the Second World War it was enclosed and later let for grazing to a farmer for his cows and horses. Without getting proper permission he sent tractors down there and cut down trees, uprooted bushes and old favourite landmarks, levelled out the chalk hills and ploughed up much of the land. After protests it was reset with grass, but it was never quite the same old Quy Fen, Kitty lamented in 1958

However the area had changed radically before that. There had been great drainage enterprises of the seventeenth-century, the inclosure of the early 1800s and the massive disruption to the tranquil acres that was caused by wholesale extraction of coprolite after 1850.

Then in 1959 a large area became designated a Site of Special Scientific Interest because of its beetles and dragonflies, plants and shrubs. But this status caused extra problems for the trustees who managed it on behalf of the villages. They were told what to do by 'experts' from environmental organisations, most of them young and inexperienced who felt their new college degrees meant they knew better than the countryfolk. As a result the open grass areas became infested with weeds, ragwort and thistle and the ground became overgrown with brambles.

Now once more it is being put into a good condition by the Quy Fen Trust whose secretary,

Bill Watts, has contributed a foreword to a history of the fen that was written by his late sister, Peggy.

It includes an account of the death of William Ison who died while cutting hay in the fen on 28th August 1873. Ison had put his pitchfork in a pile of hay that he'd raised above his head to serve as an umbrella during a downpour, thus providing conductor for the lightning that killed him.

Incidents of this kind form the basis for an almanac of horrible happenings just produced by Neil Storey. For each day in the year he has some macabre of tragedy –bodysnatching, murder, arson, cholera or witchcraft. It can be interesting to see what happened on your own birthday – for mine it's the execution in 1898 of William Horsford, a farmer from Spaldwick who'd poisoned his cousin when she found herself pregnant by him. It is not all horror for Neil features an engraving of a strange memorial to an Impington tripe-seller, Claud Coster. It was entitled 'The Puzzle' and published in 1756 but was probably completely made up. The trick is to ignore the full stops and line breaks; it starts 'Beneath this stone ...' and ends 'his consort Jane'. Can you work out the rest?

The opening of a new Primark store has brought an increased number of shoppers into Burleigh Street, Cambridge. It is an area that has changed dramatically in recent years following the arrival of the Grafton Centre and the loss of two former major shops, Laurie and McConnal and the Co-op, the site of which now houses the new arrival

But 50 years ago, in November 1959, over forty shopkeepers in the Fitzroy-Burleigh area sought to boost trade by clubbing together to launch the Greatest Shopping Week ever. There were be a galaxy of attractions, free gifts and even late-night shopping until 8 pm on a Friday.

In an advertising supplement in the News they sought to boost their reputation for quality and service:

"In the past few years the Fitzroy/Burleigh Street area, with its easy access, ample car-parking facilities and huge variety of shops, has become increasingly popular as Cambridge's most convenient shopping centre". When tracing the development of Fitzroy Street they mentioned: "Some of Cambridge's oldest inhabitants might remember the gates, which until once stood at the New Square end marking the boundary of the old market". I must admit this is new to me – does it linger on in your family memories.

Many of the shops which grew up there in the 19th century were in ramshackle buildings, combining timber and corrugated iron with a minimum of brickwork. Often these were built over the front gardens of houses which had their ground floors converted – a common practice in those times. Nevertheless a lively trade developed and the 1900s saw the gradual development of new shopping.

“Within the last few years two of the last-remaining groups of ramshackled shops have made room for up-to-the-minute shopping remises; many other shops have had ‘face-lifts’ and improvements are constantly going on to provided nothing but the best shopping conditions for the public and working conditions for employees”, the traders claimed. But did you work in any of those shops, and what are your memories?

As well as the two large department stores there were 39 specialist traders including groceries, meat, fish, green fruit, confectionery, furniture, gramophone records, dry cleaning and denture repairs. Each gave the best possible service and prices which, quality for quality, were the lowest to be found anywhere. Amongst them was Vic Davis, Hillman and Commer agents at the Garage in Fair Street, Dysons clothing shop in Burleigh Street who were stocking shortie overcoats and suedette jackets, pullovers and knitwear while Pets Corner had everything for the tropical and coldwater fish as well as dog, cage bird, cavy or hamster.

It was easy to get to by bus, being just a short walk from Drummer Street and it was car-friendly. “Parking is one of the hazards of motoring these days; happily enough it isn’t such a great problem in the Fitzroy / Burleigh Street area”. the traders reminded shoppers, with two car parks plumb in the area, one at New Square and the other at East Road near the junction of Burleigh Street.

But change was in the air following the arrival of a Fine Fare Supermarket as part of a new block in 1956 which had caused concern to some traders who felt it spoiled the atmosphere the street. Such change should not come piecemeal, the whole area should be erased and redeveloped at one time, they felt. The scene was already set for a massive debate that would rumble on for decades.

Did you shop there and what do you recall of the area in the days before the Grafton.

Now another Remembrance Sunday has passed and the poppy wreaths are being battered by the wind. This year there has been nobody with personal memories of life in the trenches of the Great War. And there are few who actually recall the impact that it had on the people left at home.

One man who has left a vivid picture of both home and war fronts was Cyril Ramsey Vincent. Born in Oxford, he worked as a Post Office clerk in London before retiring to Swavesey about 1899. There he started a second career as a village correspondent for a group of villages, contributing weekly columns to Cambridge Weekly News, Cambridge Express and Hunts Post. His keen eye for detail and his interesting style of writing - being paid by the inch for the reports he wrote - made his articles essential reading and he gained the trust of the people whose triumphs and tragedies he recorded.

Each week he cut out his paragraphs and pasted them into a scrapbook. After ten years he decided instead to carefully fold the cuttings into paper wrappers, listing the contents on the outside. This he continued week in, week out until September 1942. They were discovered in a barn in Swavesey and transferred to the Cambridgeshire Collection a couple of decades ago. There they have remained, largely unappreciated.

But now John Shepperson and Chris Richardson have transcribed the snippets on Swavesey during that great period of carnage called the Great War.

There are details of recruiting, of margarine shortages, blackout, the hospital for wounded soldiers that was established in the village and of the tribunals who decided who could be allowed to stay behind when others had to go. But the most poignant are the letters home from the lads who went. They were written from Gallipoli, Mesopotamia and from the mud of the Western Front.

Arthur Coulson of the Cambridgeshire Regiment wrote home in April 1915: "We had a rough ride the other night. It was like being in hell itself. The Germans were blowing up the road as we were going along it. We had to lie down flat in mud and water for a very long time. I expected every minute was the last. We lost a few men but White and Prior from Swavesey are all right. We took the trenches back again after a hard struggle. It was up to our necks in water in the trenches".

Later he wrote of another incident: On Easter Sunday the Germans put up a big card on which was written a happy greeting to the British and 'If you don't fire, we won't'. The truce did not last long "As I am writing the shells are going over my head from both ways. There are 30 or 40 dead Germans and French lying about. It looks a sight to see dead men lying in the fields"

The dead needed to be buried and in September 1918 Arthur Whybrow spotted a figure he knew: "Who do you think I saw the other day? Mr Sharp, the vicar of Swavesey, now a temporary chaplain to the Forces. He was burying a dead man just behind the lines who had just been killed"

It was the Rev Sharp's second tour. He'd gone out in January 1916 and written home "I seem to have been on horseback ever since I got here - it is the only means of progress as the mud is unspeakable and not infrequently a man has to be literally pulled out. I had five services yesterday and rode about 14 miles, besides tramping a mile or two, so I had a bit of a strenuous day. Two of the services were held in old gun dug-outs by the guns. I celebrated the Holy Communion and we had three hymns. The dug-out was quite full ... it was a strangely impressive service. The rain and wind is incessant. One gets wet and tired out every day". Within a week he was laid up with trench fever

Some local lads fought on horseback: Trooper Frank Hepher, Northants Yeomanry wrote of the impact of shelling: 'The horses nearly went mad and we thought we had better make a move for shells were coming over wholesale. You can guess what a job we had with four horses each, and they nearly mad. I was riding my own and got the other three on one side and we didn't let the grass grow under our feet'

Some lads fought in the air. A.A. Girling was with the Royal Flying Corps: "I have had several flights in an aeroplane; most of them have been for engine tests and I have been up two or three times on patrol after Germans, with a machine gun. It is quite exciting". One plane returned simply covered with bullet holes, "the pilot had one through his stocking, but he did not seem to mind a jot"

Their letters tell of their progress: George Beaumont enlisted in December 1915, he was wounded in June 1916, awarded the Military Cross in January 1918 – the first Swavesey man to win one – was promoted to Captain and died of wounds that April.

Vincent recorded story after story, telling how the news of the armistice was contained in a telephone message from the CDN which was displayed in the Post Office window 90 minutes before the official communication was received. There were victory celebrations and prolonged debates about Memorials. But even after the guns had fallen silent the sad news of casualties came in – in July 1919 William Howlett was told by the War Office that as nobody had seen his son for over a year, they must assume he was dead.

Cyril Vincent compiled a booklet to raise money for the War Memorial Hall. A few copies survive. But his weekly articles paint the most complete picture of the impact of that conflict.

There are to be only a very few copies of 'A Village during the Great War: Swavesey'. They can be obtained from John Shepperson at 148 Boxworth End, Swavesey, CB24 4RA (01954 230313) for £8 plus £2.25 postage.

Memories by Mike Petty, 7th December 2009

Christmas is an important time of the year for shopkeepers anxious to attract as many customers as possible in this prime buying time.

It is also a busy time of year for the staff who serve. But how does Christmas shopping now differ from that of 100 years ago?

In December 1909 a News reporter went out window-shopping. He was not alone, there were lots doing the same thing. It was not just the goods, but the way they were displayed that they flocked to see.

"A study of the windows of our local tradesmen dressed in all their Christmas bravery is sufficient to convince one of the enormous strides which artistic and tasteful window dressing continues to make from year to year. Every Christmastime the height of skill and attractiveness seems to have been reached until the next comes round."

The displays had moved with the times: "Not so long ago no shop window at Christmas time was complete without a mechanical figure of some description, not intended for sale, but to make people look into the window. But these devices often defeated their own object by causing crowds to assemble and concentrating people's attention on the mechanical wonder. One stopped and gazed at it, and often passed without noticing the things that were for sale."

By 1909 they had largely disappeared to be replaced with mechanical toys in profusion, many of them amazingly ingenious and well-constructed, and so cheap that one wondered how they could possibly be made for the money. Children were particularly attracted to the window displays: "There is every excuse for the little ones many of whom will get their only Christmas treat by looking at the good things their more fortunate brothers and sisters will be able to play with at closer quarters."

So what was the Nintendo Wii of 1909: "It is interesting to note the continuance of the 'Teddy Bear' craze, which does not show any sign of abatement but remains as strong as when these quaint little animals were first introduced"

Few shoppers were organised: "It seems a strange condition of things that some persons start out on shopping expeditions without the smallest idea of what they intend to buy or any appreciation of the amount of trouble and irritation their undecided state of mind must engender on those whose fate it is to minister to their wants and help them come to a definite choice". I suspect this may not have changed!

Christmas was also a time to feast but with so many butchers competing for custom, how were they to convince the shoppers that their meat was best. The answer had been 'Show Night' which by 1909 was just a memory.

In the old days "Show Night" was the time when all Cambridge and his wife used to turn into the streets and every shopkeeper did his best to make a display of his wares and catch the public eye by some form of novel window dressing. The chief objects of attention were the butchers and poulterers where the carcasses of prize beasts and poultry were exhibited in prestigious quantities whilst the proprietors dispensed hospitality to their customers in their private offices or parlours.

But it all got out of hand and in their endeavours to beat one another the butchers killed more meat than they could get rid of in the ordinary way and losses followed. And then 'sentimentality' came on the scene – people thought it was barbarous and unworthy of nineteenth-century civilisation. The custom died and with it went the art of the butchers' 'window-dresser'. 'Show Night' provided a considerable fillip to trade and provided an opportunity for a great deal of harmless enjoyment and useful social intercourse – the late-night shopping of its day.

But butchers continued to display their meat beside the pavement as photographs from Burwell and Ely testify.

But what do you remember of your childhood Christmases?

Memories 14th December 2009, by Mike Petty

Last week I was invited to journey up to Peterborough to speak to a group who are raising money to support the work of the Sue Ryder foundation at Thorpe Hall. This imposing Jacobean mansion stands in its own landscaped grounds and cares for people in their frailer years. Yet the building itself is also in some need of attention, the ornate interior decorations are long past their best, the carved staircase now no longer used and the ceilings stained by leaking water from the wards above.

Then after lunch I drove a few miles to meet a man who told me something of Thorpe Hall's wartime role in training agents who were parachuted into occupied Europe. But it was his own experiences that I'd come to learn.

David Venters had been one of the soldiers who'd been involved on 'Operation Neptune' in March 1947. Then a hard frost, combined with heavy snow that melted quickly and a high tide in the Wash had resulted in the bank of the Great Ouse River giving. Water had poured through the gap and flooded hundreds of acres between Swavesey and Sutton, driving families from their homes.

As part of the fight-back Army engineers had drafted in American 'Buffalo' tanks to form a metal box around the collapsed bank to allow the earth barrier to be reinstated. The plan worked and the Duke of Gloucester had visited the scene to express Royal support for their efforts and sympathy for the plight of those who'd lost their house. All this was recorded by Walter Martin Lane, an Ely photographer who deposited his pictures in the Cambridgeshire Collection some four decades ago.

But Dave could tell me little about it. He'd arrived with the soldiers when it was all over and his job was to remove the vehicles and take them back to their depots. The Buffalos were amphibious tanks but would fill with water unless their pumps were started to clear the bilges. Donald recalls the soldiers lived in a Three-ton lorry opposite Bluntisham railway station and crossed a rickety bridge get to the site. He was not there long before he damaged his ankle and had to be taken to Addenbrooke's Hospital. His one memento is a photograph of himself taken beside a stack that had floated across the fens on the flood water

What he could tell me however was something that seems to have been less recorded. For two years he was based in Nissan Huts at the old American camp on the Milton Road at Cambridge. It had been constructed to occupy 850 people in wartime, 700 in peace-time.

When Dave was there in March 1947 it was a vehicle reserve depot packed with old military equipment, including several hundred tanks and armoured cars that had been damaged in wartime fighting and were destined to be scrapped. He was one of the many conscripted men who were totally fed up with army life, they'd had quite enough of being shouted at and ordered around and had no respect for the sergeants or corporals who tried to impose army 'bull'.

They still had to learn karate and to train to fight – but they trained to fight the Yanks! David had little love for the American servicemen many of whom, he says, were convicts who'd been released from gaol in order to get them to play their part in the war. He particularly disliked their attitude to coloured soldiers and has several tales to tell that are better unrelated.

There were Ordnance and Remy troops at Milton Road, as well as ATS Girls and German Prisoners of War many of whom who left their huts and hid in a massive dump of beds, chairs and other furniture until the army threatened to force them out. They taunted each other as 'Hitler Youth' and 'Churchill's children'.

David Venters went into Cambridge for dances at The Dorothy and The Rex on Magrath Avenue – a bit rough, he recalls. Then he was moved on to another depot at Castle Camps.

He has a remarkable memory of names and numbers of the men with whom he served, but would love to hear from anybody else who may have eked out their army days at the Milton Road camp. If you have memories to share of this or its later role before it became the Science Park, please let me know.

Memories 21st December 2009, by Mike Petty revised

‘Christmas is not what it was’ is a lament that has been echoed through the centuries.

In 1825 Hone’s Everyday Year Book commented: ‘Now Christmas-day only, or at most a day or two, are kept by people in general. But, formerly, there was nothing but a run of merry days from Christmas-eve to Candlemas, and the first twelve in particular were full of triumph and hospitality. We have seen but too well the cause of this degeneracy. The middle classes make it a sorry business of a pudding or so extra, and a game at cards. The rich invite their friends to their country houses, but do little there but gossip and gamble; and the poor are either left out entirely, or presented with a few clothes and eatables that make up a wretched substitute for the long and hospitable intercourse of old’

But what made a proper 1820s Christmas. “Many were for mince-pie; some for the beef and plum-pudding; more for the wassail bowl; a maiden lady timidly said, the mistletoe; but we agreed at last, that although all these were prodigious, and some of them exclusively belonging to the season, the fire was the great indispensable. Upon which we all turned our faces towards it, and began warming our already scorched hands. A great blazing fire, too big, is the visible heart and soul of Christmas. But a huge, heaped-up, over heaped-up, all attracting fire, with a semicircle of faces about it, is not to be denied us”

Many however have no real fire and few friends or family to share it with. In 1951 a visitor wrote to the News:

“Sir –I have spent Christmas in a few places, but this one which I was compelled to spend in lodgings in Cambridge has been unique. With all cafes, restaurants and hotels closed and with those public houses which were open devoid of their usual snacks and sandwiches I found it impossible to get a meal on Christmas Day. With the complete cessation of public transport it was impossible to go in search of more hospitable regions. Perhaps in the future Cambridge will conform to the standards generally offered by its counterparts elsewhere – A Stranger”

This year there will be many whose soldier husbands, sons or daughters may be away in distant places. Their pain at separation was also felt by families during other wars, mementoes of which survive in the form of silk Christmas cards sent back home from the trenches in the days before emails and mobile phones [CAMBRIDGESHIRE REGIMENT CHRISTMAS CARD 1915]

But separation affects others too. In 1947 200 members of the Polish community were based at an Agricultural camp at Cherry Hinton. Away from their own families they gave a Christmas party for English children, entertaining about 75 youngsters at their hostel in Walpole Road. The Poles, who had been doing agricultural work since they were demobilised about six months earlier, gave up their sweet ration for two weeks and part of their special Christmas allowance to provide the tea. During the meal the kiddies were entertained with lively Polish folk songs played on two accordions and to Polish carols sung by the newly formed hostel choir

Another visiting community were American airmen who at Christmas 1953 threw a party for local youngsters: "For unrestrained Yuletide abandon you have to go a long way to beat the Christmas parties held by the U.S. Army at Lakenheath for children in local homes. When 300 British youngsters join forced with 300 uninhibited G.I.s and embark on a festive warpath they simply love every hectic minute of it and the breathtaking pace of the joviality saw them coming back for more. Each child is allocated a buddy – a soldier whose duty it is to see his young charge goes short of nothing. This year they had ham sandwiches and ice-cream, as previous experience has shown you can't expect a young child to sit down and eat a supreme dinner of high quality and gigantic proportions."

Did you attend any of these parties, or are your memories of parties organised by local groups or businesses. Perhaps you might recognise some of the faces in a 1950s picture taken by John Carter. [PHOTO OF CAMBRIDGE CHILDREN WITH FATHER CHRISTMAS c1955 – DO YOU RECOGNISE ANY FACES?]

And did your trade have a special way to mark the festive season? In the 1930s merchants at Cambridge Corn Exchange traditionally ended the year by something like a snow-ball fight, using the corn and other items in which they traded. The News of 1934 reported: "The signal for the commencement of the battle was the explosion of a cracker near the door. The 'firer' was immediately bombarded and soon covered in flour, wheat and artificial manure. Crackers banged merrily, bags burst with marked effect and very soon all the corn-merchants who had not thought discretion the better part of valour were life-like imitations of snowmen. Dignity of every kind went to the wind, even the rather grim-looking statue of Jonas Webb looked comical with the flour-bag headgear that one of the brighter sparks had placed on it!" [SKETCH OF TRADERS AT CAMBRIDGE CORN EXCHANGE IN 1950S]

There were many Christmas dances, with the Dorothy Ballroom one of the prime venues. But for many the highlight was the Dustman's Christmas Ball in Cambridge Guildhall. In 1953 dustbins were tastefully displayed on the stage behind the Astrals All Star Dance Orchestra, reminding the dancers of the occasion. Miss Daphne Frostick of East Road was chosen as the new "Queen of Scavengeria". The cabaret was amusing and skilful with four men and four girls entering into a ballet. Although the men were a little less graceful than their partners they gave a performance that will long be remembered by the 500 people who attended one of the most looked-forward to and popular functions of the year. [PICTURE OF A CHRISTMAS DANCE MID 1950S – NB NOT THE DUSTMAN'S BALL]

This year it will be 'Strictly ...'

If you are quietly remembering (or trying to forget) the olden days of parents and presents why not drop me a line and share your recollections of Yuletide past.

Merry Christmas.

In treacherous snowy weather postmen have been delivering Christmas cards showing picturesque snowy weather

One perennial favourite scene is a stagecoach battling though the snow, as they did in December 1836. That snow, almost unparalleled in living memory, was accompanied by a severe wind from the north-nor-east which caused drifts so big as to form impenetrable masses. The roads from London to the north, and indeed to every other place, were completely stopped up. Some of the stagecoaches bound for Cambridge had managed to get as far as Puckeridge but there conditions had become impossible. The town had never seen so many stranded passengers, every bed had been taken and upwards of forty people had been compelled to pass the night as comfortably as possible on chairs at the Bell Inn. [SCAN OF STAGECOACH STUCK IN SNOW NEAR WELLS, NORFOLK]

Even the Lynn Union coach had found its passage impeded, finally forcing its way into Cambridge on the Tuesday afternoon at four o'clock, instead of the previous day at two. Even then the journey had only been possible at all by taking the horses off the coach and driving them through the snow to beat out a track for men to clear. By the time he had reached Barkway the snow had been level with the top of the coach yet in the Wagon and Horses at Barley the pub was full of men who should have been clearing snow but who were refusing to work until they were paid. It had taken the coachman, Thomas Cross a deal of cajoling, bullying and a considerable quantity of ale before the coach was able to get even as far as the twelfth milestone - and more ale before he could get further. [SCAN OF BARLEY INN SIGN, 1901]

Snow comes at many times of the year but the Christmas of 1906 was heralded as one that occurred few times within a lifetime. A good old-fashioned Christmas when the brightly-blazing Yule log, or its modern equivalent, was necessary to counteract the efforts of King Frost was as a rule so old-fashioned that it seemed to have existed only in the picturesque imaginations of the novelist and pictorial artist, a reporter noted on 27th December 1906 reflecting on a countryside covered with a white mantle of snow. In those days a Cambridge byelaws compelled a householder to remove the snow from the path in front of his habitation, which provided an opportunity for out-of-works to earn an honest copper. One rang the bell of a corner house and informed the occupier that he had swept the snow from his path. Obviously the only thing the housekeeper could do was to pay the man for his labour. But when he rang the bell of the adjoining house with many feet of frontage there was no answer: the occupants had gone away for Christmas but not drawn their blinds [SCAN OF TRUMPINGTON STREET CHRISTMAS 1906]

In 1927 snow began Christmas day & led to most complete stoppage of road & rail traffic since the coming of motor car. Many of the main roads in the county were blocked with snowdrifts from six to ten feet. Trains, motor buses and cars were held up and travellers stranded. The wheels of the mail vans were equipped with chains with the result that hold-ups were uncommon, though one van on the Histon – Milton road had to be dug out. The Ortona motor buses had a terrible time in the blizzard. Buses were stuck in snowdrifts and relief gangs had to be sent to dig them out. 1950 was another snowy December when roads became treacherous. Melbourn hill was completely blocked by three lorries across the road, while cars struggled to climb Madingley Hill and there were long queues also in the Girton road because they could not get a sufficient hold on a rising road.

But for all the tales of hardship and people trapped in their vehicles there is still nothing to beat the epic experiences of Elizabeth Woodcock who was lost in the snow for eight days and nights back in February 1799

She had been shopping in Cambridge before setting off back to Impington just as dusk was coming on. Snow was already falling and as she got near home she decided to take a short cut across a field. But her horse took fright at the snowflakes and she dismounted, intending to lead him. But the horse bolted, Elizabeth got disorientated and became lost and exhausted. She sat down under a hedge to rest - and got buried by the snow. Meanwhile the horse came home alone and her husband set out to search for her, without success. They searched the next day and the day after that. They thought she had been stolen by gypsies and would never be seen again - unless when the snow melted her body would be found murdered in a ditch. But then a shepherd noticed a handkerchief sticking out of a snowdrift - and heard Mrs Woodcock shouting at him. He dashed off and came back with men and shovels, together they dug her out. She had been trapped under snow eight days and nights, but was still sensible. They carried her home and called for the doctor. He put her to bed without delay & prescribed small quantities of weak broth – and no strong drink. But Elizabeth's plight attracted attention, people brought out prints and sketches, poems and rhymes all cashing in on her experiences and she had many visitors taking her stronger, more nourishing broth, and strong spirits. Her doctor persuaded her to take port wine and opium and she began to rally, but one by one her toes turned black and had to be snipped off. By April her general health had much improved, but the mutilated state in which she was left, without even a chance of being able to attend to the duties of her family was almost worse than death itself. Still the people came to see her, still they brought her hard liquor, and still Mrs Woodcock enjoyed it. She died on July 24th 1799 a victim of snow, frostbite, and hard liquor. A memorial was erected to her memory near the site of her snowy entombment.[SCAN OF ELIZABETH WOODCOCK TRAPPED IN THE SNOW OR OF THE MEMORIAL WITH KING'S COLLEGE CHAPEL IN THE DISTANCE

Albert (Bertie) Biggs was born at 29, Gwydir Street in 1925. He now lives in Letchworth but has been sharing his memories of the family's dairy.

He writes: "In 1942 the government ordered that there should only be two milk suppliers per street and our family firm (Sturton Town Dairies, A Biggs and Sons) were allocated Gwydir Street, Sturton Street and surrounding roads. Most of the milk came from a farm in Bottisham and the dairy where the milk was bottled and pasteurised was at 121/123 Fitzroy Street.

"My father Frederick Biggs delivered to Gwydir Street with a horse and milk float. He and the horse, named Dinah, started at Norfolk Street end. There were few cars parked but the horse would give them a wide berth and knew where to stop, including outside the dairy at 29, whilst he had his breakfast!"

Another of the company's milkmen was Walter Newman who married Frederick's sister, Alice. Walter carried on the rounds after Fred's death and eventually worked for the company that bought the business.

One day in the mid 1950s Walter was delivering to properties in New Street when his horse, Polly, apparently decided to help out by knocking on a door for the money - or perhaps she was delivering leaflets! But does anybody know the name of the lady!

Albert tells me he drove the float in the photo, but being 17 he preferred the firm's 5cwt Fordson van as the brakes and acceleration was better!

If you can add anything to the story then let me know or take a look at a website devoted to the Gwydir Street area - <http://www.colc.co.uk/cambridge/gwydir/>

Another milkman to operate a horse-drawn float was George Bainbridge; J. Badcock of Cambridge has lent me a snap of him taken in September 1962. But do you recognise the street in which it was taken.

Geoffrey Reed from Girton has contacted me to say he recognised himself amongst the group of lads tobogganing down the slope towards the River Cam beside Victoria Road bridge that I featured in last week's 'Memories. His mother (who will be 97 in February 2010) still has the original CEN copy somewhere in a drawer.

Geoffrey writes: "I guess I was about 10 or 11 years of age at the time. I can remember it vividly and I also 'built' the sledge upon which I was seated! We used to live above my mothers' shop (The Granta Bureau) in Milton Road and my father had hairdressing businesses in the City. I also remember my parents insisting I still wear short trousers when I started at Chesterton Secondary Modern. I did manage to obtain long trousers by my second year. Thus the photo has to be around 1953/54."

Perhaps some of the lads are also amongst the youngsters shown on a picture of a Chesterton Boys' School outing to London as part of the school's 21st anniversary celebrations in July 1956. Can you put any names to the faces?

Two readers from different sides of the Atlantic have shared their memories of the same area of Cambridge.

Alastair Green has emailed from Salem, Oregon to recall the 1960s when he lived on Maids' Causeway a short stroll away from Norfolk Street where his grandfather had a butcher's shop. [SCAN OF MAIDS CAUSEWAY IN 1930's]

"My grandfather made sausages and let me eat the raw pork that remained. Never once was I ill as a result. He would give me a chicken's foot and I'd tie it to a piece of string and drag it round the streets. I used to go down into the cellar of the butcher's shop and remember the smell of the sawdust and all the knives and saws my grandfather used. The steps down were wooden, and there was a length of rope onto which you had to hold when ascending or descending the steps. My grandmother was a great cook, and I well remember her making suet (steak and kidney) pudding. She had a copper and used to cook the pudding in that.

“I remember their house being absolutely frigid in winter. My grandfather wouldn't have the light on in the living room and so we'd sit watching television in the gloom. They had one of those big radios, but it didn't work.

“Grandad only drank bottled Guinness and would have one with lunch. He had fought in France and had shell casings that had been decorated and polished. They had two of those white ceramic dogs that nowadays are probably quite valuable. They also had a number of Toby jugs, and had a bowl and a jug for water in their bedroom.

“In later years I worked for Loker's wholesale newsagents on East Road. [SCAN OF LOKER'S EAST ROAD 1950s]. There was a fish and chip shop on Fitzroy Street and there was part of a sawfish on the tiled wall. In James Street there was a shop owned by an old couple. She had rouge on her cheeks, and I remember the bell above the door. On one occasion, when it started to rain, I sat under a table outside an antique, or possibly furniture, store that was on the same street”. [SCAN OF JAMES STREET 1964].

He recalls: “I was born in Burleigh Street in 1933 and lived there until around 1946. [SCAN OF BURLEIGH STREET c1964] My Mother owned the wool shop on the corner of Adam and Eve Street, number 47. She also had a wool shop in Sussex Street, the Granta Wool Store. I can remember some of the shops in the area.

“In East Road there was Sylvesters on the corner of Dover Hill who sold sweets and ice cream, I used to go there and purchase two separate pennyworths of sweets for myself and my sister once a week. There was Lokers the news agents where I obtained my comics and I had my hair cut at Mathews, a barbers shop full of posters of cricketers and airmen with Brylcreemed hair. In Burleigh Street there was Lefage's grocers shop next door to Renbros, Mr. Wills who repaired radios and charged their batteries and the Dunlop Rubber Company which sold car and bicycle tyres.

“In Fitzroy Street there was a pet shop run by a Mr. Wright where I obtained tropical fish, lizards and green tree frogs, much to the consternation on my long suffering parents. Sturton's was a fantastic emporium, stuffed full of hardware and the pungent smell of paraffin and vinegar. The floors were made of wood and produced wonderful clunking echoes as you walked around. Cash for purchases was put in a small tin and shot up to the cashier's office on an overhead wire device, your change returned by the same route. They also generated their own electricity using a very large oil engine in the lane at the back of the shop, we youngsters would creep around to watch it working. [SCAN OF FITZROY STREET 1964]

“Street lights were ignited by a man on a bicycle carrying a long pole with a burner on the end. He would hook open the lamp door, turn on the gas in light the mantle. At daylight he would reverse the procedure. Milk was delivered on a pony and trap by a Mr. Wortley, scooped out of a churn with a dipper and deposited in your waiting jug. And there was a disabled man who pushed a pram around with a wind up gramophone in it and played records to all and sundry for loose change.”

Alastair sums up both their feelings “I have to say that there are times when I look at some of the photos and wish I could snap my fingers and be on those streets and see the town as it was in the Fifties and Sixties.”

Harry Clements has written to me from Girton passing on his wife Gladys' memories of Christmas

She recalls: "When I was about 6 or 7 years old in 1926/7 my parents and I lived in very cramped conditions with my grand-dad on Brookside in Cambridge. [SCAN OF BROOKSIDE c1910]

"On Christmas Eve my mother would send my dad and me down to the Christmas market in Cambridge to buy oranges and nuts, but mainly to get us out of her way so that she could finish her many preparations. The market square would be really busy with people looking for last-minute bargains, and market traders anxious to dispose of their abundant stock. I had a good view, perched on my dad's shoulders, so I could see all the activity by the lights of the street gas lamps and the gas flares on the market stalls. Market traders were in a jolly mood and later on some of the green-grocery men would throw oranges to the crowd [SCAN OF THE MARKET 1920's]

"I remember that where the Arts Theatre is now in Peas Hill there was a small row of shops including one that was to me a magical shop owned by a Miss Shrive. I loved looking round all the toys. There was one that I particularly desired. It was a tin-plate model of a kitchen about a foot square containing equipment that could also be bought separately: the stove was sixpence and the saucepans threepence. [SCAN OF SHRIVE'S SHOP, PEAS HILL IN 1930's]

"As we made our way home to Brookside along Trumpington Street, the gas lamps were already lit by the gas-lighter and the muffin man would also be calling his wares that were carried in a tin tray on his head. When we arrived home my mum would have finished preparing the food for Christmas day, usually making delicious meals out of not very much. By this time I would be ready for bed which was mum's intention when sending us to the market, so that I wouldn't wake too early on Christmas morning to inspect small presents which today would not be worth consideration"

Michael Cosgrove from Cambridge has added greatly to my knowledge of the old army camp north of Milton Road level crossing. He was a design engineer at Pye Limited and spent two spells working in a Nissen hut on the camp. The first was during the early 1950's when Pye were developing the gun control equipment for the then secret Conqueror tank.

He writes:

Rather than paying repeated visits to the Fighting Vehicles Research and Development Establishment in Surrey it was decided to bring one of the prototype vehicles to Cambridge, and place it on the camp in a Nissen hut furthest away from Milton Road.

By putting the tank to the side midway down the hut it was possible to traverse the gun through 180 degrees, and to fully elevate or depress it. The electric motors were powered by a generator driven by an Austin 7 type petrol engine and, after the briefest of instruction, on a number of occasions my colleague and I had to drive the tank round the perimeter road to refuel it at a depot on site that was operated by the army at that time.

One feature of the design was a separate Commander's turret on top of the main one, to enable him to select a target. This had to stay on line by contra-rotating while the main turret was brought to bear. During the early stage of development control was far from perfect and, until it was demolished, the hut had a large bulge on one side where it had been hit by the gun overshooting the desired bearing. [SCAN OF AN OLD HUT ON THE MILTON ROAD ARMY BASE TAKEN 1974]

Some years later Pye decided to develop a wire-guided anti tank missile (Python) as a private venture. This had full government support short of financial, including rocket firing tests at Cranfield and prototype test flights on the ranges on Salisbury Plain. Initial design work took place in the Club Room over the pub in Portugal Place, and I was given the job of building a flight simulator using a large analogue computer based on a basic design from the Royal Aircraft Establishment at Farnborough. It was called PAMELA (Pye Anti-tank Missile ELectronic Analogue).

Due to its size, the project was moved to another Nissen hut on the Milton Road camp and displayed the missile as a small spot on a cinema sized screen. The computer controlled the position of a missile in flight as seen by its ground controller, allowing for its aerodynamic properties and the controller's input. Some 50,000 simulated flights were made to optimise the control design, using naval ratings as operators. These were drawn from groups who volunteered for unknown experiments carried out by the Medical Research Council in Chaucer Road.

One set of experiments were made for Short Bros. of Belfast, when the simulator was modified to represent a similar ship-borne anti-aircraft missile they were developing. After a few years the project moved to the Pye factory in Orchard Road, Royston, but was eventually terminated when the television receiver market collapsed and funds were no longer available.

Richard Cox from Quy has sent me a picture of his wife Helen's grandfather, Leonard Lofts who lived in Suez Road, Cambridge. But he was not sure where it was taken, perhaps Trinity Street or the Green Street area, he thought.

Just a little research identifies it as Rose Crescent where the Kelly's County Directory of 1937 shows that Harry Tuck's newsagents shop was at number seven. Dating pictures can often be difficult but not in this case. The newspaper headlines relate to a boxing match between McCormick and Beckett which was reported in The Times on 13th September 1921.

Rose Crescent itself saw an epic battle on Bonfire Night 1929. Nearly thirty arrests were made during a Guy Fawkes 'Rag' on Market Hill. Early in the evening an attempt was made to light a bonfire in Petty Cury and there was a considerable blaze in front of Falcon Yard before the police noticed it. Then the undergrads moved to Rose Crescent where an effigy was soaked with petrol, stuffed with fireworks and deposited near the Market Hill end. The Guy itself was quickly put out but the petrol continued to burn for a long time afterwards.

Fire was always a worry. In January 1904 considerable damage was done by a blaze that started in the attic at the Rose Hotel. News was received at the Fire Station by means of the fire alarm post on Market Hill and they were soon on the scene with the horsed fire escape and tender. Despite this much damage was done in a comparatively small area and every room in the hotel suffered from the effects of water, which saturated the ceilings. Fortunately none of the bedrooms were occupied at the time. Then in 1907 firemen fought a blaze in the roof of a building which housed Miss Hutchings' Modes and Ladies' Outfitting Establishment and assistants were kept busy in removing hats and other goods from the shop.

Every generation will have their own memories of the area.

In 1973 a News reporter visited the Gardenia Middle Eastern Restaurant where he dined on Hummus, a thickish paste made with chick peas and oil which you scoop up with pieces of unleavened bread. It was quite tasty though for the price (25p) not particularly plentiful. It is not particularly elegant tackling by hand a four-skewer kebab (60p) in an envelope of unleavened bread with bits of onion and tomato spilling out. But the Gardenia does not pretend to be the place to take a grande dame out to dinner with candles. The Kadeifi (15p) which followed looked on the plate like a prandial imitation of Dougal, everyone's favourite long-haired television dog, he reported. Others preferred to get their food at the nearby Berni Steak Bar or the Health Foods Store, one of the oldest in the country, which traded in the Crescent from 1938 to 1988

Rose Crescent was originally the courtyard of the Rose Inn, with stagecoaches turning in from Trinity Street. Samuel Pepys once stayed there and noted that his rest was disturbed by 'drunken scholars making a noise all night'. In 1980 it was described by its landlord as a place where a man in gumboots and work clothes could stand alongside a businessman with brolly and bowler hat and get along together. Sons of the gentry, over late-night cups of coffee, would ask to borrow the phone to ring 'Mum'. The pub closed in 1981 and was converted into shops and Flambards wine bar.

Many of the original inn buildings had been swept away in the early 1800s for small shops and more change came when Caius College rebuilt the west side of the Crescent as rooms for undergraduates a century later. The somewhat bleak façade was transformed when some of the student bedrooms were turned into up-market shops in 1979.

But what are your memories of this area of central Cambridge.

Memories 1st February 2010 by Mike Petty

Cambridgeshire's past is full of mysteries, some of which have been explained with the publication of the latest volume of Proceedings of the Cambridge Antiquarian Society. But it has also prompted more questions.

Some of the most mysterious archaeological monuments stand just over the county border at Bartlow, near Linton. They are – or were – a series of Roman barrows, the largest in Britain, which when excavated in the 1830s were found to contain a rich array of grave goods dating back to the first and second century AD. Richard Neville, a prominent antiquarian, was present and jotted down his observations in his notebooks. But some of these have disappeared. What is worse is that several of the mounds themselves have also gone, destroyed when a railway line was constructed through the site. This attracted criticism in 1903 when A.R. Goddard wrote to the News:

Sir – the famous barrows known as the Bartlow Hills will soon be no more. It matters nothing that they were reared in Roman times or are the private property of a possessor bent on preserving these splendid relics. The railway company that would have destroyed them 50 years ago but for determined opposition at the time, has set its mind on their removal. They have elected to run their lines through the barrows instead of around them. So the picks of English navvies, backed by compulsory powers, will soon be at work ‘dinging doon’ these works of our Romano British forefathers, since they stand in the way of their company’s dividends. It is nothing short of a national scandal - A.R. Goddard.

In one of those strange coincidences I had been sent a view of the hills by Bryan Howe of the Sawston local history group. It was discovered by Ivan Start who found it in his loft and shows the view from the encroaching railway that was responsible for so much devastation

Now archaeologists from the University of Reading have published the results of recent geophysical and archaeological excavations. Their paper has been illustrated by a view of the hills painted by Richard Relhan, one of a remarkable series held by the Cambridge Antiquarian Society and deposited at the University Library.

A once-prominent Cambridge structure is also featured in the Proceedings. It was known as ‘Vicar’s Buildings and was erected as a model lodging house for sixteen families by the Rev John Cooper, vicar of St Andrew the Great in the mid 1850s. It was intended to provide sound housing at affordable rents for the working classes with one-bedroom apartments costing two shillings a week. They came complete with fire places, mains water and ample waterclosets, facilities far better than most private houses at the time. There were rules that had to be obeyed including no dogs, no drunkenness and no putting flower-pots on the window ledges. It was designed by Richard Reynolds Rowe, architect of the Cambridge Corn Exchange, and stood in St Tibb’s Row until razed for the Lion Yard redevelopment. In its latter days it had been taken over by the Arliss family as a printing works. Many will remember it as a gaunt, structure but when seen through the eyes of an unknown artist is revealed as an attractive building, almost as colourful of some of the people it sheltered.

John Pickles, the Society’s Librarian, has also been exploring the story behind a long-lost roadside stone. It was a memorial to John Layton, an Ely porter who had taken his own life in 1799 utilising a cord previously used to tie up a pig. As the inquest found he had committed suicide he could not be buried in consecrated ground but was interred “near to a certain place called Barton Pitts in the parish of Ely Trinity”, thought to be at the junction of Cambridge and Witchford. A stone was erected by subscription engraved on three sides to warn others of ‘the crime of self murder’. It has now disappeared and would probably have been forgotten but for a sketch by Hilkiah Burgess in 1807. Hilkiah was an engraver who produced views of Lincolnshire and Cambridgeshire churches including a representation of Ely Cathedral as it may have appeared before the collapse of the North Transept. Dr Pickle’s researches have revealed that an album of 130 of Burgess’s ink drawings dated 1808 has been sold in recent years, but he has been unable to track it down.

Can you help solve any of these conundrums – or have you something else to test the experts with?

Memories 8th February 2010, by Mike Petty

I take great delight in travelling around the area talking to groups of all kinds. Sometimes they are brought together by lack of sight, sometimes by a love of gardening, a past employment or just for companionship.

The other week I journeyed out to Haverhill to speak to the 'Golden Girls' who meet in a community room in the middle of a large estate that would not win many architectural awards.

Before I started the presentation on Sherlock Holmes in Cambridge, part two (we did the first part last time), I took the opportunity to share with them an article which had appeared in the Cambridge Daily News just 50 years before

On 28th January 1960 the News devoted virtually a whole page to a story headlined 'Haverhill – A Growing Township'

"Haverhill is a town that wants to grow", the report read. "It claims to be the first ever to ask London, voluntarily, for some of its overspill population and there are no grumbles". Already ninety families, mostly from the East End of London, had moved into a new housing estate in a scheme which would eventually double the present population of the little West Suffolk town. The London County Council paid for the initial cost of putting up factories and houses to encourage industries to relocate. Once firms made the move they brought their workforce with them.

"Many have come from unsatisfactory conditions and now have a home of their own for the first time", the paper reported. Afterwards one of the Golden Girls spoke of her own experiences.

She had lived with her husband and children in a flat in London. They could not lock the door as the tenant upstairs had to use their entrance to get in and out. This meant that she dare not have a bath in the kitchen but had to use the living room instead. One day her husband suggested they take a trip to the country on their motorbike. They put the youngest child in the sidecar and set off for a ride. After a while they arrived at a quaint Suffolk town where the market was in full swing. It seemed tranquil and a world away from the smoke and noise of London.

Later he drew up outside a large building and went inside leaving wife and child in the car park. By the time he got out she had got completely fed up with waiting and gave him a piece of her mind. But he had an excuse: he had a key. They made their way to a new house, the key fitted in the lock and they went inside. It was a marvellous home with all mod cons. And it was theirs if she wanted it! She lives there still, over 40 years later.

There were downsides: "It is possible you will miss the big supermarkets and multiple stores of London, and the food will be rather more extensive, that you will find the mile walk to the shops a bit of a drag". But Premier Travel were opening a bus service and when the estate was complete there would be new local shops, a new police station and court house, a welfare centre and clinic

It would be good for Haverhill because without the vitality and prosperity of new people the town might fade away. The only people opposing it were farmers worried it take use up valuable farming land and that the new factories would attract agricultural workers off the soil.

The move to Suffolk was a life-changing experience for all those brave or lucky enough to take the opportunity: they knew they would ever be able to afford to go back to their old way of life in the Capital. It had benefits: "Most of your neighbours, like yourself, come from Islington, Shoreditch, Stepney, Bethnal Green, Finsbury, Poplar or Lambeth and you share your vast change of environment with them. In time more and more of your neighbours will be Haverhill people as the local council proceeds with its intention of mixing Londoners with their country cousins".

Some felt this integration had not been entirely successful. One lady said local people did not speak to her. But she was a Suffolk girl who had served in the Forces before returning back to her roots and now finds a jolly welcome amongst the 'Golden Girls'.

So what were your memories of starting a new life in Haverhill?

Memories February 15th 2010, by Mike Petty

Yesterday being Valentine's Day prompted me to search my files for various snippets relating to love and marriage some of which prove that the course of true romance does not always run smoothly. We cannot however be responsible for the actions of our parents so I have removed the surnames to lessen embarrassment.

Some love affairs were kept secret:

In April 1929 the News carried a story of how Hector M., a freshman of Pembroke College had been staying at Miss Emily R's house with her brother, who was also a Pembroke undergraduate. The girl had left home one Saturday and motored to Chelmsford in her dad's car taking a quantity of luggage with her. There she met Mr M who left his own car in a garage there with the number plate missing. The two motored back to Trumpington but had since disappeared. Her dad feared the worst: "I suppose my daughter and Mr M must have gone away with the intention of getting married at Gretna Green". Emily was described as 'full face, fresh complexion, shingled curly hair' while Hector was a clean shaven young man with dark hair parted in the centre and brushed back. But when the News made inquiries at the blacksmith's cottage where many marriages had taken place they could find no trace of them. "It may be a joke, but if so it is a pretty poor one", the girl's father told a Press Association representative. But the young man's father could not see why so much fuss was being made.

In September 1930 the News reported: The secret marriage has just been revealed of a Cambridge girl Miss Rosa K of Kimberley Road to Reginald C, a millionaire colliery owner and shipping magnate. Her family had no idea of the wedding and the first the groom's family knew was when they saw a notice in the marriage column of a newspaper. Miss K, who is a pretty blonde, first met her husband when she was secretary to the Curator of the Botanical Garden to which he was a generous benefactor.

Some enjoy marriage so much that they do it again and again:

In January 1904 the Old Bailey heard the case of an Ely lady, Florence R. of Little Downham Road. Her first husband William had obtained a divorce nisi in 1887 citing Henry F. as co-respondent, but it was never made absolute. However Florence married Henry, or at least they went through a form of marriage, for as the first was not dissolved the second wedding was illegal and bigamous. It got worse: After Henry went away to South Africa Flo made the acquaintance of a man named B., whom she subsequently married. When Henry learnt of this he informed the police. Florence was sentenced to five day's imprisonment, equivalent to an immediate discharge.

Then to add to the complications Florence's mother married first husband William's father in the belief he was dead. William thus occupied this bewildering position: His father was his father-in-law. His mother-in-law was his step-mother. His wife was his step-sister and two other men had married his wife.

Sometimes it does not turn out as people imagine, as the News reported in July 1905:

Mr Prevett, the clever local Punch and Judy man was performing at a garden party near Cottenham and demonstrating the unhappy relations between Punch and his spouse with much vigour. At the conclusion of the show he was accosted by a lady who protested his manipulation of the dolls was too brutal and would have a demoralising effect on the poor innocent rustics. A short time after the lady married and quite recently was fined for assaulting her husband with a garden rake!

Others seem to be sure that men are to be shunned! This comes from January 1909: Harriet E. was a well-known figure around Mill Road, Cambridge. She usually wore a white veil and carried a portmanteau or bag in each hand and would walk along in a methodical manner until a certain shop was reached where she would have sixpennyworth of firewood carefully placed in one of her leather bags. She was so confirmed a man hater that she would not use money that bore the king's head. If she was given any she would throw it in the fire. She had never had a sweetheart and never wanted one, her inquest was told.

Other people advertise for a partner, as March 1909:

A fortnight ago the Cambridge Board of Guardians received a letter from a widow asking for assistance in obtaining her a husband. It was published in the News. Now she had received 78 replies. Several came from inmates of workhouses, some were musical and some expert in poultry keeping. One had a house, business and £700, another a pension. Two had the misfortune to have lost their legs, one from the knee down.

The most successful advertisement seems to have been a simple notice beside the village street: In April 1930 Mr Hewson C, a Horningsea bachelor, placed a notice on the front of his cottage. It read: 'S.O.S. Wanted a Wife. A real girl, not a church prude'. He described himself as a poet and farmer born in County Cork who had gone to sea and lived in the USA before coming to the village two years before. He had published one volume of poems but complained that with working in his garden and preparing meals, he had no time to write. When he married he would write a 'best seller'. The notice worked: he was inundated with letters: 'They have come from all parts of the country, including Jersey. Many have come from London, from Mayfair as well as Hampstead, from servant girls as well as from girls who run their own cars. One letter enclosed a photograph of a delicate, refined-looking blonde, whom he declares he will probably marry'. By July he had apparently been successful: He sent a note: 'I am engaged to marry Miss A. F. from Fulham and will be married on September 23rd in London. I desire to thank the Cambridge Daily News for the kind publicity leading to such a happy result.'

More recently other means have been tried: In January 1981 a Cambridge student set up a computer dating service for lonely hearts in the university. For just 50p the unattached undergraduate was promised an introduction to the partner of his dreams. Confidential questionnaires drawn up by a student of experimental psychology were sent out and the results loaded on a computer. It matched them up to produce ideal partners and bliss ensues – they claimed. It was hoped the first couples would be paired off by St Valentine's Day.

Just in case it all went to plan and the couple planned to wed, the News in April 1981 had these hints. The prices might have changed a little over the last few years:

The least expensive part of a traditional wedding is the service. In an Anglican Church the basic charges for the ceremony without music add up to £25 plus an extra £3 for reading the banns. Extras such as an organist or choir cost £5 each. A Shire Hall register office ceremony costs £13. But a wedding dress averages £65, flowers £30 and wedding photographs at least £80. A Littleport firm now offers a video film for £85 but you need a video recorder to watch it afterwards.

If any of things rings any bells – wedding or otherwise – then let me know!

Jean Shanks has been in touch with some memories and also an enquiry. She emails:

"On 25th January, 2010 there was a photograph of my late father Leonard Lofts standing outside a newsagent's shop in Rose Crescent. I am now 82 years old and it was wonderful to see my Dad in the CDN. I was born seven years after the photograph was taken. Thank you."

She continues: "When I was a small girl of around nine years old I was with my dad on Midsummer's Common where I think we had been watching "The Bumps". I have a memory of him turning me away from a scene - not very pleasant - of the manual ferry sinking in the middle of the River Cam with a good few people on it with their bicycles. I have spoken to lots of people in the past and nobody seems able to throw any light on the subject. Can you help please".

The most dramatic story of a ferry sinking revolves around the Red Grind at Fen Ditton which capsized when it became overloaded following the ending of the May bumps in 1905. But this is obviously not the incident Jean is recalling.

Mishaps at ferries were not uncommon: in January that year Cambridge councillors were told of a fatal accident at Dant's Ferry a few days prior to Christmas when the breadwinner of a family was drowned. It was only one of many incidents for during that winter at least five persons had tumbled into the water at that spot. There was agitation for footbridges to replace the chain ferries and two of these were built in 1927. One was at the Fort St George where the existing ferry which had carried people across the river for many years decided not to wait to be made redundant but sank shortly before the bridge was opened. However this cannot have been what Jean remembers either.

One ferry that did continue was the Horse Grind that crossed the river from Chesterton to Stourbridge Common until a bridge was opened there in 1935. A News article reported on its imminent demise: ““Old Alf” as he is familiarly known to hundreds, is still at the helm which he has held for the past 34 years. He will continue to propel his ungainly but faithful craft until it is finally docked. The Horse Grind, as its name indicates, at one time afforded passage for horse and cart as well as pedestrians and two ferries plied at the spot. As it the case of the ferries available to the public, it has been attached to a waterside hostelry. Its passing will leave only one such ferry remaining on the Cam: the ‘Pike and Eel’ a short distance further downstream.”

But none of this helps with Jean’s recollections of a ferry sinking in the mid 1930s. If so you can solve this mystery please contact me at the News and I’ll pass it on to her.

Antony Challis (jnr) contacted historian Allan Brigham with some interesting information concerning ‘Reality Checkpoint’, the lamp standard in the middle of Parker’s Piece.

Tony emailed: “As an established historian of Cambridge, I hope you will be interested in a more accurate account of the lamp post, commonly known as Reality Checkpoint. At the same time, perhaps rectifying an injustice.

“You are no doubt aware this is supposedly the oldest electric lamp in Cambridge. However, what is not generally known is that this is NOT in fact the original!

“The original post was torn down by American GI’s celebrating VJ, the end of the war with Japan. It was replaced by a local metalworks firm, George Lister & Sons, Cambridge. The work was done by foreman Mr Sam Mason, assisted by a young apprentice, Tony Challis, who did the iron scrollwork at the top of the lamp post. Mr Challis still lives in Cambridgeshire, and is also responsible for the ornate railings found at Grantchester Meadows.

“This is a little recognised fact, but one my family is rather proud of. Why: because Tony Challis is my father and as he approaches his 80th year, (and as it happens, his Diamond Anniversary), I feel it is only right that he should have his place in Cambridge history for his part in a local and well know landmark”.

From my notes it appears that in December 1893 Cambridge Corporation came to an agreement with the Electric Supply Company to erect the standard at a cost of £39 and the work was commenced early in 1894. The Corporation paid for the standard and for the first year the Company supplied the current free of cost. Following the damage in 1945 the lamp was redesigned and, according to the Table Talk column in the CDN on 21st September 1946, became the first fluorescent light in the country. It was repainted in bright colours by undergraduates in 1973 with the council’s permission.

But doubtless somebody will be able to add more memories of this important landmark. And when did it acquire the ‘Reality Checkpoint’ name

It's a long way from a palace in Bangkok to Mitcham's Corner, Cambridge. But that was the journey made by the grandson of the King of Siam in the 1930s.

Prince Chula Chakrabongse of Thailand had been educated at Harrow School where he had never quite felt accepted by the other boys, perhaps because of his oriental appearance. So when he came to Cambridge University in October 1927, as a man of his wealth and stature must do, he was determined to make up for that. There was only one college that would possibly be suitable: Trinity and his Country's emissaries were set to work to ensure his admission. But even his wealth and influence could not bend the rules and for his first year he would not be allowed rooms inside the college itself. He would have to live in a lodging house.

The Prince was allocated rooms above Arthur Shepherd's tailor's shop at 32 Trinity Street, where he was one of the young men supervised by Miss Davy, the landlady. His bedroom was on the third floor immediately opposite the bathroom he shared with three other undergraduates. If this was convenient it was offset somewhat by the fact that his sitting-room was on the first floor at the back of the house far from the street with a view of the grey walls of the college lecture room.

Nor was the décor to his taste. The room had ugly wallpapers, dark red curtains and armchairs and sofas covered in a hideous red plush. He immediately had it redecorated with a plain cream paper, the furniture was covered in a more modern kind of material in dark peacock blue and the early Victorian lamps replaced by some of a modern design. One wall was filled with shelves to take the collection of five hundred books he'd amassed whilst at school.

His table was quickly filled with letters – hundreds of circulars from innumerable university clubs and societies together with others from shops in Cambridge offering everything the new undergraduate could conceivably want – match boxes, tobacco jars and other utensils all decorated with his college crest. They were known as “freshers' delights”.

Prince Chula dined at Trinity where meals were served in three settings with the new arrivals allocated the 6.30 slot. He sat at the same place night after night when he talked to the same group and seldom spoke to anybody else. His friends were two boys who had known at Harrow, though he got to meet others once he started coxing for the college rowing team. He soon had a wider circle of acquaintances including one man recognised as ‘one of the bright stars of the intellectual firmament’; his name was Anthony Blunt.

Chula organised dinner parties in his rooms. Officially he was supposed to eat in college four times a week but provided he paid for the meal nobody bothered that he did not turn up to consume it. Instead he ordered food from the college kitchen which was served in his room by college waiters.

In his second year he was allowed a motor car although he did not care to drive. So the Siamese legation paid for an Avions-Voisin sports saloon capable of 70 mph complete with a chauffeur. In it he travelled extensively, motoring to Biarritz for the summer vacation or to visit his mother in Paris. By now he was sharing his accommodation – he decided he liked it much better than the main college – with his cousin Abhas and Manxman Smuts, a pedigree wire-haired terrier that he nicknamed Tony. It had a sweet expression and was most affectionate. It also learned numerous tricks, including walking in front of him in the street carrying the obligatory ‘square’, or mortar-board, in its mouth.

Of course His Highness did study, though this was somewhat secondary to his main reason for being in Cambridge. When he’d finished his three years he was allowed to stay on for another two to research eighteenth-century history. But by now Miss Davy had retired and the new landlady was less tolerant of his late lay-ins. So he moved to a lodging house run by Miss Stanley on Chesterton Road. There they had a garden so Tony could take a wife and start a puppy family.

Prince Chula left Cambridge in June 1932 and moved down a fine house in London where he wore his silk hat and tailcoat to the numerous balls that a gentleman was expected to attend during the season. There were problems back home where a revolution meant that he lost his immense annual income of £1,000 from the King. But this was something he could live with.

Much more tragic was the death of his dog in April 1933. The dogs’ cemetery at Hyde Park was already full up so he had Tony buried in a pets’ cemetery near Huntingdon. And, as a memorial to his friend, Prince Chula presented Cambridge with a water trough he had built, with permanently changing water. It was positioned at Mitcham’s Corner, not far from the garden in which Tony had been so content.

The Prince went on to marry an Englishwoman, set up home in Cornwall and establish a motor racing team. He also erected a second dog drinking trough dedicated to his four-footed friend, this one in Bodmin in a somewhat more peaceful setting than the original on Chesterton Road.

The opening of Jamie Oliver’s Italian Restaurant in Wheeler Street marks a new chapter for a building that has served the people of Cambridge for over a century. For most of those years it was a public library.

Cambridge Free Library service was inaugurated on 28th June 1855 in rented rooms in the Friends Meeting House in Jesus Lane. At first people flocked to the library for the books but it soon became clear that they also wanted to take them home to read by the light of their own candles. It took three years before a Lending department was established.

Readers also wanted newspapers though the Library Committee was reluctant to spend money on such things. They eventually conceded that papers could be allowed, but only if they were free. The proprietors of the Cambridge Chronicle and Cambridge Independent Press duly obliged and others agreed to supply copies of The Times and The Daily News that were only one day old. It had an immediate impact as Librarian John Pink recalled: "life was infused in an almost lifeless institution, a larger public quickly availed themselves of the privileges provided"

It was soon apparent that more space would be required and this was made available at the back of the Guildhall in June 1862. Even this was soon too small and in 1881 the Council agreed to build a new handsome domed Reading Room designed by George McDonell which opened on 14th June 1884. Here people flocked to read newspapers and magazines and to consult material from the Library's Cambridgeshire Collection that was displayed in cases around the room.

It was never the easiest space to keep warm. In April 1904 a reader wrote to the News: "Sir – I would like to know who is responsible for the very cold atmosphere in the Cambridge Free Library Reading Room. A few weeks ago I tried to enjoy an hour's reading, but the cold and draughts were so severe that, although a hearty vigorous man accustomed to outdoor work in all weathers, I caught a severe cold. In the recent cold snaps the room has been under 45 degrees all day long."

The next month it almost got too hot. A patrolling policeman, PC Winter, noticed smoke coming from a small window above the main door of a corn merchant's premises on Peas Hill at about half-past four in the morning. He aroused the occupants of neighbouring buildings and called for the fire brigade. They faced a formidable fight.

The lower floor of the lathe-and-plaster building was occupied by a shop and offices but the two floors above were full of corn, hay, straw and chaff. They were soon blazing fiercely with the street alive with rats fleeing for their lives. Happily there was little wind and plenty of water and when the flames had been subdued the domed roof of the library was still visible above the charred remains.

Following the usual delays the site was developed for new council offices and extra library provision. So things remained until 1939 when with the opening of the new Guildhall more space became available. The Reference department moved upstairs into the now-vacant offices and the Lending Library was moved into the domed room.

Other changes followed until by the time I started in 1964 the Reference Library was downstairs once more. There was a separate newspaper reading room which became a favourite haunt for gentlemen whose personal hygiene was not always of the highest and whose damp socks needed to be dried on the now-efficient radiators. Later this was replaced by a music department where one could borrow gramophone records. So things remained until the opening of a new Central Library in Lion Yard in 1975.

Now after a period as the Tourist Information Centre the former library has been transformed into a restaurant and people eat where previously they scanned the shelves looking for cookery books.

My own food memory dates back to October 1972 when I organised an exhibition in the Guildhall on the history of tourism. One of the displays came from the Old Fire Engine House at Ely who kindly produced a selection of traditional fenland fare including eel pie. But by the end of the week it had passed its best and, not quite knowing what to do with, it I placed it on the library roof from the Saturday night till Monday morning. By then it had attracted the attention of half the cats in Cambridge!

It was always said that the old library was haunted by the ghost of its first librarian, John Pink. If he'd still there let's hope he likes pasta!

Orwell is a village of whitewashed, thatched cottages – or at least it was until several of them were condemned by the council as being unfit for human habitation and demolished in the 1960s. Many of their occupants were pleased to be rehoused in council properties in Meadowcroft Way and Fishers Lane, saying ‘the only place for old cottages is in pretty pictures on the sitting room wall’

With so much necessary change it is inevitable that the village streetscape will have altered. Recently members of the Orwell Community Archive Group have been seeking out and taking photographs of how it was, and how it is today. These have been displayed on the Cambridgeshire Community Archives Network website - www.ccan.co.uk - and now a selection of the images have been issued in a book funded by a National Lottery grant which has been distributed to each house in the village. There a few copies remaining for folk who have memories of Orwell

His name was Keith Hunt and he has recently sent me a picture that does not appear in the new book. This is not surprising, for Keith’s picture is unique. It shows him as a young lad and was drawn and presented to him by Ken Robinson the Cambridge Daily News’ sports cartoonist. Ken produced regular sketches of prominent sportsmen that appeared in the Light

Blue special sports edition of the paper. Were you ever featured, or can you tell me more about this talented artist

Meanwhile in those days youngsters in Harston and Hauxton had nothing to do in the evening except hang around in the street. So a dozen of them decided to take action and sought the assistance of the Vicar the Rev Hugh Mansfield-Williams, to ask if he would organise a youth club. They were not members of his church, nor would the club have any religious emphasis. It was to be open to all, provided they lived in Harston or Hauxton.

Soon it had 145 members and each Tuesday between 90 and 100 packed into the village hall on youth club night. They arrived on motorbike, scooter, bike or foot. More would like to join: one week the Cambridge bus arrived almost full with city youngsters who wanted to spend the evening there only to be turned away.

So what was the formula for success? There was table tennis or draughts and a police officer attended, not to reprimand or lecture, but to teach the lads boxing. However the principal activity was pop dancing and the club had a gramophone to supply the music. It also had its own skiffle group who, according to the Vicar, 'appeared to achieve the accepted sounds with competence'.

Kids didn't have to be active: there was a canteen run by village ladies which sold soft drinks, tea, coffee and snacks. But if all they wanted to do was to prop up the walls, talk to one another and smoke then this was a legitimate and proper thing for the club to provide, said the minister.

One night a News photographer attended to take a series of snaps. Are you amongst them?

We had something similar in Stretham which flourished until the new Parish Hall was opened. This was just too large and impersonal a space compared to the old hall and somehow the atmosphere just never came back. Did you have one in your village too?

Dorothy Creek has written from Barrington to share her memories.

I was born in Grantchester in 1922 and as a child visited the 'town', as we called it, quite often, usually with my grandmother. We would go to the market, where the stalls were lit or warmed by gas-flares and Granny bought sweets from Mr & Mrs Jim Reynolds, always a friendly couple, who, to a child, never seemed to change from year to year!

I recall Coad's Outfitters tiny shop next to Woolworths in Sidney Street and Sainsbury's with its marble floor and chairs for customers. I loved to watch the assistants serve butter with the wooden pats.

From the market to Petty Cury, past the Fifty-shilling Tailors on the corner, with Nichols butchers on the opposite corner, down to Lyons for a hot drink and a bun, Then it was on past Dolcis shoes and over to Mac Fisheries to watch the fish in the tank below the marble slab. I remember the man who sold posies and buttonholes near there. Extra care had to be taken when crossing the road as there was two-way traffic and that included double-decker buses!!

Returning to Drummer Street to catch the bus home we would collect any shopping-bags left in "Jim's" care at the end of Christ's Lane and sometimes hear or catch sight of the couple who played a gramophone mounted on an old pram.

Life was rich with small pleasures, looked forward to for weeks, and talked over many times afterwards. I think that is why they are recalled so vividly

Mike Dawson from Chesterton has responded to my request for memories of Ken Robinson, the News sports cartoonist of the 1950s.

Your memories page today brings back memories of many years ago when I was a lad in Cherry Hinton. I lived in Mallets Road with my parents and sister at Number 22 and Ken lived with his family just along the road at Number 36.

He was a lovely chap; a real gentle man. As I recall, his day job was as a scientist at the University's Zoology Department. I can picture him now bouncing along in his brown brogues and Harris Tweed suit on the balls of his feet (he was one of those people who appeared to walk on his toes rather than his feet and heels) with his bushy beard, trilby hat and pipe stuffed full of St Bruno ready rubbed.

Back in the early sixties, he was one of the few people who had a car. There were several of us who were mad keen U's fans (then in the Southern League of course) and he was always happy to take as many as seven of us (including himself) to the Abbey in his Black Austin 7, to save us having to bike down Coldham's Lane and across the Common to the match. We always travelled through Teversham (long before Airport Way) on to Newmarket Road and parked in Elfleda Road behind the ground.

I played for both Colville School and the under-elevens City Schoolboy side, and remember sitting in his front room, along with all the other members of the School Team whilst he drew individual caricatures of us in the Black and Amber of United in exactly the same style as the picture of Keith Hunt which you show in last week's paper. To this day, it hangs proudly in my bathroom at home.

He drew many of the local sportsmen of both City, United and others which appeared regularly in the Light Blue. It was, of course, at a time when both clubs were doing well in the Premier Division of the Southern League and had a number of well known players, some of whom played for both clubs over the years (Brian Moore, Matt McVitie for example). 'Gentleman Jim' Sharkey was also featured by Ken. For those readers who don't know or cannot remember, Jim Sharkey played for the U's, and always turned up for matches dressed as a City Gent, complete with bowler hat and briefcase.

As far as I can recall, Ken moved down to the Bristol area with his family in the mid to late sixties, presumably for work reasons. However, he continued to have his work published for a while in the 'News after he left Cambridge until the end of the decade.

I can truly say that I feel privileged to have known such a kind and considerate man and that he figured in my early life for all too brief a time.

Recent stories of the cancellation of Strawberry Fair on Midsummer Common and that thousands of its supporters have vowed to hold an unofficial event in its place seem familiar. Strawberry Fair started as a free pop festival in 1974 and has since expanded into a massive event attracting thousands of people, proving disruptive to residents and difficult to police.

For centuries Midsummer Common has resounded to the sounds of an annual event that was hailed in 1887 as "probably best known fair in world". Once known as 'Pot Fair' it once included auctions of china, pictures and millinery as well as a major horse fair. Local shopkeepers objected to competition from the traders: "Sir – every year our Midsummer Fair is visited by a number of itinerant merchants selling pots, pans, linoleum, furs, drapery and various oddments. They pay little rent and no rates and taxes and yet they take away hundreds of pounds" one wrote in June 1905.

By then there were other attractions. A report from 1900 describes the scene: Of roundabouts there are plenty and there are two resplendent switchbacks. Half-a-dozen shows include a menagerie and cinematograph exhibition and the remainder of the fair is made up of shooting galleries, coconut shies, toy and sweet meat stalls, cheapjack wares and drinking booths. There are no less than 15 refreshment saloons, some of which serve a double purpose in supplying thirsty ones and providing accommodation for dancers.

But even then there were problems: Sir – is it not about time that the annual Bacchanalian orgy known as Midsummer Fair was abolished? On Saturday night men, women and even children intoxicated by drink were behaving like maniacs. There were 14 tents for the supply of intoxicating liquors whilst behaviour in the dancing tents is indescribable 'A.J.L.B' complained in 1905

Such events have always been difficult to control. An engraving of 1777 shows a University Proctor dispensing justice at Pot Fair while at Stourbridge Fair the Mayor of Cambridge held a 'Court of Piepowder' in which disputes between merchants and buyers were settled on the fairground. To assist him keep of the peace the Mayor had eight sergeants who were known from their attire as 'Red Coats'. Should any quarrel or argument break out a shout of 'Red Coat! Red Coat!' immediately brought one of these officials to the scene. The sergeants also kept a careful watch for cheats and pickpockets and their constant cry of 'Look out about you there!' added to the noise and excitement of the occasion.

Noise was one reason that in 1931 the council decided to ban the fair from Midsummer Common. Instead the showman were offered the use of Stourbridge Common where Cambridge's other historic fair was held (although by then it was a very insignificant event). At the time people considered it extremely unlikely that it would ever return to its traditional home.

But the showmen were not to be bullied: they boycotted the new site and arranged a separate event on a meadow on Newmarket Road, opposite Ditton Fields. It proved a great success with thousands flocking to the alternative event. The only complaints were about the bus fares to the more-distant venue. The Showman's Guild also took steps to eliminate the 'undesirables' and show that fair folk were as sober and industrious as the rest. Next year Midsummer Fair was back in its traditional place. It was discontinued during the early years of the Second World War, reopening in 1943 and by 1953 was back in full swing. Showmen threatened to boycott the fair again in 1981 after a squabble with the council over a proposed rent increase. But this was resolved.

Time will tell whether Strawberry Fair will also return to the Cambridge scene.

Memories 5th April 2010, by Mike Petty

Last week the ancient church of Fen Ditton was filled for the funeral of Dan Jackson.

There were family, many friends, former colleagues and not a few of us who knew Dan best for the hundreds of articles he contributed for so many years to the Cambridge Evening and Weekly News. He wrote features, on fishing, on his extensive knowledge of antiques and on Cambridgeshire history including a series of ‘Down Your Street’ articles.

Seated immediately behind a pillar I had time to reflect on those who had sat in that pew before, wondering just who it was that had scratched their initials in the soft stone over the preceding centuries.

Probably the most memorable service to have been held in the church was that on Sunday May 6th 1849. That morning the roads and lanes had been thronged by a massive congregation with several hundred waiting for the doors to open. The crowds were so dense that the clerk had difficulty pushing his way through with the key. Almost instantly all 1,000 seats were taken, with people standing on them for a better view. The aisles were packed and even the altar table was occupied. The atmosphere was not one of religious peace: it was a hub-bub of bawdy talk

Outside people scrambled onto the roof of the side aisle so they could peer in through the upper windows, the glass of which was smashed so they could hear as well.

Meanwhile at the Rectory the elderly parson tried to get the service abandoned. But his young wife would not allow it. For she claimed she had been libelled by the parish sexton, Edward Smith, after he had consumed too much ale in a village pub. The matter had been taken up in the Ecclesiastical Court and the chap sentenced to say sorry in a public penance. This was the day and she was not going to be denied.

As the clock struck eleven the clerical party left for the church. It included the Rev A.H. Small of Emmanuel College who was to minister, Charles Henry Cooper the Town Clerk of Cambridge, the Rector and his lady. They took pushed their way through to take their place in the enclosed high pew reserved for them.

No sooner did Small start the service than there were calls of ‘Speak up, old boy’ followed by a chorus of jeers as one chap tried to clamber up a pillar so he could see more clearly, only to slip down again. The hymns were cancelled and the minister, now trapped in the pulpit, soon found that his text ‘Judge not, that ye be not judged’ was drowned by cat-calls, whistles and laughter

Excitement mounted as the time came for Smith to make his appearance. He forced his way to the front and started to read his recantation for the wicked things he had said about what had been found in the pond in the rectory garden. Then the hassocks started flying from every direction, one bursting and scattering chaff on those below. They were joined by a broom somebody had found in a cupboard and before long even the pews were broken into pieces and thrown in all directions.

The minister, rector and his wife fought their way out of the church back to the Rectory, which was soon besieged and every window broken. Meanwhile Smith was carried out high on the shoulders of men who claimed to be his supporters to the Plough Inn which was soon as full as the church had been, the revelry continuing long into the afternoon.

By contrast last week the gathering in the Ancient Shepherds, Dan's former local, was quietly reflective of the life of a man who had touched so many.

Andy Bush from Balsham has written asking about something that has perhaps disappeared from memory

He writes: "One thing that has always fascinated me is the ammunition testing site in the top of Lime Kiln Hill where the Caravan Club now has its site. I clearly recall, in the late 50's, going there to see buildings with dark rooms, weapons stands and the firing tunnels running into the chalk walls. There was a target plate with a fired round stuck halfway through it. I have never seen any information about this site. My father was a police officer in Cambridge for all his career, but he knew nothing other than it tested ammunition! Have you any information on this site, its history, purpose and life span?"

A Ministry of Supply small-calibre range for testing armour-piercing projectiles was established in Swann's Lime Pits before 1952. That year the County Council considered its development as an armament testing range and research establishment. Coun Rackham deplored the possibility of explosions taking place at the back of the adjoining school and said that the noise of the blasts ran along the ground and shook doors and windows. People have had to replace ceilings that have been shaken down, he reported. City Councillors raised no objections providing that any additional buildings were erected in the deeply-excavated position and that nothing larger than a six-pounder gun was used. But it was only to be fired in the morning & preceded by a warning.

The booming of the six-pounder gun caused complaints but Alderman Doggett said he had stood within three or four feet of the weapon and was not 'disturbed' – "although it was true he had his fingers in his ears". Councillor Cox agreed: he thought complaints of the amount of vibration from the gun – not much larger than an anti-tank rifle – were "stupid and fantastic".

But Councillor Finbow said the neighbourhood should not be subject to range firing morning, noon and night. He had a personal gripe: the whole of the ceiling in one of his bedrooms collapsed because of the vibration. Correspondents to the News confirmed that the bangs did crack walls, move brickwork, bring down plaster, crack windows and scare children, adults and animals. When doors rattled, knockers chattered, cracks appeared and were repaired, only for the plaster to be shaken out again they were at liberty to be concerned. – J.S. Read complained to the News. Despite this the council approved the use of the site by the Ministry of Supply for a period of three years. But what happened next, can you tell me more?

Norman Long from Littlehampton, West Sussex has appealed for memories of a plane that crashed in St Mary's Street Ely in August 1951. Oliver Silcock recalled the aftermath: "I remember it was sometime before 9am. I had asked my oldest son, Edward Silcock, to go to Mr. Fletcher's grocery shop for milk etc. He said he wouldn't - it was as well he didn't! – because a large bang, which made No. 3 St. Mary's Street (my house) tremble. I thought it was a bomb - the darkness and the hail of dust, earth rattling at the doors and windows, it was very frightening. Its sound was like a million hailstones hitting our roof. I remember I was afraid to move!!

"Some of the wreckage fell outside our front door so my son by refusing to go on an errand saved his life. A pram outside Joe Brand's shop was crushed and the King's Arms (opposite) had their pub windows and door damaged. People came from nowhere, but I was told not to leave the house because of the fuel that was everywhere, running down the street. A passer-by, who I knew, said the driver of that lorry had stopped to buy cigs at Mr. Cook's shop opposite the Church. Had he not, then the 'plane would have missed him - it was a grim sight. (Her sons ran out despite being told to keep in and told her the driver's head had been decapitated)

"I also remember the vicar of St. Mary's Church was also on the scene as the young airman was dying. I remember the second airman was taken to the RAF Hospital, Lynn Road, but later was taken to Fulbourn Hospital in Cambridge. The road was blocked off and RAF servicemen were on guard. It was a day to remember. This is a scribbled account but worth a mention. I guess if the plane's wing had come off I would not be writing this story" she told a Clacton newspaper in 2001

Fenstanton is a village used to heavy traffic, though now it thunders past on the A14. Back in June 1924 it was the scene of an unusual accident, as the CDN reported: As one of Thurston's traction engines was nearing Fenstanton the middle of the three trolleys it was drawing was noticed to be on fire. The flames quickly spread and the organ of the motor scenic railway, was soon well alight. As no water could be procured sand from the gravel pits was thrown over the fire but the flames proved too strong and the whole organ and the trolley upon which it was mounted completely collapsed. It is suggested the outbreak was due to a spark from the engine which found its way through the protecting wire gauze on top of the chimney.

Such incidents would be forgotten were it not for the vigilant of newspapers correspondents or local photographers who record the scene. Jean Ding has been collecting Fenstanton pictures for many years and will be staging a display in the United Reformed Church in Chequer Street Fenstanton on Saturday 24th April starting at 10 am. At a previous event one lady found a picture of her late granddad which she had never seen before. When Jean made her a copy on the spot she was moved to tears. So if this was your family home pop along and see what you recognise. And take along your old pictures too – you may have one Jean has never seen!

I've recently been puzzling over three boats

The first was brought to my attention when I was speaking to a meeting for widows in the Bateman Street building that was once home to Cheshunt College. David Peppererll from Stapleford had been cheering on the 'Stutes when he spotted something strange in the gravel of the terraces at the Glass World Stadium. He picked it up, took it home and gave it a good clean. What he'd found looked like a small coin, about the size of an old silver threepenny-piece. It had a picture of a three-masted sailing ship and some letters.

While waiting for the ladies to finish lunch I borrowed my wife's spectacles and peered at the small disk. I seemed to make out the words 'Reach Fen' & the name 'Lauer' on one side with a sailing ship and 'Ultra Plus' on the other.

Could this be one of the tokens that were issued by local tradesmen and farmers in the troubled times of the 1650s? That wonderful book, 'The Fenland, past and present' by Samuel Miller and Sydney Skerchly contains pages devoted to the various designs issued at Littleport, Brandon, Chatteris, Ely, Cottenham and St Ives amongst other places. There is no mention of Reach but in such an important place, scene of the great trading fair which attracted people from far and wide, somebody could surely have produced something similar.

It would certainly repay further investigation.

Then pausing at the News on the way home I was shown two other images of boats, this time in the form of old photographs sent in by Mrs M.H. Betts of Ditton Fields. They had been found amongst the effects of the late Harry Cross of Little Wilbraham. Both show river excursions from Jesus Lock probably in the early 1900s. The names of the boats can be identified, one was on 'His Majesty', the other 'Otter'.

Both were steam-powered craft which would make the excursion down to Baits Bite lock or beyond to the Five Miles from Anywhere at Upware – entrance to the river system that leads to Reach – or sometimes to Ely itself. 'His Majesty' sometimes towed a tender named 'Queen Alexandra', the 'Otter' had 'Otter Hound' to accommodated larger groups.

Such trips were very popular in the Edwardian era. In August 1905 the News reported how a number of fishermen and fireman had an enjoyable outing on board the 'Majesty' to Upware where they sat down to one of Host Peachey's liberal dinners after which the fishermen went fishing and the remainder had a trip to Ely, returning for tea and games. The return journey was enlivened by songs accompanied by Mr Sid Smith on his banjo. They reached home by 10 pm.

Next year Messrs Bullen, the boat builders of Magdalene Street, ran their first trip of the season in June when 'His Majesty' and 'Queen Alexandra' was packed with 84 people for a free outing to Ditton Plough where an enjoyable time was spent.

The steam-powered 'Otter' and her 'Hound' ran a excursion out to Upware on 25th August 1907 leaving Jesus Lock at 8.30 sharp continuing on to Ely. The fare on that occasion was two shillings for the complete trip.

I have several similar pictures but sadly I have no way of identifying which particular organisation had booked the trips depicted nor identify individual faces amongst those on board. Perhaps you will have a framed copy with the names underneath.

Once back home at my desk it was time to download the digital pictures I'd taken of David Pepperell's coin. Now largely magnified it was apparent that there was an extra letter 'P' in what I had deciphered as 'Reach Fen'. It now read 'Rech Pfen'. A short search on the internet confirms my fears. This was a Rechenpfenning token produced by Johann Jacob Lauer in Germany during the mid 1800s. It has the ship and five stars and crescent moon with the words 'Plus Ultra' ('Going Further').

But what was this doing at the Histon Football Club ground, how did it get there and where has it been in the previous 200 years?

Whenever Cambridge folk get reminiscing about days gone by there is one man who comes readily to their mind. He was not a Professor, not a Minister but a Minder. And in May 1960 he found himself in the news

His name was Jim Wooders, he lived in Staffordshire Street and he spent his days guarding bags at the Drummer Street bus station. This what a CDN reporter discovered about him in May 1960.

Jim had been looking after parcels, shopping bags and cycles for people shopping in Cambridge for well over 30 years. He was to be seen in all weathers with the possessions of varying numbers of customers. When the first started there'd been objections from the Town Council and the police but all that was a thing of the past and he had a board proclaiming 'By kind permission of Christ's College'.

With the formation of the Eastern Counties Omnibus Company in 1931, Mr Wooders had found himself facing opposition. In those days the bus company had a left luggage department which, unlike his, was indoors. But regular customers appreciated that there was no delay when they came to collect their belongings from Jim unlike the bus staff who might be busy organising tickets to fare destinations.

For the previous 12 years Mr Wooders had had an assistant and the two of them found themselves fairly well occupied, their busiest days being Fridays and Saturdays. Jim did not keep regular hours, but took the occasional Thursday off if he felt like it and always went home to Staffordshire Street for his meals. He enjoyed being his own master and had a profound contempt for all politicians which he demonstrated by refusing to vote.

By May 1960 Jim was 62 years-old and thinking of retiring 'in a few years' but meanwhile he loved his work. In warm weather his pitch was a very pleasant spot but it got a bit grim during the winter. However he never felt the cold and never wore scarves or gloves, saying he often felt colder indoors than ever he did in the open air. After spending a day looking after other people's possessions and talking to the passers-by, Mr Wooders went home 'to relax', his only spare-time interest being in reading newspapers

I wonder what he felt when he found himself featured in it!

Other people recalled by previous generations included 'Alfie' Lander a much-respected crossing sweeper at the junction of Sidgwick Avenue and Silver Street.

In her book 'Period Piece' Gwen Raverat recalled the lame crossing sweeper limping, all crooked, across the road with his broom. In those days in summer the thick white dust rose in clouds from horses' hooves, whitening the grass and trees while in the winter the oozy, jammy mud sloshed about and street cleaners like Alfie scraped it up in delicious soupy spoonfuls and threw it in their carts. The wife of a Trinity College Fellow would send him a covered plate of dinner every day and when she died remembered him in her will. According to Gwen one of the lady's maids married him and took care of him for the rest of his life.

Alfie died following an accident in December 1927 which prompted a correspondent to write to the News:

Sir – the death of Mr Alfred Lander has cast quite a gloom over the Sigwick Avenue – Silver Street bit of Cambridge. For many a year his familiar figure stood in all weathers under his big old tree, sheltered by the wall, generally accompanied by a robin or dog, his special friends. A casual passer-by might suppose he did nothing but stand there holding his broom, but he was a very useful man. To the best of his limited ability he was famous for going messages and taking care of this and that – and all this above and beyond his 'professional' work as a crossing-sweeper (the only unofficial one in the town). So afflicted, but such a simple, kindly and cheery soul; accident made him a cripple in his childhood, and life must have been a long struggle but of late things have been brighter again for him – A mourner"

Gwen Raverat also recalled another character who frightened her: "There was a most evil Blind man, with a beard, who sat in a little hole in the railings, which seemed to be specially made for beggars opposite the Bull Hotel in Trumpington Street. He always had a dog, but it was never the same dog for long". She included a sketch of him in 'Period Piece'.

This was probably George Randall who lived on Honey Hill and was recalled more charitably by others. He was a blind man who sold matches at the street corners, and he always had with him his faithful little dog, which guided him from place to place and kept a watchful eye to see that those who took his master's matches dropped a coin in the old man's tin mug. Randall thrived chiefly in Term time, when pitying undergraduates would give him helpful contributions. They would offer him as much as half a crown to go home out of the cold weather, but he always insisted on sticking to his post. But it was at best a very precarious livelihood. A newspaper report at his death in July 1910 noted that he was a very tall man whose coffin was made seven feet long – a description that matches Gwen's sketch.

Who do you recall as Cambridge characters.

Memories 3rd May 2010, by Mike Petty

Pottering around countryside to various venues I often find myself going over the same stretch of road time after time. Then a week or so later I'll be constantly setting off in another direction.

Within the last few weeks I've become particularly acquainted with the road towards Chatteris, stretches of which seem to be suffering more than most, especially in the vicinity of Mepal. In the past roads repairs were financed by the payment of a toll, though sometimes they were not quite what one might expect. Joan Robinson recalled one on the road from Somersham to Chatteris "I remember an uncle and aunt of mine used to go to Bedford quite often from Chatteris and they come to the Somersham Toll when it was 6d. It was 6d each way if you were not local and didn't live in Chatteris. The people that had the Toll, they were brother and sister Dyson, and he was very keen on his six pen'orth you know! He used to sit up and wait for uncle - the rogue – to go back in the evening, and uncle would deliberately stay as late as he could, you know, so he wouldn't have to pay anything, because half the time he used to leave the gate open. He was very keen and I remember one Sunday they came, and I went out to them and there on the running board (they had running boards, didn't they, for cars all those years ago), and there on the running board was the 6d and they must have passed it out of the window and Dyson missed it, and it had dropped on the running board - so he didn't get that one!" But this toll was not to repair a road: it was a payment to cross a bridge that was no longer there over a river than had dried up centuries before as the result of the drainage of the fens.

Charlie Short remembered the roads around Manea in his childhood: He knew every bump from his bike. "They were even worse than they are now and that takes some believing. The landlord of the Royal Oak in the High Street ran a taxi service in a horse-drawn carriage. There was another man who lived in Westfield Road who had a horse and cart and would take you to March. I remember one day by father went with him to fetch a clock back from the menders. The horse took fright over something and bolted and father put his foot in the newly-repaired clock! It eventually finished up in Cromwell School, Chatteris"

Charlie learned to drive a motor car when he was seventeen, it didn't take him long since he'd already been driving tractors for three years. He recalled various vehicles in the village including a big American car that pulled up at the village petrol pumps one day during the war. Charlie Setchfield served him, pumping the fuel with his hand-operated lever. But he hit problems with such a thirsty vehicle and said “You’ll have to turn your engine off ‘cos you’re gaining on me!” He also knew the registration number of the first car in Manea - EB3.

Early picture postcards will sometimes show ancient vehicles but Bill Hunt from Ely has lent me a cutting of something more unusual. It may not have been the first car to be seen in Wilburton, but surely it was the first to be built in the village. The article, from Autocar of 17th August 1907 was devoted to Mr E. Everitt, a cabinet-maker in Wilburton who’d build his own two-seater motor car.

The frame he made of ash, the wheels came from an old tandem bicycle while two wheels from a lawn mowing machine provided the differentia. It was driven by a belt taken from a thrashing machine using wooden pulleys from the same source. The petrol tank was an ordinary two-gallon tin and it was steered by a tiller.

The vehicle was all hand-made except for the carburettor and 3½ horse-power Browne engine which was air-cooled with the help of a wooden fan driven by a leather bootlace. This remarkable machine really worked: the Autocar reporter testified that he had seen it climb a hill with two people on board – and the Wilburton hills are something to be marvelled at!

Meanwhile an older form of transport is being celebrated at Audley End where the stables built to impress King James I and later repaired by Sir Christopher Wren are now being opened to the view of ordinary mortals for the first time. They are reckoned amongst the finest in the country and in their heyday accommodated more than 30 pampered horses in what looks more like a magnificent country house than stables. Now they are home to a multi-media exhibition highlighting the importance of the horse and telling the story of the coachmen and grooms who looked after them. Together with authentic saddles and tack it will enable visitors to get up close to the reality of daily life in a Victorian stable in all its mucky, smelly glory.

This is the latest in a series of renovations English Heritage has established at Audley End complete with costumed interpreters giving a sense of life below stairs in Victorian times: the maids and butlers busy plucking game, making pastry, churning butter or washing laundry as they chat to visitors who have left their own horseless carriages in the nearby car park.

As the football season approaches its climax teams everywhere are reviewing the past season. A lucky few will have extra matches to play to decide vital issues. But in May 1933 one Cambridgeshire team found itself splashed over the pages of the Daily Mail following their impressive battle with Barholm United of the Stamford & District League

Hildersham Rangers had not exactly enjoyed a successful season in Cambridgeshire League Division II. In fact they had not won a match. Their opponents were equally as bad, having conceded 152 goals.

The tussle between the two Never-Win Teams attracted great interest with a crowd of 5,000 people flocking to watch. Neither of the protagonist's home grounds could accommodate such numbers so a neutral venue was selected, the London Road ground at Peterborough. It was a reminder of the glory days when the old Peterborough and Fletton Football Club were at the height of their career.

Hildersham brought two charabanc loads of supporters, including the Rev W. Phillips whose son played at inside-left. Barholm could muster a crowd of 60 including their 'Fairy-Godmother', Mrs Hull.

The Cambridgeshire team in their smart royal blue jerseys were the first to appear on the pitch and received a great ovation. But it was eclipsed by the roar for Barholm in their black-and-white strip. The Mayoress of Peterborough, sporting her chain of office, kicked off. It was easily the best kick of the match, reported the 'Sunday Express'.

Hildersham started well and after ten minutes end-to-end play the Barholm goalie was doing what he did best, retrieving the ball from the back of his net. But this galvanised his team and by half-time Hildersham were 2-1 down. Following a pep-talk they equalised within four minutes of the restart when G. Whiffin slotted a cross just inside the post. Their jubilation was short-lived, within a minute they were behind again and moments later it was only the post that saved them. Now it was time for heroes and L.A. Day responded with a hat-trick. By the final whistle the score stood at 6-4 to Hildersham, though pundits reckoned it could have been 19-17.

After the match both teams were entertained to dinner at the Great Northern Hotel before the inevitable speeches. All agreed the match had been played in the best spirit: both had given their best with no scowls or dirty play. The referee paid the highest compliments to each side describing it as the best he had ever refereed – though he did somewhat spoil it by saying it was the first one he'd ever taken! He was Tom Webster, the Mail's famous cartoonist, who had officiated in a brown plus-four suit and whose analysis of the game was featured in the paper

Hildersham's skipper, H. Dawson, congratulated their opponents on their sporting spirit and was presented with the match football as a memento of the occasion. But of course it was Barholm who were the real victors: they returned home with the undisputed title of "Never-Wins"

Then in July 1954 the News attempted to explain another strange game, this one held at the Cambridge City Football Club ground. Real American softball had arrived in Cambridge when the US Air Force Hospital Wimpole Park beat a team from USAF Molesworth entirely against the formbook. But for British spectators the game was a succession of shocks. "They saw an umpire hustled and pushed by players disputing a decision, two players somersaulting as they tried to catch a ball and some magnificent hits and catches that made it look like cricket. The game seems to be a glorified rounders akin to baseball. There was 'strike one', 'ball one', 'blunt' and a host of other expressions which were difficult to explain but easy to follow on the diamond-shaped field before the victorious team had notched up their win and were cheered again and again"— nothing like the spirit of the Hildersham match

Another sport at which the winner loses is slow cycle racing. I have a picture of one race at a Pye Sports Day in the 1940s. Does anybody recognise a participant or do you have memories of such activity?

When the (mis)guided bus finally opens for business it is anticipated that hundreds will make the journey into Cambridge. My own feeling is that it will have exactly the opposite effect. For it will make the little town of St Ives much more accessible with its riverside walks to quaint nearby villages

It will not be the first time that people will have discovered its charms. In 1898 St Ives was described as "an ancient time-dimmed town and a drowsy old-fashioned town, delightfully unprogressive and little given to so-called modern improvement ... a place where the feverish rush of life seems stayed".

By then the commercial traffic on the river, once so busy, had virtually ceased and the towing path with its bridges, locks and fords was somewhat neglected, decayed and overgrown. It formed a perfect sketching ground for artists and soon groups of friends came for a week or two. Some stayed a summer and quite a number made the area their home.

Their paintings were exhibited in London galleries which spread word of the town's charm. Tourists were attracted to the area which soon developed into a riverside holiday venue, stimulating the growth of leisure boating and fishing. And such visitors increased the market for pictures, which in turn encouraged more artists to produce them.

Well over a hundred artists are known to have worked in the area around the turn of the century but by the 1930s almost all had gone, driven out by the harsh economic effects of the Depression and changing tastes in the art market.

Bridget Flanagan, who lives close to the river at Hemingford Abbots, formerly one of the centres of the artistic community, has been searching museums and galleries, libraries and archives and the walls of private houses to produce a wonderful illustrated guide to the artists who worked along the Ouse between 1880 and 1930.

One of these was Walter Dendy Sadler, a Royal Academician who bought a house in Hemingford Grey where he built an enormous studio from which he produced engravings from over 170 of his paintings which were hung in thousands of homes. Each day he went on a five-mile walk around the river to Houghton and St Ives, looking for models. Once he found a face he liked it was difficult to refuse him and unwary villagers were toggled up in period costume to be transformed into Regency squires, coachmen or parsons.

The rooms of Day's solicitors' offices in St Ives became the setting for a painting of a fashionable young man seeking a mortgage, Hartford church was used as the background for a christening scene while the Anchor Inn in his adopted village appeared in various guises.

Sadler's private life was unconventional. At 26 he had married an 18-year-old dark-haired beauty but within a year or two of moving to the village she commenced a dalliance with a local miller, causing a social scandal. The locals showed their severe disapproval by burning effigies of the adulterous couple outside the miller's house. Walter divorced his errant wife and turned his attention to other pursuits, initiating the Hemingford Cottage Garden Society with its annual flower show.

Bridget Flanagan has identified the scene of most of the pictures reproduced in colour in her book. But one is still puzzling. It was painted by George Gordon Fraser during a boat journey with friend from Bedford to King's Lynn in 1880, though a landscape he described as dreary and monotonous with clumsy and begrimed barges and ill-made, ill-fed, ill-bred and ill-clad agricultural labourers. The scene depicts a group cooking their supper on a fire outside a small wigwam, their boat moored nearby. In the background is a drainage mill and a wooden bridge. My own feeling is that it shows the scene at Wiggshall St Mary, but can you confirm it?

"Artists along the Ouse 1880-1930" by Bridget Flanagan is published by the author at 68 Common Lane, Hemingford Abbots PE28 9AW, price £10 - ISBN 0-9540824-3-5

Fifty years ago the News reflected on the passing of dream that had tantalised many a young lad

For the steam train was being replaced by new diesel locomotives and the aura of glamour and fascination that had surrounded the role of engine driver seemed destined to be lost.

But for the driver himself things had much improved, as one explained:

The rattling, hissing, gritty foot-plate - where in cold weather they were frozen on one side and baked on the other - had been exchanged for the enclosed windowed cabin of the new engines with its upholstered driver's seat and armrests, its foot warmers, compact controls and ashtray. It was like exchanging a job in an iron foundry for one in the control room of a modern factory.

Driver William Creek, who had worked with steam for 40 years and switched to diesels a couple of years earlier, said that he now slept better at night because of the change. It used to be rough riding on the steam engines where his insides were shaken up by the rattling. He could have sat down - on a wooden seat - but it was more comfortable standing up where he could take the jolting of the footplate on the balls of his feet. Moreover he used to have dials to watch which widely dispersed over the cab.

Speaking to fellow drivers William Thulborn, who had 41 years on steam and Driver Instructor Sidney Hutton who had helped to introduce the men at Cambridge to the new motive power, it became clear how fundamental the change had been.

One of the men said; "The diesel takes the art out of driving; there used to be a certain amount of pride in running a steam engine ... there is now something missing."

There was now no fireman, no one to talk to, no one to brew up the tea when you are sitting in your clean diesel cabin on a long run. You feel second to the machine, instead of the other way round. Some of the old personal skill you used to expend on driving steam has now been incorporated by the manufacturer in the controls and dials in front of you. You might change engines every day, he lamented

The fitters in the loco sheds had undergone an even more drastic change than the drivers. Instead of steam tubes, traction rods and dirty smoke boxes, they were now dealing with internal combustion cylinders and tappet springs. Already at Cambridge they were looking after 70 multiple railcar units and five diesel engines in German rail buses, though steam engines were still coming from other parts of East Anglia for daily servicing. The fitters had taken manufacturers' courses with Rolls Royce, English Electric, Spaxman of Colchester and with Wilson Gearboxes of Coventry, to fit them for their work on the new engines.

Gone were the days, for most of them, when they worked in the old black Victorian engine-shed behind the passenger station. Now they worked in modern factory conditions, in a warmed and strip-lighted hall near the Coldham's Lane bridge.

They stood in spacious pits with the carriage wheels at shoulder-height to work on perfectly-accessible jobs. Many of them had been fitters in the Armed Forces and gained more than a basic knowledge of their work that way.

They favoured the change: the work was not so physically hard. Until two or three years ago they were having to lift rods and big ends weighing a hundredweight or more out of the steam engines to work on them, or springs which weighed three hundredweight. The diesel parts were smaller, lighter and usually cleaner. The job needed more skills and this made it more interesting. The diesel engines which came in for servicing offered a greater variety of faults and they needed to think more for themselves.

But the interest in schoolboys in the business of railway yards was falling off. Diesel did not attract them. Smoother, quieter, without chimney, without the need for coaling and watering in full sight of delighted spectators, their registration numbers didn't seem worth collecting any more.

But the adult public, like the fitters and drivers, seemed please with the change.

Memories 31st May 2010, by Mike Petty

Toft Peoples' Hall was packed last Saturday for the annual meeting of the Cambridgeshire Association for Local History. Before the boring business session it was my pleasure as President to present the Association's awards to young people, authors and historians who have dedicated themselves to sharing their enthusiasm for the heritage of our county.

Amongst the latter was Anthony Day the fenland artist and Wicken historian, Mike Rouse of Ely, John Shepperson from Swavesey and a 94-year old who had driven down from Norfolk to collect a simple piece of paper in a frame, even though he already has a house full of certificates – including 34 world records!

I knew that if I permitted Ken Wallis to get into his stride then the timetable for the day would have gone to pieces. For once he gets talking he will hold a room spellbound until the caretaker comes to lock up, hours later. So instead I asked whether he would present the Young People's Awards to schools from Cambourne, Waterbeach and the Cambridge International School based at Cherry Hinton Hall. As I told the youngsters, they might never have heard of him, but their parents and grandparents would know that he was the man who had stood-in for 'James Bond' during the dangerous flying sequences in 'Little Nellie' the autogyro in 'You Only Live Twice'

Yet as he did so I noticed that the back of his head was streaming with blood from a serious gash. Had history repeated itself, I wondered.

For it was just a 100 years ago that Ken's father and his brother built themselves a flying machine in the back garden of a house in St Barnabas Road, Cambridge. Construction complete they had taken it to a field near Abington for test runs and its first flight. It hit a bump, rose into the air, then crashed heavily leaving its pilot feeling lucky to have escaped alive. Just weeks later another aviation pioneer, Charles Rolls, was killed in an accident, emphasising the danger of such mad-cap enterprise and the 'Wallbro' project was reluctantly abandoned.

Years later Ken Wallis decided to construct a replica of his dad's plane. There had been no blueprints for him to follow, just a few photographs taken by his mother and a tatty cutting from the Cambridge Daily News which described the machine in great detail. In August 1978 it soared off the ground like a bird. But then, Ken adds, he had the advantage of knowing how to fly. Indeed, he had landed at RAF Waterbeach during the Second World War, as he told Oliver Megginson, curator of the base museum who accepted an award on behalf of Waterbeach School for their research into the village. And, he reminded John Hamlin, whose book on Oakington Airfield received another certificate, he had established two of his world records flying his remarkable autogyro from that base.

Ken still flies his little machines from the field at his home, zooming into the air like some antiquated Harry Potter then taking his hands and feet off the controls and photographing the people on the ground who are in turn photographing him. Occasionally things go wrong, as one internet website reveals.

Could that have been the cause of the deep gash which prompted Peter Filby, one of the CALH committee, to ask him if he'd like treatment? No, Ken replied, nonchalantly: that morning he'd been standing on a chair at home putting something on a shelf when he fell backwards hitting his head against a wall. It was, he later told me, a long way down!

If I'd done something like that, I would have phoned for a paramedic and expected the visit of an air ambulance. But Ken just stuck a piece of paper over the wound and got into his car to drive to Toft. What a man! He must be the overriding memory of that day, eclipsing even the excellent talk by Anne Mitchell, the magnificent refreshments supplied by village ladies and the business session which concluded a truly memorable event.

See the Association's website – www.calh.org.uk - for a full account of the awards and contact them if you would to nominate a possible recipient in next year's ceremony

The 'Matches, Hatches and Despatches' column of any local newspaper is one carefully scanned by very many people looking for names of friends or acquaintances who may have passed away

Some members of the community are accorded obituaries within the body of the paper and so it was on 4th June 1910 when the Cambridge Weekly News reported:

One of the most profoundly respected and widely-known characters in Bottisham and district passed away at the ripe old age of 66-odd years. Though carefully tended by a whole host of friends, not a single relative of the deceased was present when death took place shortly after 8.30 in the morning

Few Bottisham inhabitants have secured by sheer force of personality such an abiding reputation for imperiousness combined with a haughty good temper. For the past 30 years she had held undisputed sway, subject to occasional supervision by the Misses King in the Bottisham post office.

Anyone who entered during the past 30 years was immediately made aware that it is not the essence of politeness to put one elbow on the counter and lounge as though in a public bar. Through years of practice she'd learned to correct such bad tendencies by neatly biting a piece out of the offending coat and then scurrying off. It was rather summary treatment of course but she came from Australia and no doubt in her blood there always ran a strong strain of the bluntness of the hardly Colonial. It was also always rather unwise to leave letters on the counter as on more than one occasion she unofficially opened them, censored the contents and tore the paper to shreds.

But all was not quite what it seemed, for 'Pretty Poll' was a white and lemon crested cockatoo, the pet of the pet of the village post office, the autocrat of the counter and the terror of several generations of Bottisham children. Though owning a cage and the usual luxuries accorded to a tropical bird, Poll always preferred the counter as a promenade

Thirty years earlier Poll had been sentenced to death by its owner, a London lady, who probably found her pretty ways rather too expensive to be satisfactory. It was here that the kindly hand of fate intervened. The lady took the bird to a London chemist, Mr George King, who in his early youth lived in Bottisham. Poll immediately caught his eye. Exactly what passed between the two in that look is not known. It was silently agreed however, that the fates should be outwitted.

Mr King sympathised with the lady in her desire to compass the death of the white and lemon crested cockatoo. But he also mentioned that he thought he could find 'a happy home' as he phrased it for Poll. Eventually the lady agreed and Pretty Poll journeyed to the Bottisham Post Office to commence a further span of 30 years. Since that day all Bottisham had learned to know, love and respect Pretty Poll.

One great friend the bird had was a cat, which used to be on such familiar terms that she was frequently permitted to have the run of the bird's cage. Poll was an inveterate gossip and when the long afternoons in the post office became too dull she used to whistle the dog and call the cat with such human skill that caused it sometimes to positively cackle with laughter at the dog snuffing round for the owner of the whistle.

One shocking trick she once played the village parson was practically the only black spot on a blameless life at Bottisham. The incident occurred one Sunday afternoon when the clergyman called on the way to church. Poll, probably thinking that the visit had lasted long enough, caught up the parson's hat. The parson made a wild dash to make the bird drop it and Poll, taking offence, bit him on the lip. The wound was not very serious but he delivered his discourse that afternoon with a thick lip more in keeping with the features of a prize-fighter than a clergyman of the Church of England.

As soon as the death of the famous bird became known at Bottisham in June 1910, an informal lying-in-state was held which was attended by at least fifty children, curious to see at close quarters the governing manager of the shop who had always inspired them with much awe.

But it was not the end for Poll. She was taken to Mr Farren of Regent Street, Cambridge and expertly stuffed. Is the dead parrot still dominating some living room from her glass case, I wonder

My files also reveal parrot stories from Fen Drayton where 'Scruffy' used to be an attraction at The Three Tuns in the 1970 and a court case from St Ives in 1839 when Mary Huggins, a servant girl was accused of throwing Mr Hillyard's parrot into the pond.

One great Cambridge character was Miss Emma Louise Heffer who was regularly seen out shopping in the 1960s with Joey her parrot, perched on the handle of her basket. He also accompanied her to church and subsequently to retirement in the Evelyn Nursing Home where they both did a daily round of patients on the ground floor and inspected babies born in the Home's Maternity Unit. Miss Heffer died in the Evelyn in her 100th year early in 1974 while enjoying her favourite food – ice cream. Joey found a new home in the Cherry Hinton area.

As the modern road network groans under increasingly heavy traffic pressures it is interesting to reflect on a major period of road and especially bridge construction. I have received an email about the 'Military Bridge' across the Cam on the road between Stretham and Wicken. It had been built in part, the sender believed, by Prisoners of War. So was it indeed a local 'Bridge over the River Kwai'. Well not quite.

During the early days of the Great War there were fears that the Germans would invade and land on the East coast. It would be essential to send men and machines from the Midlands to push them back into the sea. The problem was that there were few road roads running from the Midlands to the coast. So in the early months of the war soldiers arrived to build a 'Military Road' from Stretham through to Wicken from which there was already a road towards Soham and beyond. Part of the new road was constructed on a reinforced concrete raft, one of the earliest examples of such roadwork in the country. Its strength was tested in 1919 when a large section of the road was flooded following a burst in a river bank, but no damage was done.

As work progressed so folk in Wicken became excited. For the new route would bring military horse-drawn traffic and horses would need somewhere to rest and refuel. One of the attractions of Wicken are the large areas of open grass in the centre of the village and whilst horses chomped the grass their riders would patronise the local hostelries, thus benefiting the village economy. Sadly cavalry never actually came that, and had they done so they could have fed their horses on the grass that grew through the new road.

For although the military built the road they did not build the bridges needed to span the rivers Old West and Cam. For there was a dispute as to who should actually pay for them and although a pontoon bridge was put in place over the Old West it would be April 1928 before the actual bridges were actually constructed and the Cam finally spanned by an impressive central bow-string girder bridge of 100 foot span.

Nearby on the A10 Cambridge road another new concrete bridge was constructed at Stretham Ferry this time to cope with increasing traffic along the A10. Here its strength was tested by placing four traction engines on it. Then in March 1931 three steam lorries, two with trailers, representing a weight of sixty tons were used to test the strength of yet another new bridge over the Old West River, this one between Wilburton and Cottenham. It was an essential part of a new Twentypence Road intended to offer traffic an alternative route to Cambridge and several motor coach companies applied to run services.

Nor was this by any means the limit of bridge building. At Mepal the last of the wooden bridges erected at the time of the drainage of the fens in the 1600s was replaced as part of a project which saw two new concrete bridges spanning the Bedford Rivers.

At nearby Sutton Gault the main beams of the bridge were also found to be inadequate for loads exceeding three tons whilst at Queen Adelaide a bridge weighing 135 tons was lifted bodily to a different position across the River Ouse in July 1930. There large piles were driven into the river and four hydraulic jacks raised the old bridge and moved it to out of the way. It was replaced with a new concrete bridge able to cope with the increasingly heavy traffic to the new Sugar Beet Factory.

There was great discussion at Clayhithe where a narrow toll bridge was replaced with a wider, free structure in 1939. But the greatest controversy was experienced in Cambridge itself where a new Fen Causeway was planned to cross the open spaces of Coe Fen. Despite great opposition the project went ahead and another essential, but largely-overlooked bridge was constructed.

But none of this answers the question as to whether any of the labour used in the construction of these bridges was that of Prisoners of War. Do you know?

The recent warm weather has brought people out to celebrate the sunshine on Cambridge's commons. But it has also encouraged some to light barbeques and so damage the grass, every blade of which is precious to others.

But it is the college gardeners who have traditionally worked long and hard to ensure their lawns remain pristine even in the worst of weathers. So I thought I would reflect on the events of June 1910 – 100 years ago.

The end-of-year bumping races had been fought and won and it was now time to celebrate or commiserate. There were wild scenes in many of the colleges where bump suppers were held and bumps celebrated. It was customary for the authorities to grant permission for bonfires to be held in the college courts. So on the Saturday night fires were lighted and the frequent discharge of fireworks kept the fun going until the early hours of Sunday morning.

Jesus, who retained their position as head of the river, held a magnificent bonfire on the Close. Outside the railings in Victoria Avenue a large crowd, attracted by an enormous pile of old boxes dumped near the tennis courts, assembled in anticipation of some fun. It was however about nine o'clock before revellers arrived on the scene and set the pile ablaze by firing Roman candles into the heart of the inflammable mass.

Before this a splendid, if slightly private, display of fireworks had taken place in the college's New Court. Those outside on Midsummer Common were occasionally startled by the roar of a golden blade of rocket sparks cutting its way heavenward through the gathering dusk or caught glimpses of the ruddy glare of 'red fire' lighting up the courts and heard explosions of varying degrees of intensity from the bang of a good-sized squib to the diminutive snapping of the Chinese cracker.

Afterwards the display was a public one. By and by, when the flames were dying out, the crowd dispersed homewards on in search of similar amusement. This was found at the Sidney Street end of Jesus Lane where the Sidney men were celebrating the unusual experience of three bumps. It was here that damage was done: some of the flower beds were trampled and laid waste, every pane of a glass-covered passage which ran along the high wall bounding Sidney Street had been smashed. But there was still several college windows without a crack on them and the huge old oak gate still swung ponderously on its hinges, giving the lie to rumours that 'everything inflammable was consumed'. But there was no doubt something had happened: in the centre of one court there was a large patch of burnt grass where a bonfire had blazed.

Meanwhile at Emmanuel College a bonfire was lighted on the lawn in the front court of the college and the dons – perhaps more enthusiastic gardeners than at the other colleges – decided that something must be done. Ten undergraduates, including a popular member of the college who was also a double blue, were informed that their presence in Cambridge was no longer required. They were to be rusticated for a week and only allowed back to take their degrees in the Senate House.

This resulted in a 'mock funeral', one of the biggest for many years. At a quarter-past six a string of about 20 hansom cabs drew up at the college gate and were promptly besieged by weirdly-garbed undergraduates, some in gowns, some in flannels and all in extraordinary good spirits. Many of the 'mourners' were in evening dress and sporting opera hats or old silk hats swathed with crape. One had a Teddy Bear on his head, another wore a big fluffy black beard.

Then to the cheers of the assembled crowd the 'corpses' emerged and clambered on to the roofs of the waiting vehicles. The procession moved off towards the railway station headed by four undergraduates bearing a broom draped with crape and followed by a dozen mounted mourners carrying placards bearing the words 'RIP'. Two members of the University Officer Training Corps were there in full uniform carrying their rifles reversed in the proper military attitude of woe while an officiating 'clergyman' wearing a voluminous white surplice gave a semblance of dignity to the procession.

The majority of the mourners were armed with some sort of musical instrument upon which a wailing dirge was produced – something similar perhaps to the sounds emanating from South African football stadiums today

Soon several taxis and a motor bus or two found themselves caught up in the cortege together with a hoard of cyclists and a crowd of small boys.

On arrival at the station there was just time for photographs and speeches before the sudden arrival of the London train brought an end to the proceedings. While the 'corpses' made the journey home – only to return in a few days – the 'mourners' returned to Emmanuel College to inspect the singed grass which had resulted in the premature finale to their friends' academic careers.

When Charles Moseley first wrote of the place that he'd moved to in the 1960s he tried to disguise it

After all he had gone from the architecturally beautiful city of Cambridge to what everyone acknowledged was by no means a picture-postcard village. There was no medieval church, no picturesque pub, no duck pond. The approach was past concrete-slab council houses set bare and treeless on the top of a hill and were followed by a mixed collection of small, mainly brick houses, sever of them tumble-down. Any once-thatched cottages had been re-roofed in tarred corrugated iron

But these were in better condition than the one he had mortgaged himself to buy. True it has roses round the door, as the estate agent had promised, but that meant the door could not be opened – and anyway the previous owner had nailed a collection of old nylon stockings around it in an attempt to stem the draughts.

It had two rooms up, two rooms down, a lean-to coal shed converted into a small kitchen and a bathroom. At the bottom of the garden stood an old corrugated-iron privy rattled by the winds that swept in from the surrounding fenland. At least it had a septic tank – he would not have to spread the contents between the rows of vegetables in the back garden like his neighbours. Only, he was to learn, the tank had not been constructed properly and he had to spend several unpleasant hours digging a trench by the light of a Tilley lamp on top of which the rain spat – a trench that filled with half-fermented sewage as he did so.

Charles had swapped Cambridge for community suspicious of strangers. One was George who offered him an apple as a token of welcome. He recalls: George was the dirtiest man I have ever known. His flat cap, a uniform mud colour, often made our hearts sink when it appeared round the gate. His clothes were never changed: jacket, waistcoat, flannel shirt open to the neck to reveal thick woollen vest. His toilet facilities were negligible, once his neighbour saw him peeing outside the back door and commented ‘It was the cleanest thing about him’.

One kept upwind of George, idly counting the fly-specks on his glasses while he told stories that went on and on about people that nobody knew anything about in an accent that was so thick as to be literally incomprehensible to an outsider, especially when uttered with a roll-up cigarette perpetually in the corner of his mouth.

There was one big event. It was the village fair which the Mayor of Cambridge visited in his motor car to open, distribute some coins to the assembled crowds and join in the fun before heading back to the real world telling tales of the quaint little village where flies buzzed around the horses paraded for sale.

Charles grew to love his new community and its tales of feuds and folklore. When the time came for him to move away he was no longer a stranger, indeed such had been the change in that village that people now pointed to him as one of its elders. Soon after he had moved in others had followed, driving the motor cars which made the village much more accessible than ever before. Houses sprang up on the gardens that had once provided food for those whose families had lived there for generations while old tumbled-down cottages became weekend retreats for Londoners. The place was now much tidier, with a Community Association and a village magazine but few residents now had any connection with the rich black soil that surrounded them. It was time, Charles felt, to write up his memoirs of a fen, full of folk and move on.

But he didn’t. He stayed on in the house he had made his home, in the village he had come to know and love. And when the time came to reissue his elegy for a changing community he felt it was time for him to finally, formally to reveal its name.

“Out of Reach: an elegy for a Cambridgeshire village” by Charles Moseley has been reissued by G.David at £8.99 – ISBN 9781906288389

As the end of term nears so many children and teachers prepare to move on to other schools. But some schools themselves prepare to close. One such was the Kimway School in Millington Road which was run by twin sisters, the Misses Mary and Elizabeth Macleod. In June 1960 they announced their intention of retiring Kimway was linked to the first Cambridge 'school for gentlefolk', Llandaff School, which had been run by the Johnson family in Llandaff Chambers, Regent Street, one of the busiest of thoroughfares. Then a Miss Johnson became Mrs Berry and took the school to quiet, leafy Millington Road in Newnham where the major part of the premises was erected in 1907, shortly after the first houses had been built. Her successor, Miss M.A.Tilley, added a brick extension to the wooden building in 1927.

The Macleod sisters had started teaching in 1923 when Cambridge Children's' Classes were held in St Columba's Hall, Downing Street. From 1939 they moved to accommodation made available by parents before moving in 1941 to Millington Road where they inherited seven of Miss Tilley's pupils.

It was an area of Cambridge the ladies knew well. In May 1916 they had watched Sylvia Pankhurst give a violent 'Stop the War' speech to a crowd on Queen's Road. She had been heckled by a wounded Scotsman from the nearby Military Hospital before closing the meeting to much applause. Mary Macleod had played her part during the conflict in the Land Army sleeping in a tent with another six women, five being 'sweet girl undergraduate hefty types'. It had not been a pleasant experience: "with 150 girls to each of four mess tents and only one dish to serve from, sometimes the first get served scrub for seconds before the others have had any ... undisciplined girls refuse to obey orders", she wrote to sister Betty.

Perhaps her experiences influenced the school. At work or play the children were taught to be independent and accept responsibility; they also had to clean classrooms. When school meals started in 1948 the children helped with the washing up. But apart from the yellow shirts and green shorts or knickers worn for games, the school had no uniform as the sisters 'liked the children to be individual'.

Over 20 years more than 620 youngsters had passed through the school. At times 53 youngsters had somehow crowded into the three classrooms and the Assembly Hall which could become two addition rooms when needed. When things were busy the sisters needed help and assistants came from all over the British Isle as well as Australia, America and South Africa. Some stayed for only brief periods which was unsettling for staff and children alike. At one time the school was 'just like a matrimonial agency': the staff no soon settled down than they left to be married, mostly to curates called John

One part of their education the pupils enjoyed to the full was using gymnastic equipment that had been bought with money raised by staff and pupils. Before the war they had been allowed to play cricket on the University Rugger Ground and at other times they used Newnham recreation ground

Things changed with the implementation of the 1948 Education Act which saw parents take their children away to spend two years in elementary school in order to qualify for free places at grammar schools later. The number of children from university families dwindled and most of the youngsters now came from outside Cambridge.

By 1960 there were just 18 pupils under their care. Their ages ranged from three to 11 years, though the sisters felt that three years old was rather too young to benefit from education. Pupils remained to take their 11-plus and try for scholarships or for places at the Perse.

Now all that was coming to an end. The wooden parts of the school had rotted away, the cost of heating, repairs and general maintenance had become increasingly expensive and King's College, to whom the buildings belonged, wanted to clear the site.

The Misses Macleod had no firm plans for their retirement: there would be more time for golf and reading – not detective stories or modern novels – though the additional domestic work they would have to undertake was not one they viewed with any enthusiasm. One problem to be solved was that of the Brownie pack which met at the school and would now be homeless. It had been Cambridge's first pack, started in January 1917 and was to continue from a hut in Elizabeth's garden until 1976

But it was not to be the end of education on the site. In 1963 the present Millington Road Nursery School was founded to meet the needs of the University, its visitors from overseas and the local community. In April 1988 there were over 40 youngsters many of whom were foreign children and it continues to attract children from all over the world.

Various of the Kimway's school records are preserved in King's College archives but do you have memories of the school or its sisters?

Last week historians gathered at Cambridge Central Library to launch yet another book on Cambridge during the Second World War.

Why? Surely there are enough books on that particular topic already! There are accounts of the airfields, the Home Guard, the bombing raids, evacuees and Americans along with memories of those who fought against the Germans, the Italians and the Japanese.

Jack Overhill was a fighter: he fought for pacifism. He did not believe in the war or the politicians who waged it.

He fought to earn money by mending shoes in a small shop on Castle Hill, yet turned down work mending army boots as this conflicted with his pacifist principles.

Jack fought to bring up his family in a house off Lensfield Road that the council wanted to demolish as unfit for habitation. But at the same time he was renting out his other home on Shelford Road at Trumpington

He fought to put food on the table when times were financially hard, yet at the same time spent money on buying an Italian dictionary so he could revise for London University examinations he'd taken and failed time after time before.

Jack spent hour after hour after hour writing book after book about life in back-street Cambridge only to have them rejected time after time after time.

Added to all this he kept a diary, carefully jotting down things he saw and heard: "I saw two married women, whose husbands are in the army, walking along with two American soldiers. They were waisting one another, the heads of the women pillowing on the men's chests and were obviously heading for a secluded spot". Later the women and a mother-in-law parked themselves outside Jack's Saxon Street window to exchange confidences "all to do with their virtuous repulsion of the men they go out with. To get more detail I got up and came down to take a verbatim shorthand report of their talk, but unfortunately I couldn't hear them so plainly downstairs as upstairs..."

What Jack did hear plainly from his upstairs window was the sound of planes overhead and the crash of explosions. "Just then there were flashes in the sky and a whistle and I darted into the house knowing it was a falling bomb. Instinctively I wanted to avoid flying shrapnel, but there was the likelihood of the house collapsing to be considered. In the kitchen I crouched slightly with hunched shoulders as if I were about to take the whole weight of the house on them. I told the children to get under the table, shouting out... There was a terrific explosion and I hurried along the passage to see Jim [the dog] go under the table first, followed by Jack and Jess with Jock [the other dog] bringing up the rear, only partly able to get under, his tail and rump sticking out. ... we had to laugh, serious as it was. We went to the shelter till just after 10.00 when the 'All Clear' sounded and then came home to bed... There was another warning at midnight and up we got and went to the shelter again, this time till 4 o'clock ... [but] Big Jess (his wife) wouldn't come because of a woman down there who bosses about a bit. I shall stay with her in future if she doesn't go ..."

Night after night after night the sirens sounded, interrupting their sleep. Yet time after time the they were awoken without warning – it was amazing how loud bombs dropped at Linton or Oakington could be heard in Cambridge at night.

It was not just German bombs that caused damage: "When I arrived at Lensfield Road corner there was a big crowd. A Hurricane had crashed in an alley between two houses, knocking down part of a wall as it fell in a garden. It had got into a spin, partly straightening out over Sheep's Green (so Ted Clee the custodian at the Sheds told me) and crashed. The ammunition exploded ... As I type I can see part of the wrecked plane on a lorry. A soldier guarding it keeps shooing children souvenir-hunting away ... the distance it crashed is barely 50 yards away from the house"

Jack noted details others missed: "Billy Webb, a man of about 50, was threatened the other night by a Local Defence Volunteer with a rifle because he heard him say 'When are they going to stop all this', referring to the tank trap built on the bridge ... I saw two member of the Cambridge University Officer's Training Corps come out of the Pickerel Inn the other Saturday night, one of them letting off his revolver". Jack spotted the tanks and lorries hidden under the trees along Queen's Road, noted the army manoeuvres and heard of the signaller who complained of 36 trucks full of debris from bombed sites in London that stood near his signalbox: "They stank so much containing bits of human bodies. The debris was finally tipped into a refuse pit at Chesterton"

Jack kept his diary carefully, and carefully kept his diary. He took it with him each time he stumbled out of bed to the air raid shelter. He compiled it 1932 until just before his death in 1989. It is preserved in the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library alongside his few so-far published novels.

Jack Overhill had no doubt of their importance: they were books for scholars of the future. Now this has been appreciated. Peter Searby, formerly history lecturer in the University of Cambridge, has edited the volumes for the years 1939-1945.

It is not just another book on Cambridge at war. It is a unique record of a community with all its failings and frailties during a time of hardship and stress.

Cambridge at war: the diary of Jack Overhill 1939-1945, edited by Peter Searby, has been published by the Cambridgeshire Records Society and sells for £18 from Cambridgeshire Archives and Local Studies Office, Shire Hall, Castle Hill, Cambridge CB3 0AP. ISBN 978-0-904323-21-4

Memories 19th July 2010, by Mike Petty

An old name is soon to be revived on Chesterton Road when an interesting building starts a new stage in its career, this time as a public house

The “Tivoli”, was Cambridge’s sixth cinema when it opened in March 1925. A News reporter who was given a preview came away very much impressed with the attractiveness of the interior. It had comfort, excellent lighting and excellent decoration. Over 600 people could be seated in the body of the hall and gallery but if you wanted a private box for six people you might have one for the sum of 15s (75p), he informed readers.

On the first night it was hailed as “Chesterton’s super cinema” and had every justification for expressing itself in superlatives. With its courteous staff of brown-uniformed attendants it was elaborate, cosy, artistically lighted and efficiently ventilated. It also boasted an excellent orchestra and a screen sufficiently large to do justice to the most elaborate film productions, Sadly the evening was marred by one small technicality: the projection was not quite perfect, but this could soon be remedied

Not all the films it showed were professionally-made. In June 1927 the Tivoli gave a screening to “Grit” an undergraduate film directed by Mr Dennis Arundell and filmed on a little Cine-Kodak camera. It was believed to be the first serious attempt in an English University to obtain experience in the technique of film production and was one of the first amateur films to be exhibited in the country. It was a tale of how the stroke of a college crew was kidnapped so his boat might not go head of the river and featured some good views of Cambridge streets and colleges. More authentic rowing footage of the Oxford and Cambridge boat race was rushed to Cambridge to be shown on the evening of the 1930 event

That year a new sound installation manufactured by British Acoustic was installed when the first film featured Maurice Chevalier in ‘Innocents in Paris’ supported by the comedy ‘Talkie’

But not all films were appreciated. In November 1933 a recruiting film ‘Our Fighting Navy’ was withdrawn following lively scenes. Fifty undergraduate anti-war students, including Alan Turing of King’s College (later mastermind code-breaker at Bletchley Park), organised a protest against what they saw as blatant militarist propaganda. But a rival party, numbering about a thousand undergraduates, marched to the Tivoli with two bands playing war-time songs and carrying Union Jacks. Several tried to push their way in, a stink bomb was let off in the vestibule and cries of 'Down with Hitler' and 'Heil Hitler' were heard above the general uproar until four policemen with drawn truncheons, managed to restore order

The cinema itself featured in one of the Cambridge Accident Prevention Council's road-safety films. 'Horse Sense' made in 1952 featured the adventures of a horse called Patch that escapes from its stable and wanders about the streets of Cambridge passing the Tivoli where children are waiting for admission.

Film star Diana Dors made a personal appearance but even she could not save the cinema. In November 1956 the Tivoli closed, with Associated British Cinemas claiming the heavy burden of entertainment tax had made it uneconomic. It was one of 180 cinemas forced to close that year, including the Playhouse on Mill Road.

The Tivoli was just one of Cambridge's cinemas, along with the Kinema, Central, Regal and Rex. The biggest was the Victoria that opened on the corner of Market Hill in 1931. In November 1952 it was one of the first to show three-dimensional films when cinema-goers wearing tinted spectacles saw fish swimming above their heads in the middle of the auditorium and ducked as a cricket ball bounced right out of the special screen that had been installed for the event. Up-to-date projection equipment was installed in 1967 with a second screen in 1972.

By then it was the largest cinema in Cambridge attracting an average audience of about 600 people paying £2.10 for their seats. But things were changing: 1982 marked the end of the children's matinee performances which had started in 1946 and once attracted two or three hundred kids. 1983 almost saw the end of the Victoria itself when fire destroyed the screen and part of the stage. It reopened as one of the best-equipped cinemas in the country with six-track stereo, a new screen and the new 70mm projector that was seen at full benefit in films like 'Ghandi' and 'The Star Wars' trilogy. It closed in 1988

But do you remember the Victoria cinema having a café?

In October 1931 'Varsity' reported that the new building incorporated a large bar and lounge, a commodious foyer and hall planned as a restaurant, not yet completed, that was probably to be converted into a dance hall.

My notes say this became the Victoria ballroom in April 1962 but can you tell me more?

Ely is a city that has changed dramatically in recent years. New estates of houses have spread from the western bypass to the Prickwillow Road. The riverside where the mixed aromas from the brewery and sugar-beer factory once merged with the damp pong from the Ouse and was home to warehouses and scrapyards has been transformed with a park and yet more new homes.

Many of the present citizens have no recollection of the days when a Victorian Corn Exchange and public room dominated the market place. They disappeared in 1962 to be replaced with a development of lease-hold shops designed by Suburban Counties Properties of London who promised it would bring a 'new look'. It certainly did. The development attracted comment, little of it positive and some units remained unlet for two years causing concern to traders who felt it did not encourage new business or enhance the city centre.

At that time a new Post Office and a supermarket were being built just across the road. Both are now but memories but there is another new shopping development on the site of the old Cattle Market.

One lady who knows about Ely history is Pam Blakeman who has compiled a colourful record of the changes combining old and new photographs, some taken from the same viewpoint. Often it is hard to spot any differences, at others it is hard to believe it's the same place

Meanwhile another lady has been typing up newspaper reports covering the period when it was the Corn Exchange and cattle market that was seen as the future. The monumental task of copying the stories from the files of the Cambridge Chronicle was undertaken by Muriel Wallace in the 1980s and folder after folder of her handwritten notes are preserved in the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library. Now the period between 1820 and 1849 has been typed and indexed by Barbara Slade to reveal the fascinating life and times, aspirations and failures of the city. She has now produced seven volumes and continues her project hoping that shortly all of Muriel's notes up to 1860 can be made available to family historians and researchers. One story from June 1849 seems pertinent today with the threat of cutbacks to council services. Then there was a dispute about spending money on street cleaning which resulted in the sacking of all the scavengers and street-sweepers leading to Ely becoming choked with dust and filth. However rather than resolving the dispute locally one of the protagonists threatened to start legal proceedings. However badly the parish money had been spent, it is hoped little would be squandered away in settling the differences, the paper commented.

Two readers are seeking help with identifying old bandsmen

Bernard Openshaw was helping to clear a house in South Croydon when he discovered an old photograph album too interesting too dump. Now, more than 30 years on, he too is looking to reduce his clutter and the album has surfaced once more. It contains a number of studio portraits the majority of which come from Cambridge. One shows a military bandman and was taken in the studio of Herbert Mason while another from the same studio has the name 'Larkin'. Bernard would like to restore these photographs to the original family. If anybody has any clues then please email bandmivopenshaw@btinternet.com or contact me and I'll put you in touch.

Gillian Figures is on a similar quest. She has also been trying to learn details about several unnamed family photographs, probably all from Cambridge photographers. They are of young men believed to be from the Isaacson family who came from the Swaffham Bulbeck, Swaffham Prior area. The most intriguing photo is of a man and boy in some kind of uniform with deep pillbox hats with a pom pom on top and a sort of crescent shape on the front. The boy is holding a flute while the man has three chevron stripes on his right sleeve. She wonders if it's of a drum and fife band but there is no other instrument shown except the flute.

There were a number of possible bands including the St Andrew the Less Temperance Society Youth Band, Holy Trinity Drum & Fife band and the Albert Institute. Does anybody have pictures showing a similar uniform or have you other suggestions. Email gillian.figures@me.com or drop me a line

And can you help Yvonne Stepney who is seeking any descendants of the Kitson family who lived at 13 Gothic Street. There was a Lily, Dorothy, Elsie and William but all her searches end in 1939. Once more you can email www.yvonne.stepnet@virgin.net or let me know.

Memories 2nd August 2010 by Mike Petty

A recent Memories article has prompted Ann Waldock of Fulbourn to send me a copy of her late husband's account of his life as a cinema projectionist.

Albert's fascination with film began in the 1930s when he found a toy projector, a spring-wound thing with a battery-powered light. It was encouraged by his grandparents who lived in Royston and took him to pensioners' free nights at the town's cinema.

Albert recalled: "I can remember the old cinema which was opposite the police station back in the silent days. I went there a few times before it burnt down. One thing that fascinated me was how they pulled out the old tree stumps with traction engines (steam being another of my interests). While the new Priory was being built the town still had a temporary cinema at the British Legion Hall opposite the old Gas Works. At that time there was a First-World-War field gun each side of the entrance"

Leaving school at the age of 14 he got a job as maintenance boy at Fulbourn Hospital where he helped at the weekly film show for patients. Then he saw an advertisement for a rewind boy at the Regal in Cambridge at the princely wage of twenty-five shilling a week. From there Albert soon moved to the Central Cinema in Hobson Street in 1941 where he boosted his income by fire-watching, scrambling up on to the roof when the sirens sounded. He was too well aware of the danger of fire, the Central itself having been re built in 1940 following a fire the previous year

He became friendly with many of the men and women who worked at the Central. Bill Pearl, the cinema doorman/boilerman only had one arm but could rake out the ashes better than many a man with two. When he de-clinkered the boiler at about nine o'clock Bill would pull the ash forward and pop in half-a-dozen good spuds which provided a well-cooked supper when the crowds left.

At other times Albert and his colleagues ate at Miss Pearson's Tea Rooms above Morley's Pawn Shop just across the road. He went there for breakfast, dinner and tea and found the food excellent. Amongst the other diners was Alf Dellar, a short tubby little old chap with bright shiny boots that suggested he'd been in the army. His prime job was as handbill deliverer but his main love was horseracing. Then there was an Italian operatic singer tutor who lived above the café - on summer days when the windows were open the din was catastrophic and Miss Pearson would slam the doors a few times in her temper.

Amongst the other Central characters at this time was Phyllis Barnes the second projectionist - a lovely gal, large and cuddly - and Miss Cathy Hyde, the manageress whose RAF Corporal husband came home for weekends to help her do the paperwork. Then there was old John Jee who had a publicity den in the circle void with thousands of film star photographs and posters.

One regular visitor was as a chap called John Foster who was always able to find a customer for any oddments somebody wanted to sell. Albert found a number of such items when checking the seats after performances. There were quite a few coins, chewing gum, gloves, scarves, buttons and something he describes as 'gentlemen onlys'. There were also numerous nuts bolts and washers as factory workers used to come straight from work in their overalls. It was not uncommon for those who lived on their own to come off shift, get their dinner, go to the pictures and fall asleep until the National Anthem signalled the end of the show and they were woken up just in time for the night shift.

Albert Waldock moved on to the Tivoli but didn't like it, so he switched to the Playhouse and then the Victoria in a career that lasted until 1999. Sadly he never completed his handwritten notes which are full of technical details that will prove invaluable to cinema historians. But in an earlier letter published in Memories in June 2004 he recalled that he later helped install the projectors at the Victoria for the first true 3D films to be shown in Cambridge.

Michael Knights from Cambridge saw many of the films screened at the Vic. He was taken as a four-or-five year old to see 'Mr Pastry', the creation of popular entertainer Richard Hearn in the early 1950s and became a regular.

Margaret Marrs from Trumpington remembers the Victoria's restaurant. She writes: "When I was working and before I was married (1952-1955) I used to meet up with friends or colleagues for lunch and we had a selection of eating places in those days. The Victoria was one, my recollection was that it was a large room upstairs at the cinema. Almost next door, on the corner of Market Street was the Scotch Hoose, still an eating house after several name changes over the years. Another regular place was between Burtons, then on the corner of Petty Cury and the International Stores on Market Hill. A staircase led down to the Venetian Restaurant in the basement. But I suppose the most regular was the Civic Restaurant at the St Andrew's end of Petty Cury, where you could get a nourishing meal cheap".

But were any other restaurants as full of characters as Miss Pearson's tea rooms? And what memories do you have of eating out in Cambridge in the sixties or seventies?

Memories 9th August 2010, by Mike Petty

Last week the News carried a report about a man who had become trapped in a well near Little Paxton whilst trying to rescue a much-loved dog. Just 100 years ago there was a similar story, this time about an incident in Wentworth near Witchford.

The Cambridgeshire Weekly News of 12th August 1910 reported how a tragedy had been narrowly averted by the prompt action of a villager, Jonas Whetstone. He'd heard a noise coming from a well by the roadside and on looking in was surprised to find a young woman clinging desperately to the brick sides and in imminent peril of drowning in the 30-feet deep water below. It was no easy matter from him to effect her escape but he succeeded in doing so.

The eighteen-year old girl, Harriett, had been in service in London and recently returned home to visit her parents in the Hillrow area of Haddenham. She had come over to Wentworth to see her young man but he had refused to speak to her. This rebuff proved too much for the girl who, losing all control, jumped into the well. When rescued she was handed over to police and appeared in court charged with attempting to commit suicide.

Sadly all too often such attempts were successful and at other times criminals have tried to hide the bodies of their victims down the well. One such incident took place at Walsoken Marsh near Wisbech in 1885 when a drunken husband attacked his wife with a billhook. Thinking he had killed her he put the body into the water where she recovered her senses, but drowned.

Sometimes well water was warm: in January 1841 a Longstanton farmer struck water just 5½ feet below the surface which maintained an even temperature of 65 degrees even on cold days whilst a second well drilled 14 yards away produced exceptionally cold water.

But it was often not drinkable. In 1910 the County Medical Officer of Health reported that Croxton well was polluted and was not worth spending money on, while although five wells at Willingham were contaminated there was no better supply available. In 1924 numerous wells at Soham were found to be polluted with sewage and unfit for drinking purposes. The Newmarket Medical Office had a list of 41 wells all of which had been condemned. As long as they were available to the public they would be a potential source of water-borne diseases, he warned. However many parish councils opposed proposals to introduced piped water during a period of recession.

In July 1957 the News sent a reporter to investigate the situation in Duxford. There were 63 known wells in the village but the previous year 40 had dried up and 13 others were unsatisfactory. Dr J. York Moore of Sawston, who had been monitoring the situation for some time said the wells had been drying up earlier each year - in August 1955, in July 1956 and June 1957. One had stopped working in June 1956 and had not been used since.

Miss Harriett Hewitt, then 74-years-old, lived in a four-roomed cottage in Ickleton Road. The well she shared with some of her neighbours had dried up and she had to go once a day to a pump about 250 yards away to fetch water. "If I want extra water, then I have to go twice", she declared. "I think it is terrible". Mrs Pamela Jones, a housewife with two small children who lived in St John's Street, obtained her water from a pump about 200 yards from her home. "I have to go about three or four times a day", she said.

Today one can buy bottled water with added flavours such as apple, lime or elderflower. This too was something our forefathers knew all about – only it was somewhat different. In 1889 one correspondent to the Cambridge Daily News described his village's water as 'covered with a green, slimy substance, and full of living creatures and to add to its high flavour most of the liquids from the adjoining farmyard closets and pig sties are drained into it'

Many wells which once stood at the back of cottages have been forgotten. Ralph Warboys recalled in 2003 how there were once about 56 in Oakington and Westwick 12 most could not be located. His father discovered one when driving a sow past the 'White Horse' after the old boards covering the hole gave way and the pig fell in. Have you had a similar incident?

Barry Moore from Milton has kindly shown me some photographs that seem to fill a gap in Cambridge's recorded history. But they also open up other questions.

The pictures show a market stall and shop occupied by the firm of W.Delph and son whose 1934 billhead proclaims them to be wholesale and retail fruiterers, florists and nurserymen.

Two pictures show their stall on the corner of the market near the junction with Petty Cury. Neither is dated, though there are clues. The more recent photograph contains advertisements for Australian apples and pears and was taken in about 1935. It is not the fruit that gives this clue but the building work taken place in the background where scaffolding surrounds the white Caius college student accommodation on the corner of Rose Crescent. It was part of the massive development of central Cambridge that would also see the rebuilding of much of Sidney Street and the north side of Petty Cury

The other is obviously older, probably about 1904. It shows a most neatly-presented range of apples, plums and other fruit together with asparagus and greens together with two young men manning the stall. The stall carries the name 'W. Delph & Son' and then, partially obscured are the words 'Also at 39 Market Hill, opposite.

Now it gets interesting, for the building opposite the stall was Cambridge Guildhall and a third picture shows 'The Guildhall Fruit Stores' occupying part of the building. Its entrance was right beside the support for the canopy which sheltered councillors and visiting dignities who arrived to meet the Mayor. So how did a fruit shop come to occupy such a site.

When the building was first constructed in about 1790 it was not a Guildhall at all: the town's offices were in an older building behind. It was built as a Shire Hall whose upper storey provided space for the county justices to meet. The arches underneath were open and provided an extension to the market. Only later were they bricked in. An engraving of 1800 shows the Shire Hall with the open arches and the Guildhall behind looking remarkably unchanged by 1910.

As well as fruit and veg, Delphs were florists with a nursery on Madingley Road. They specialised in wreaths and crosses. One of the photographs shows a giant wreath bearing the words 'Their Name Liveth for Evermore'. It was displayed, Barry believes, over the Guildhall clock in November 1919, as part of the commemoration of the first anniversary of the signing of the Armistice. The wreath was made by Fred Etheridge, Barry's grandfather, who lived at 24 James Street where he continued to make wreaths after his retirement

By 1919 Delph's had moved to no.36 Market Hill the centre of three shops occupying a tall building between the Guildhall and Union Street, the road leading to Peas Hill. Prior to that they traded from Union Street itself. Both these buildings were demolished in the first stage of Guildhall enlargement.

Barry's photographs thus enable us to track down something of the story of W. Delph and son. Registers give other clues. It seems that a William H. Delph married Ellen Buxton in Cambridge in September 1880. He died in December 1919, just days after that wreath was placed over the Guildhall clock.

But there must be more to be told. Can you help tell it? And can you add to the story of Cambridge's fruit sellers?

Memories 23rd August 2010, by Mike Petty

I received a letter from Ron Ryder recently. Ron has been a regular correspondent over the years, sharing his memories of Pye, Chesterton, the Brunswick School and gas masks amongst other topics.

This one is particularly poignant for it came with a note from his daughter to say that Ron had passed away and that when sorting through his papers she'd come across this letter. It was probably the last he wrote and he never actually got around to signing it

It reads: "I was interested to read about the old Victoria Cinema on Market Square, Cambridge. I have fond memories of the Restaurant area which could be used for evening clubs etc. The Cambridge Camera Club was formed there by Frank Watson who worked in Campkins Camera Shop, Rose Crescent". Ron enclosed a photograph of one such meeting taken about 1952. (The posters on the wall both advertise films that were released that year).

Ron continued: "It shows Frank Watson who must have hired a film about photography to keep us entertained for that night. In those days we did our own developing and printing, mixing and weighing all our chemicals. It was all black-and-white photography and we put on several exhibitions of our prints in the Victoria"

He included a list of names of members which reads like a who's who of Cambridge photographers at that time including Norman and Francis Hall, the President of the Club. Perhaps you can identify the faces most of whom, like himself have now passed into history. As well as Ron himself it shows Miss Johnson, Ken and Mary Bowyer, Miss Williams, John Scoon, Dr Bottomley, Roy Moss, Stan and Doris Moore, Mr Coulson, Roy and Freda Green and Briscoe Snelson.

Their pictures from the past that was their present still bring pleasure to so many and Ron shared a number of his photographs in Memories over the years. They included a rare snap of the Cambridge Air Raid Wardens in the Ramsden Square area of Cambridge showing his father H.J. Ryder and brother Cyril as well as head warden Mr Winkworth, H. Dennison, Mr Mallyon & Mr Brown. Another of his photographs shows a group of Royal Engineers taken at Cambridge station in October 1939

I'm always delighted to see such snaps as so much care went into taking, developing and printing them. If you find any when sorting through papers please ensure they are preserved for future generations. The Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library is always happy to add to its files and I'm also delighted to share them through 'Memories'

A photograph I featured recently in Memories showed a well at the back of a cottage in Great Abington. It brought back memories for Dr Aileen Adams of Cambridge who emailed: "I recognise the site as the front of the cottage I lived in from 1960 to 1991. I knew there had been a well there and also I was only too familiar with the walnut tree shading it – too familiar in that it gradually grew out of all proportion and tilted towards the road and had to be cut down eventually as a potential danger, in spite of having a preservation order on it. The cottage had been named "Gilding Cross" when I went there. I understood that it was soon after 1945 that an architect took over these cottages together with one further down the road with a view to improving them. This he did, making them comfortable and convenient but keeping their charm. At this time the cottages were not scheduled, but some years after I moved in they gave Grade 2 status to them. It seems there were original four cottages in the row and he turned them into two houses. Certainly I was very happy there for over 30 years before moving into Cambridge after I retired.

Memories 30th August 2010

With the news that the Guided Bus will not now arrive this year we can all settle down for a long wait before the new vehicles whisk us smoothly to wherever we wish to go. Some passengers complain this is nothing new, waiting a long time for a bus only to have three arrive at once.

But in August 1960 one News reader recalled when there had been only seven buses in the whole of the Cambridge area, three of them were just 14 horsepower, the others a more powerful thirty. They comprised the fleet of the Ortona Motor Company in 1912

Harry Bevan knew all about them, for that year he started as a driver on the Number 3 bus to Sawston. It was a route he drove five times a day for seven years, carrying both parcels and a steady stream of people. He was allowed 50 minutes each way and by using the maximum speed of 12 mph ensured he always had time for a good smoke break at the end.

Harry soon got to know his passengers. One evening he noticed one of his regulars sitting on the wall at Emmanuel College eating an enormous pork pie. Harry stopped and picked him up to take him home on the bus. They got as far as the 'Green Man' at Trumpington, when the passenger insisted on going for a drink. Finding it impossible to dissuade him Harry and his conductor followed him inside and so did another passenger travelling on the top deck.

Unfortunately the top deck passenger owed the other man some money and when he refused to hand it over 'he gave him a fourpenny one and floored him', Harry recalled. So for the rest of the journey they took the regular passenger (an ex-boxer) in the driving cab and let the victim keep his place on the top deck, out of harm's way.

It was difficult to get a driving licence: Harry had to wait till he was 21 before he could take his driving test and get a special licence from Scotland Yard, who issued them at that time. Then he had to have a separate licence for each vehicle he drove. The first double-decker he drove on coming to Cambridge from London, was one which in 1908 used to travel from Station Road Corner to the Rock Hotel on Cherry Hinton Road and back via Blinco Grove. It was not allowed to go through the town because it was a menace to shop signs.

One night Harry drove one of the lesser-powered buses up to the Rex Skating Rink on Magrath Avenue and picked up some undergraduates. The vehicle was licensed to carry 26 passengers but by the time the students had clambered up on the top deck there were about 50 onboard. Undaunted Harry drove off down the hill at a steady ten miles an hour when the coupling shaft broke. The passengers dismounted and many of them patiently stood by while Harry crawled under the bus to repair the damage. When it was fixed they all jumped aboard again to continue the journey.

The Great War saw men and some buses called up for the front and bus conductresses came into their own. They were only used in town since on country services there were heavy parcels to be delivered. As the war dragged on men became so few that they actually thought of appointing women bus drivers – but it never came to that and when the men returned most ladies gave up conducting.

There were concerns about a lack of competition. In 1921 the Cambridge Borough Council signed an agreement with Ortona allowing them a monopoly of buses on the streets of Cambridge for a payment of £250 a year. “They have had a jolly good picking. There are no workmen’s tickets, no children’s tickets, no cheap tickets, which you get in any other town”, one councillor complained. The Mayor said the streets were already so congested that it was not possible to have competitive services in operation.

Until 1925 the main bus terminus was outside the Senate House but then Drummer Street was brought into use. It soon became overcrowded and Ortona claimed all of the side nearest Emanuel College leaving the Christ’s Pieces side for the others – and if an independent parked on the wrong side there was trouble. 1931 was the crunch year for many companies with the introduction of the Road Transport Act and in that year Ortona itself was taken over by Eastern Counties Omnibus Company, the familiar green buses which could by then take you to Peterborough for 3/- or 5/- return – were replaced by red ones

But it was not just a change of colour that upset drivers and conductors. In 1932 they complained that the old Ortona bus company had a sort of family arrangement with the workers but with the formation of Eastern Counties the men had suffered cuts in wages. There were also changes in working conditions. A midnight meeting of 200 employees instructed the Transport and General Workers’ Union to open negotiations for wages of 1s 4d (07p) an hour for drivers, 1s 2d (06p) for conductors, for a 48-hour week with double time on public holidays. There was outrage when the secretary of the Busmen’s Union, George Proctor, who had been leading the negotiations, was made redundant. The Company piled up pressure, restricting overtime but increasing the size of buses which added to the workload of conductors and demanding faster times from the drivers.

The Second World War saw modifications to buses, one was equipped to run on gas and others redesigned to allow 30 standing passengers. Some were painted in grey camouflage painting with the windows covered over apart from small peepholes. The bus headlights were masked and drivers had to grope their way through blacked-out streets.

All this Harry Bevan experienced. He retired in 1948 with many good, and some bad memories, a few of which he shared in an article in the News fifty years ago. His reminiscences gave a wonderful insight to the everyday problems of driving a bus. Did you drive one and have you tales to tell?

Memories 6th Sept 2010 by Mike Petty

I met Pam Haswell the other evening when speaking to Peterborough Family History Society and now she has emailed seeking help tracking down an ancestor's police record.

William Caunt (her first cousin three-times removed) was born either 1842 or 1844 in Rippingale, Lincs, the illegitimate son of Anne Caunt who was the sister of her great-great-grandfather Stephen Caunt. He is listed as a Police Constable in Cambridge in the censuses between 1871 and 1901 and is shown as retired by 1911. He died in 1914 and is buried in Mill Road Cemetery, Cambridge with his wife Sofia Caunt nee Frost.

That bit she knows and Pam has checked all the usual internet sources and censuses. They show, for example that in 1871 the 17-year-old William was lodging in Paradise Street and listed as a Police Officer.

But there are mysteries. I have volumes of the Spalding's street directories of Cambridge for 1898 and 1904 but there is no mention of William Caunt. However the 1904 Directory has been fully indexed in a digitised version published by The Cambridge Explorer in 2001. It reveals William's address then as 11 Rose Cottage, Mawson Road. Further checking in the volumes available at Lion Yard Library would enable Pam to investigate a little further, should she travel down from Peterborough.

Spalding's Directories also include a list of Cambridge Borough policemen and Caunt is not amongst them.

But in January 1932 Mr H.P. Brown of Hooper Street sent the Cambridge Chronicle a copy of a picture of the Borough Police force taken in the Corn Exchange together with a list of names. There on the front row is a PC 'Gaunt'. Mr Brown thought it had been taken in 1878 though other readers at the time put the date as between 1883 and 1885.

Pam would be interested in finding out about his service, what sort of uniform would he have worn in those days and anything else about the police at that time in Cambridge.

One man who recorded his memories of policing at that time was Inspector Ernest Haylock who served in the Cambridgeshire force between 1895 and 1923.

In his early days police worked entirely on foot and even when bicycles were introduced they were not allowed to use them at night. He had a monthly half-a-crown (12p) boot allowance out of which he had to tip and hobnail them. This ensured villains could hear a policeman coming along the road a mile off, his feet crunching up the bad country roads. He carried a bulls-eye lamp, a heavy, clumsy old thing but often it had gone out when he most needed it, especially on wet nights. When alight the smell was awful if it was not filled with good Colza oil but this cost fivepence a pint and each officer was allowed just a shilling a month for oil.

There were of course the lighter incidents. One constable had been on duty all day in the tent at Caxton Races looking after the trophies and had taken a little 'refreshment' to while away the time. It was customary to give the policemen a taste of champagne at the end of the day but this reacted with his previous beverages and caused him to be sick in the trap that carried him back to Cambridge. Sadly he was sitting opposite the Chief Constable at the time.

On another occasion when Ernest was a constable, he and a colleague were warned by their Superintendent that they were not to take the route back past Wimpole Hall where a ball was in progress. But of course they decided to call round at the kitchen where they knew the cook and others of the staff would be. Whilst there one of the young gentlemen came out and invited them to join the dance so they took off their hobnail boots and hopped around in their socks.

Little bits of fun such as this and the odd pheasant or a golden sovereign from the 'squire' at Christmas (to help pay the house rent) helped life along and as the men were in uniform most of the day and night, they did not need to spend a lot on their civilian clothes.

When Inspector Haylock decided that he was ready for retirement, having served more than a year longer than the statutory requirement of 26 years approved service, the Police Committee were upset to see him go. Indeed they asked the Home Office to pass new regulations requiring policemen to continue on to the age of 55. Had they been successful Ernest would have had to continue to plod the beat for a further six years.

Ernest's memories were recorded by Arthur Almond and published in the Cambridgeshire Local History Council Bulletin for 1978. But do you have similar stories – and do any of them mention William Caunt. If so email Pam - pamhaswell@yahoo.com – or drop me a line

I have a terrible memory for names and faces. Yet when I saw a lady in the Cambridgeshire Collection the other week something seemed familiar.

Was she from Sweden, I asked. "No, Finland", she replied – "I met you in 1971" In those distant days Anna-Liisa Vasko was a student who had come over to Cambridgeshire investigating our local dialect. She had spent much time tape recording folk in places where their distinctive regional ways of saying things still survived, visiting 15 Cambridgeshire villages from Bassingbourn to the borders of the Isle of Ely, beyond which another colleague was doing the same.

Anna-Liisa was interested in the way people spoke, not what they actually said and the recordings went back to the University of Helsinki with her. Now some of the results of that research have been published on the University's website.

Her report on 'Cambridgeshire Dialect Grammar' is a detailed analysis of nouns and pronouns, propositions and adverbs, illustrated by examples of their use. But there are also actual snippets of the tape recordings of people from Doddington, Elm, Swaffham Prior and Willingham.

One of her main contributors had been the late Dennis Jeeps of Willingham whose impressive collection of photographs has been preserved in the Cambridgeshire Collection. Anna was browsing through a box of them when I interrupted her. It was something she could have done from home in Helsinki for since Dennis' death the pictures have been digitised and placed on the 'Old Willingham' website so they are available to anybody with a computer. (<http://oldwillingham.com/>)

Out at Cottenham two men were compiling a similar record of that village and filling school halls with their regular slide shows. Both Francis Garrett and Mervyn Haird have now passed away but their legacy lives on.

When Mervyn died his slides remained in the magazines in the order he showed them, his notes identifying streets, topics, schools and many of the faces shown were meticulously filed. It was all ready for deposit in the Cambridgeshire Collection but only when his widow, Cynthia, was ready.

Mervyn was a remarkable man in many ways, not the least of which was photography. He had inherited a large collection of old glass negatives taken by two early Cottenham photographers that he had developed and printed in his garden-shed darkroom. To these he had added hundreds of pictures he took himself either by walking the streets or by borrowing and copying postcards and snaps lent to him by villagers. It was a community-wide enterprise and the pictures were shared with the village through books and of course those packed-out shows.

But he had kept up to date with modern computer developments and together he and his wife had attended evening classes to learn how to scan his images and save them to disks, to enable digital copies to be made. It was a project he never completed, one she wanted to carry into fruition.

Cynthia enlisted the assistance of Hugo Brown from Wilburton who has spent the last four months scanning, digitising and indexing the magnificent Cottenham archive of pictures. And last week an invited audience was amazed at the result. There is now a DVD that you pop into a computer and gives instant access to some 1,500 images – about half the entire collection. On your laptop you can recreate the old slide shows street by street – it will take something over five hours just to click through them all.

But then there are the categories – all pictures of ploughing, farming, bicycle-making or buses together with images of the village at war or at play. And if you are searching for people then a simple click on an alphabetical listing will take you to any school group or gathering that shows them.

Copies of the DVD of the Mervyn Haird Collection an interactive photographic archive of the village of Cottenham have been deposited in Cambridgeshire Archives and local libraries. But they are also available to anybody willing to invest £15 in a piece of the past presented in the format of the future.

The community of Cottenham helped Mervyn Haird compile its pictorial history, now it has been returned to them. There will be a public presentation at Cottenham Village College on 15th September at 7.30 to which all are welcome. Memories 20th September 2010 by Mike Petty

Richard Collis from Stapleford would like help tracking down something of the history of a building that was once an essential part of the world-famous Stourbridge Fair held on the common off Newmarket Road.

Formerly the Fair used to attract merchants from Venice and Genoa with their silks and velvets, Flemish weavers with their linen, Spaniards with their iron, Norwegians with tar and pitch, wines from France and Spain and – sometimes – Greece. They would arrive in early September at King’s Lynn and journey down the Ouse and Cam to Cambridge. They would not be alone, from all over England tradesmen with their packhorses and wagons would be negotiating the atrocious roads; from Halifax, Leeds and Rochdale came cloth, Birmingham sent iron and brass, Sheffield cutlery, Nottingham & Leicester glass & stockings. Lancashire wool would probably be bought by Norfolk manufacturers, hops grown in Surrey and Kent would be destined for northern breweries.

It was all something that had taken place since time immemorial - in 1211 King John granted the income from the tolls, rents & other payments to support the Lepers’ Hospital established near by. This had been swept away by the Reformation, along with the neighbouring priory of Barnwell, and since then the town and the University had squabbled about who was to administer it and have the income. They reached a compromise that inevitably caused disagreement and friction – one year the mayor would proclaim the fair, next year it was the University’s turn.

The Corporation turned out en masse – councillors, officers, members of parliament in a grand procession mounted on horseback and bedecked in official robes. They all arrived at the Garlic Row, near the old chapel and read out a Proclamation, then went to the court house and read it again. Here instant justice was administered for with so many deals being done and with people always coming and going there was no time to wait for judgement in a few weeks time. After that the Mayoral party set off again to a coffee house at the centre of the fairground where they read the proclamation once more and washed the dust from their throats. After that it was off to the Rose tavern or some other hostelry for a hard-earned feast of game or venison.

It was similar when it was the University's turn. Then Bedells and Proctors, Taxors and Commissary, the Vice-Chancellor and the rest usually started at the Senate House eating a variety of cakes and washing them down with mulled wine and sherry. They all travelled in their carriages or on horseback, read the proclamations and then headed off to a building called the Oyster House where they dispatched their business and a supply of oysters. Then they transferred to a partitioned off section called the "University Dining Room" where there were more barrels of oysters with ale to wash them down. After that they took a turn around the fairground while the dinner was prepared.

The cooks got it out as quick as they could but it was some time before the University gentlemen actually got to eat it for they first had to push their way past the other customers of the Oyster House who weren't too keen to let them through. It was a feast, typically a large dish of herrings, then a neck of pork roasted and a leg of pork boiled. There was an enormous plum-pudding, a pease-pudding, a goose, a huge apple-pie, and a round of beef. By the time they finished the room was sweltering hot and there were not a few bluebottles and flies attracted by the prospects of left-over food.

It was this Oyster House where Richard remembers his grandfather, J. Lee living in the 1950s. It had by then been divided into two flats and was well past its best. It was infested with rats and the basement steps led down to a flooded cellar. Upstairs was an abandoned dance hall with a stage, glass chandeliers and panelled walls decorated with enamel plaques advertising Wills Cigarettes.

It was here that in June 1906 dancing and conviviality reigned supreme. Formerly the centre of a mass of stalls the Oyster House was then a lonely building whose gable windows were decorated with fairy lights. Inside a crowd crammed around the bar counter or made their way to the upper floor. The stairs were carved and wide like those of a prosperous mansion and lead to an extensive room with bare floor and white-washed walls. A harpist could be dimly seen through the haze of tobacco smoke and a concertina joined in the melody. Dancers swirled around, girls with girls and youths with youths with no conventions of the ball-room. The crowded state of the room occasioned several awkward collisions and the harpist called out "Git back there and give the dancers a charnce, carn't yer".

In 1986 Pauline Anderson, who lived in Garlic Row before the War, remembered the building in earlier days. There was no paint on the doors or window frames and never any lights in the house. The upper windows were broken and rags fluttered at smashed windows through which the bats flew at night. It was home to "Goatee" Brown and his wife, a grey-haired, brown-toothed old lady who wore a sack tied round her waist. They lived on the ground floor in a room with full of stuffed birds and animals under a glass dome and where the table was decorated with fruit and flowers.

Sylvia Clark recalled in November 2000 how she used to go there for a score of eggs each Sunday morning when Mrs Brown would say "you've got such a good mother and I've got so many eggs – I'll give you 24". Another visitor recalled that the living room had a dirt floor but a pot in the corner was full of sovereigns.

By 1957 the building, which dated from 1707 and was originally known as the Tiled Booth was scheduled for demolition. It was pulled down in 1960.

Stourbridge Fair had disappeared into the history books long before that. Following a lingering decline it has been abolished in 1934. There are very few pictures of it so if you have snapshots or memories please let me know

Memories 27 September 2010, by Mike Petty

Fifty years ago a Cambridge rock'n'roll group stood on the edge of stardom. In August 1960 they were hoping to be offered the chance of turning professional.

They were fully equipped: they'd invested up to £148 on guitars, £98 on drums and they'd been given an amplifier. They had been out for their stage clothes of grey trousers and black shirts and were saving up for new gold lame jackets.

They'd even got a name – The Redcaps.

The original group had been brought together two years earlier but only bass guitarist Neddy Bishop was still playing. For one reason or another the rest had dropped out and the band now consisted of Neddy, Robin Bailey on drums, Jimmy Graham (lead guitar), Graham Smith (rhythm guitar) and vocalist Tony Clark, average age 19

While they waited for fame they continued to earn their livings as electrician, painter, baker or shop assistant. One evening each week they spent rehearsing and polishing up their repertoire. Mostly they played tunes from the hit parade but two songs had been written just for them.

Saturdays were the busy days with evening performances in Cambridge, Newmarket or as far afield as Anglesey – the Welsh one, not the Abbey near Lode. They journeyed to venues in a two vehicles, the performers in a friend's car, the equipment in a van. On arrival in strange venues they had a short rehearsal, just to get the feel of the place, then took a short rest before their three-and-a-half hour performance.

Wherever they went they liked to mix with the audience and play their requests. Sometimes they encountered hostility – their first performance in Newmarket had been a bit sticky as was that at Daddy's Night Club in Cambridge.

Then, gig done it was time to pack up the van and head home, each member richer to the sum of £4 for their evening's work.

Sadly the Redcaps, like Forever Amber, the Burnettes, Prowlers, Sundowners and Vikings never really hit the big time. At least not first time round. Now they're trying again. For these bands together with Blues Anonymous, Those Without, Little Women, the Chequers and more are teaming up again for a Roots of Cambridge Rock concert at St Paul's Church next Saturday, 30th October. From 7.30 the joint will be jumping as up to 250 people pack in for a very special evening of musical nostalgia.

One thing will be different – the musicians will not receive the same generous fee that they could expect in 1960. With tickets priced at only £5 and a strictly limited capacity it is most unlikely they'll afford those new gold jackets on the proceeds! In fact all the proceeds are going to the Alzheimers Society, Parkinson UK and the Syd Barret Fund. If you want to be there then email Warren Dosanjh - rootsofcambridgerock@gmail.com - for your tickets.

One place where music blasted out in those distant days was Cambridge Corn Exchange. But that was not the main attraction. People flocked from all around to go roller skating. Saturday morning was the children's morning and with its yards of bunting, the otherwise sombre building had a carnival air. From the very young to the really quite grown up they were tumbling about, wobbling precariously round the perimeter or pirouetting stylishly in the centre. Some of the girls swooped round in short costumes while the run-of-the-mill dressed for the rough and tumble in trousers. The rink was run by J.W. Harris, who had another one at Hunstanton. It was managed by Mr Lloyd Worth who had been a professional in the skating business for 53 years. He organised classes for kids aged three to sixteen, some of whom were saving up for their own set of expanding skates which cost over £1 17 6 – (£1.85) nearly half of what the aspiring pop stars earned for their performances.

Did you go roller skating at the Corn Exchange or within yards of the beach at Hunstanton. Do you still have those skates – the wheels always came off mine for some reason. I made Stretham school history by being the first to skate in the playground – and the first to be told off for skating across the wooden classroom floorboards to get outside! Well it's nice to be remembered for something!

Memories 4th October 2010, by Mike Petty

Did you have Squish for breakfast when a child.

If so was it made by Keiller, Cooper or Chivers? Or did you prefer the more upmarket brands – Ticklers was absolutely pure, Cairns probably the best. But an own-brand variety produced in Green Street Cambridge was of the finest quality, prepared with only a small proportion of sugar

'Squish' was the colloquial name for marmalade and many families made their own from Seville Oranges. To do so you needed jam jars, jam pot covers and wooden spoons. However to do the job properly you also needed a marmalade machine. It was clamped to the table top, oranges were fed through and as the handle was turned they were sliced thinly with the juice and rind caught in a bowl set below. It could process three oranges in a minute and sold for sixteen shillings a sixpence in 1913.

But not everybody could afford or needed their very own machine so many families rented one for sixpence a day. As late as the 1950s a delivery van would bring it to the house and collect it again when the job was done.

It was just one of the services available from Matthew's grocery shop in Trinity Street.

These days one is used to supermarkets delivering shopping to your door. But Matthew's did that a century ago. They had stables for eleven horses in Green Street for their fleet of delivery vans with motor vehicles taking over in the 1920s. Most deliveries were free, except for firewood, dog biscuits, oil, soda, sand and salt and mineral water.

Nor did you have to journey into Cambridge to shop. Matthews's had a telephone installed in the 1890s so that customers could phone in their orders. Or you could write in – any order arriving by the first post would be delivered by midday. Apart from Thursday, that was early closing day.

For those who did visit the shop in Trinity Street there was a large range of goods, including wines. Whilst one is used to such a choice in the supermarket of today, Matthew's was different. They sold medicated wine, sacramental wine and a vast selection of ports, sherries and burgundies. But as well as bottles they had barrels of choice vintages bought from their own suppliers which was bottled, corked and labelled in their cellar. They also bottled Finest Old Jamaica rum and several varieties of cider, some specially recommended for their medicinal properties. Then there was the beer brewed by Bailey and Tebbutt of Cambridge, Tollemache of Ipswich or imported from Germany.

If you preferred tea or coffee then there was a vast choice which could be consumed in the shop's own café just along the street. It was hailed in 1913 as the finest in the Eastern Counties with its snow-white table linen and spruce waiting maids. Perhaps you still recall the Palm Court atmosphere, the wicker chairs and the tinkling piano of the 1960s. Floral china was used to serve tea and two-tier stands, complete with paper doilies, were carried carefully to the table with a selection of fancy cakes. 'It is the quiet refinement of the place that makes it so attractive to so many', one customer noted on the back of a 1950's menu preserved amongst the firm's archives.

Sadly Matthew's is now just a memory. Having served generations of dons, undergraduates and Cambridge residents for 130 years it finally closed in 1964. [SUBS – IT DID CLOSE IN 1964 THOUGH THE TITLE SAYS 1962]

But the memories still survive amongst former staff and customers. These and the firm's papers have been sifted and sorted by Judy Wilson, a member of the Matthew family, to produce a tribute to a remarkable Cambridge grocer and the way they adapted to a changing retail world.

It will be published at a reception on the site of the old premises – now Heffer's Bookshop – on 19th October after which it will be available to purchase for £12.99 by personal callers, by post or by internet – www.cambridgegrocer.com.

And – as one would expect from a company that was always in the forefront of up-to-date methods – it will also be available as an e-book. I'm just not sure that it will be delivered to your door by one of their horse-drawn vans

“In the evening of Thursday the 2nd of July, the lofty wooden bridge over the Cam ... frequently called the Mathematical Bridge broke down. It had been in a decayed state for a considerable time, and boards had been put up several days previous to its falling in, to prevent persons going over. The bridge was erected in the year 1768, from a design by the late Mr James Essex, an eminent architect”

In these words the Cambridge Chronicle of 12th July 1810 recorded one incident in the story of the bridge at Garret Hostel Lane.

The same issue of the paper also contained proposals for a new cast-iron bridge at Silver Street. It would be almost alongside the other Essex bridge, the wooden structure he had erected at Queens' College to designs by Etheridge some 20 years previously. This was rebuilt in 1902 and is itself now known as the “Mathematical Bridge”

The collapse of Garret Hostel Bridge caused a particular problem. For whereas the college bridges were principally for college people, Garret Hostel was for everybody. It had been given to the town by King Henry VI so that people could have access to the river after he had closed many of the other lanes to build his new King's College.

Time after time Garret Hostel Bridge needed repair and the bills were shared jointly between Trinity Hall and the town of Cambridge. Finally the college had contributed their half of the expense of building Essex's 'Mathematical Bridge' on the understanding that they would be free from all future claims. So the town paid for it to be patched up. It was soon in trouble again – a wooden bridge just did not have the permanence required.

In 1835 tenders were sought for a cast-iron bridge similar to the one at Sidney Street. The contract was awarded to the Butterley Iron Company and the work undertaken by Finch's iron foundry, a Cambridge firm famous for such work. The result was a fine bridge in the Gothic style which featured on as many postcard views as some of its older college neighbours. Despite their earlier agreement Trinity Hall contributed over a quarter of the cost of £960 19s 6d with other colleges joining in.

But by 1959 settlement had caused the cast iron to fracture, making a replacement essential. This time it was not the college but one of its students who picked up the bill. The Trusted Family had been associated with Trinity Hall for 50 years and Sir Harry Trusted, Q.C., decided that a tangible way of recognising the link would be to fund a new bridge.

Designs were approved in January 1960 and work soon began. A temporary timber gantry was constructed alongside which was used as a working platform while the cast iron bridge and its masonry abutments were dismantled.

Next steel tubes 40 to 50 feet long were driven into the gault clay beneath and filled with concrete after which the curved framework, which had been prefabricated off the site, was erected. Then once water pipes and ducts were in place the whole bridge was formally handed over by Sir Harry Trusted on 24th October 1960.

The new structure was designed to be an honest example of twentieth century craftsmanship. It was exceptionally light for its 80 foot span but nevertheless strong and rigid.

Soon fit young undergraduates were soaring over it on their bicycles. But others were puffing and panting. A News reporter watched as a lady pushed her bicycle, its basket loaded with laundry, up the high approach ramp. A gentleman followed, pulling himself up the slope with the help of the elegant bronze balustrade.

Nobody wanted to hurt the feelings of the man who very kindly gave the bridge to the town but many felt it was something like the presents that Aunt Edie gave for Christmas. It just wasn't quite right.

However as one lady said at the time, there's nothing they can do about it now, of course. Others were more positive: it was an ideal training ground for mountaineers.

Fifty years on it still taxes the muscles of all who cross it.

Memories 18th October 2010, by Mike Petty

The search is on for memories of one of the forgotten groups of the sixties music scene

Brian Chambers was part of Haverhill pop group, The Vulcans. They played from 1960 to 1968 at various halls including the Dorothy in Cambridge, where they were one of the resident bands, as well as the Victoria Ballroom, American Air Bases and summer seasons at Clacton pier.

The group comprised Brian, Douglas Spells and Peter Bruty on guitars with Richard Turner on drums and singer Peter Goodwin. Sadly Douglas has passed away but other members were reunited recently when they were filmed by Neil Lanham for a new DVD capturing the sounds of the sixties. Now the hunt is on for any more photographs or – if possible a recording - of the lads in their heyday. If you can help ring Neil on 01440 730414 or email n.lanham@btconnect.com

In their time the Vulcans supported top acts, including The Shadows – a talented group of musicians whose one-time lead singer, Cliff Richard, last week marked his 70th birthday with a series of concerts.

In a lifetime of travelling light – or at least it was in the early days when artists carried their own equipment with them in a small van – Cliff visited Cambridge on a number of occasions

It was in November 1959 that the News reported how the 19-year old baby-faced star and the hit parade's latest top-notch, took Cambridge by storm on his first performance. Excited teenagers, predominantly female, packed into the Regal cinema and clapped, screamed and wailed in readiness for their idol. Cliff, dressed in a 'shocking pink' jacket with matching tie, performed his remarkably successful hits 'Living Doll' and 'Travelling Light'. He was accompanied by the Shadows featuring drummer Laurie Jay in place of Tony Meehan who had undergone an appendicitis operation. It was a triumph from start to finish – he could do nothing wrong with an audience which was in a buoyant mood from the beginning of the programme.

For that audience had been well prepared by supporting acts like the Vulcans. First on stage was the Tommy Allen Group who got off to a rousing start with a basic rock beat. They were followed by the Landis Brother who soon had the girls yelling for more. Then there was recording star Al Saxon dressed in a shiny grey suit whose singing and ability with the trumpet and banjo earned him thunderous applause. He was followed by The Southlanders, then Roy Young from 'Drumbeat' and Peter Elliott, a singing star from the 'Oh Boy' programme whose Frank Sinatra approach provided a contrast to all that had gone before.

Sir Cliff's latest album features just this sort of song – did he remember them from all those long hours of waiting in the shadows backstage before bursting into the spotlight?

He certainly had a long time to fill. Cliff appeared for just fifteen minutes of a two-hour concert when he returned in May 1960. His first three numbers were drowned by the screams of teenage girls, his fourth was barely audible and the rest of the time he unsuccessfully tried to make himself heard over a crescendo of stamping feet, clapping hands and screaming voices. He returned in 1962, one of a number of pop stars including, Adam Faith, Billy Fury & the Everley Brothers..

Many people have their memories of these performances. But does anybody recall a visit in February 1976 when, in his capacity as an evangelist, Cliff visited Holy Trinity Church. Some 700 people were packed in, but more than 100 had to be turned away even though they had queued in freezing conditions. Earlier in the day 500 others attended an evangelistic concert he gave with the Brightwater Group at Lady Mitchell Hall, Sidgwick Avenue. The News photographer took pictures of him preparing and sneaked a snap of an audience that seemed not to be quite as enthusiastic as those that he had previously attracted. Were you one and call you tell me more?

When he returned in October 1977 a News reporter was far from captivated: "Cliff Richard, pop superstar and hot gospeller, fervently preached a message to the converted. Unfortunately the message was hammered home between every song. He talks about his religious beliefs so much that I was bored beyond embarrassment. Why couldn't he just sing?" But then he delivered Elvis' "Heartbreak Hotel" and his own unforgettable early hit, "Living Doll" and just before the end really started rockin' up a storm with two heavy beat numbers, real vintage Richard rock 'n' roll, and all was forgiven.

So what do you remember?

Barnwell Junction station, alongside the Leper Chapel on Cambridge's Newmarket Road, seems the perfect model of a small Victorian railway station with its lacy wooden canopy and the initials of the Great Eastern Railway intertwined among the cast iron legs of its platform seats. It gives the impression of something built to last, something well preserved and still in perfect working order

At least it did 50 years ago in September 1960 when the News sent a reporter to take a look.

In those days it was the gateway to the Mildenhall line and a succession of small railway stations – Fen Ditton halt, Quy, Bottisham, Swaffham Prior, Burwell, Fordham and Isleham. The line had opened in June 1884 when four trains made the return journey each day with passengers conveyed either first, second or third-class in second-hand carriages.

For a while takings were steady – indeed in 1909 one robber even thought it worthwhile to burgle the Junction's ticket office. He entered the waiting room where he obtained a poker and forced the booking office window. After smashing the till he took cash and stamps before making his way to the stationmaster's office and helping himself to a meal of bread and cheese.

By 1960 things had changed. Peak period for passengers at Barnwell was just after eight-fifteen when the morning train from Mildenhall steamed in, sometimes picking up as many as eight or nine people to make the short commute into Cambridge. It returned at 4.43 – punctual to the minute. That was it as far as daily services went, although there was an extra return train on Saturdays and occasional Sunday excursions to Skegness or Yarmouth.

But it was the freight traffic which really mattered with the Junction handling as much as 30,000 tons of merchandise and minerals a year. Sugar beet, grain and potatoes from local farms, malt from the Barnwell Maltings together with scrap iron and materials from the railway's own engineering depot were shipped out whilst motor and diesel oil, fertiliser and seed grains came in.

Its one porter, Mr Bidwell, kept the platform swept and was also gardener, handyman and weekly replenisher of the oil lamps in the semaphore signals while Mr Heinrich looked after the booking officer and did the accounts.

Two signalmen, Mr Ellum and Mr Wright worked shifts to keep the signal box open till nine at night. Beyond the station outer platform stretched the main railroad from Cambridge to Chesterton where it divided with one line running off towards St Ives and another continuing to Ely and beyond. Up and down those main lines 180 trains passed daily, passenger and freight depending for their safety on the Barnwell signalmen.

The box itself was a period piece, a minor gem of Victorian engineering. Its windows reached almost to the floor, there was linoleum and pieces of carpet underfoot, a stove and wooden lockers worn smooth with time. It had a row of polished brass indicator dials, gongs and bells, polished wooden boxes with moving needles in them and 34 great signal levers moving with well-oiled efficiency in their cast-iron mountings.

Not everything went so smoothly. Tragedy had struck in January 1960 when the morning train from Mildenhall collided with a Great Ouse River Board lorry at a crossing between Worlington and Isleham. It had been twenty minutes late and the driver of the lorry probably never expected it, nor could he see through the steamed-up windows of his vehicle.

By then there was speculation about the line's future. If you lived on Newmarket Road and wanted parcels to be sent by rail, then this was the obvious place to bring them. But how many people would spend sixpence on a ride to Cambridge Station to arrive at 8.20 in the morning and then be faced with a further ride into the city.

Others argued that from Barnwell a wonderful world waited to be explored. The morning train was timed to connect up with the Fenman and with services to the north, to Clacton or even Hunstanton.

But it was not to last. In October 1961 there was talk of closure. Councillors were concerned about increased road congestion as people took to the roads instead of rail, but the passenger service was not covering its cost, let alone meeting the charges for maintaining the track.

The Junction station's days were numbered and the final passenger train made the journey from Mildenhall to Cambridge on the 16th June 1962. The line remained open for freight for a couple of years more before the track finally became silent. Since then many of the old village station buildings have disappeared or been converted into homes.

But did you use the Barnwell Junction station or the line that led through it. Have you a tale to tell?

Memories 1st November 2010, by Mike Petty

Winifred Stearn, (nee Oakett) has been reminiscing about life in the village of Hilton during the 1930s.

“The memory I shall always have of Hilton is the free and easy days of childhood, going anywhere in the fields (except when they were put down for hay), blackberrying, watching the sheep-dipping around the drift, iron hoops, tops and apple-scrumping: Ken Daws would ask Mr Fred Furniss if he could pick up the fallers from the ground, and of course he did not go on his own!

“I remember the lovely Sunday roast, cream teas (cream cheese, too, which was made by hanging the curds in a muslin cloth on a pipe outside to drip), the old folk next door sitting outside and pleased to talk to anyone going by, the great big horses going by with their loads of corn, manure and whatever the season dictated, children blowing bubbles with the clay pipes the farm workers used to smoke with.”

In those days most people had a garden where they grew their own vegetables and kept chickens, milk was brought from the farms and rabbits were free to be caught.

Winifred's father, Arthur Oakett, had been born in the village in 1877 but had left to join the army, serving twenty five years in the marines. He'd married and had nine children before he was widowed. Then when on the point of retiring in 1927 he heard that the shop in Graveley Way was up for sale. He bought it along with the cottage next door and moved the family back to Hilton where he set up as a grocer.

Win recalls the shop well: “We sold vinegar from a barrel, dates from a big block on the counter covered with muslin, dried fruits, sugar which had to be weighed, biscuits, sweets, tobacco, oranges, pickled onions, shoe-laces, cottons, pins, cheese, bacon, and skimmed milk from our two cows. There was also a cabinet of medicines for everyday ills: the brand name was Walfox “Later Dad took on the Post Office work, too, when the other shop found they could not cope with it. Often people came to the back door after we had closed down for the day or on Sunday mornings. On Sundays it was illegal to sell stamps.

“Those days some people would have goods ‘on tick’. They would send one of their children carrying a slip of paper with a few wants, then it would be recorded in a book and the mother would come in on Saturday and settle up along with the rest of her shopping. Sometimes they would pay up and leave some over for the next week. Often it got out of hand and became embarrassing. Of course if they moved away (‘flitted’) dad lost out altogether. Some customers lived in tithe cottages, so this could easily happen”.

Winifred's eldest brother was a trained boot and shoe repairer and as boots and shoes were all leather those days he was kept busy. He also dealt with the horses' harnesses and farmers' leggings.

Hilton was largely self-sufficient. It had three public houses: the White Horse and the Prince of Wales at the top of the High Street and the Old George in Graveley Way. This was a real country inn, always a lovely fire for the men in the evenings, and a very popular feast at week ends and other holiday times. The publican was Mr Tyler.

The blacksmith was Mr Rule, Mr White was the village baker supplying the entire village with bread and employing a boy to go round with regular orders. The bake house was at the back of Park Villa facing the green: the smell was enough to whet one's appetite and after he had done for the day the ladies could bake their fruit cakes in his ovens.

The butcher was a Mr Furniss who sold lovely joints of meat, mostly beef. The Oaketts used to have a big joint for Sunday, the remains of which were eaten cold on Monday (wash day) and then made into cottage pie or rissoles for Tuesday using a hand mincer clamped to the table.

In those days there were no dust carts and household rubbish was buried. Winifred remembers: “We had a big hole dug in the field next to our house, which has now been built on. One of the houses in Graveley Way now has this rubbish pit dug deep into the garden. The owner wondered why his tree would not grow, until we explained. Down there are old teapots, ginger beer bottles, glass bottles with marbles in them, tin boxes, old saucepans and all sorts of things. As we owned a shop, some fairly unusual things were put down there. Other people would sometimes ask if they could put their things in it. Guess there are quite a few bygones down there”.

Valerie Pinto encouraged her mother to set down these fascinating memories: do you have similar recollections of other local villages that we can share?

Memories 8th November 2010, by Mike Petty

Roger Cork from Stretham has lent me a photograph he found in a charity shop. We know when it was taken for it carries the date 6th April 1946 – which was a Saturday.

We also know it shows Cambridge, though how many will recognise just where?

Roger does for he grew up in the area and has supplied notes on what it was like at that time.

In the centre is Lichfield Road bending around to join Coleridge Road. Coming in from the left are Neville and Cowper Road with Coniston Road beyond.

There were very few cars in the street that Saturday although Perne Road had been constructed in 1932 as part of a ring road that became a casualty of the war. Houses had been advertised for sale in September 1933 when they’d been described as well-built and in an attractive position on the beautifully-made new ring road. Prices varied from £690 to £710 and homes could be acquired for £50 down, paying off the balance at £1 weekly. The CDN had carried pictures of the new estate on the front page of its paper of 3rd October 1935 among headlines chronicling the developing crisis in Europe.

The new houses had generous plots which the aerial view shows that many new owners had cultivated to eke out wartime rations.

There was however nowhere to drink. The vacant plot opposite had been purchased by Tollemache Breweries in 1937 but it was to be 1959 before The Weathervane public house opened, the first to be built to serve new Cambridge housing estates. Around 2,500 new houses had gone up in the area since 1936 accommodating about 9,500 professional and working people. It was a respectable middle-class area and undergraduates would not be tempted to enter it, the brewery had convinced magistrates. The pub was designed as the sort of place one could bring a family for a pleasant drink with its bright contemporary decorations, skirting heating and low fireplaces. Nobody knew why the name had been chosen and it has since changed to The Mariner.

By 1946 the War had ended and returning soldiers needed somewhere to restart their lives.

Prefabricated houses were constructed to try and relieve a massive post-war housing shortage. It is these which dominate the centre of the photograph on the newly-constructed Lichfield Road.

Intended for only short duration, they became part of the city scene for many years. A social committee was set up which organised a fete and sports on Lichfield Road recreation ground in July 1950. Attractions included a miniature railway, Punch & Judy show, treasure hunt, bran tub & a mother and father's race. The highlight of the proceedings was a tug-of-war between the "Lichfield Peacocks" and the "Golding Canaries".

But the picture shows reminders of the conflict that had ended just a year or so ago. The nearby dark Nissen hutted buildings were Government Emergency Food Stores which were guarded twenty-four hours a day.

During the war a pill box on the corner of Hartington Grove had defended the junction of Cherry Hinton and Coleridge Roads.

Coleridge Road had appeared for the first time in the Spalding's Cambridge Directory of 1924-25. It was constructed of reinforced concrete after Jesus College had acquired the route of the old Newmarket Railway and developed what they called the Station Building Estate. They offered freehold land in open and healthy surroundings, with ample garden ground at prices from £225 to £250

By 1946 there were significant buildings on the east side of Coleridge Road including the National Fire Service Station which after the war was used as a garage for Civil Service cars with about 20 Vauxhall Wyverns that had to be taken back every evening.

Beyond, on the corner of Golding Road, was a static water tank that became an unofficial swimming pool for Roger and the other youngsters. They defended their home territory with frequent fights between the Cherry Hinton Roaders and invading groups of youngsters from Mill Road. The battlefield was the old allotments across the road, an area that was also being fought over by the corporation anxious to obtain it for use as a housing site. Now it is occupied by Sterne Close

But what can you see that jogs a memory?

Memories 15th November 2010, by Mike Petty

As the long winter nights roll in once more, one issue facing young people is how to spend their time. Trapped in their centrally-heated bedrooms surrounded by technical wizardry of games console, computer and i-pod it must be difficult to know what to do next

But how did youngsters amuse themselves in the 60's in rural Cambridgeshire.

Fifty years ago in November 1965 youngsters at Bourn congregated at a youth centre in an old RAF hut. On Monday and Thursday evenings 15-21 year-olds made their way on foot, motor-cycle or car while buses they had organised for themselves toured neighbouring places like Haslingfield, Eversden and Comberton to bring more kids in. On a good night as many as 90 boys and girls turned up.

The building had been successively an officers' mess, a YMCA and a primary school, each of which had left its mark. There was a communal lounge-hall with a fire around which youngsters enjoyed a drink – cups of tea and chocolate biscuits together with home-made wine made by some of the girls. There was a semi-quiet room where the skiffle group practiced, a room for the motor cycle and sports car group and outside workshops equipped with wood-working tools.

They had talks from footballers, from a Pye engineer who gave a demonstration of stereophonic sound and answered questions for hours, from a beauty expert who spoke to the girls about cultivating their appearance. And there were weekly film shows using a projector lent by local bachelor Captain Hudson, some of them home-made using the Captain's cine camera.

The atmosphere was of ease and leisure, of pleasant untidiness, of people standing around enjoying themselves. Its success was down to the club leader who lived in the village. He had plans for a camp in the Lake District and a four-day Continental holiday. But there were concerns for the future of the old RAF building and for what would happen to such clubs when the personalities who had established them decided that the time had come to retire to their own firesides

There was a similar club that year in the isolated Fenland village of Wicken. Apart from the occasional visit of a travelling fair there was little to occupy youngsters. On a cold winter night, the windows of the Hall were almost the only glow within sight, the record-player the only sound. Thursday nights, Youth Club nights, were looked forward to with enthusiasm. Powerful motor cycles stood parked in the dark outside, their owners playing table tennis and miniature billiards.

There was a darts board, a stove, a canteen hatch and a very few girls sitting in a group. The record player standing on the platform at the end of the room played 'pop' songs. There were visits from undergraduates who gave informal lectures, classes on ballroom dancing or debates on topics such as 'The girl that I marry must be ...' in which the lads ranked such attributes as 'passionate', 'a good dancer' or 'kind to mother-in-law'

The Wicken club had 21 members, only four of whom were girls. Most of the boys worked on the land, a few were still at school. There was nothing else for them in the village and just the cinema and dance hall in Soham.

It was organised through the Village College. The club leader, a man in slacks and pullover, with a whistle on a cord round his neck, was trying to encourage support of the older people like the schoolteacher and parson. But parents were reluctant to let their daughters attend because of a previous bad reputation the club had gained.

In our village of Stretham there was a youth club organised by the rector in the church hall. We too had the table tennis, record player and talks and for a while it flourished. But then a grand new extension was opened. It was heated by overhead electric fires rather than the old coke stove, it was bigger – too big, and brighter – too bright. And the atmosphere disappeared. Or so it seemed to me.

What were your experiences?

EXTRA STORY IF NEEDED – OTHERWISE I'LL USE IT NEXT WEEK

Recent Memories articles have sparked recollections for various readers.

James Faircliffe writes: Your article on Barnwell Junction brought back some interesting memories. I used the Cambridge-Mildenhall line quite often in the 1950s when I needed to get between Burwell and London. One particular incident at Barnwell Junction has always stayed in my mind.

I was travelling on the early train from Burwell to Cambridge to make the onward connection to Liverpool Street. As you say, the Mildenhall - Cambridge early train was designed to connect with the Fenman, British Railway's crack morning express, and woe betide those responsible if this prestigious train ran late. But on this occasion our little train was running about fifteen minutes late.

Nonetheless the Barnwell signalman was not going to allow the Mildenhall Line passengers to miss their Fenman connection. As our train arrived at Barnwell, where we joined the main line from Ely to Cambridge, I saw the august Fenman - which had been on time - ignominiously standing at its signal which was firmly at 'danger'.

As the branch-line passengers entered the train in their usual leisurely manner it was obvious that the Fenman was unhappy at being delayed: the unscheduled stop had allowed the pressure to build up and it was showing its displeasure by vigorously blowing off steam.

However this did not impress the Mildenhall train driver, who, having been given the 'right away', sidled out of the station onto the main line and proceeded gently towards Cambridge.

Now, the signalling was such that, for safety reasons, the Mildenhall train had to clear the 'section' of track ahead before the Barnwell signalman could allow the Fenman to proceed, further extending its delay.

The final insult to the Fenman was that the Mildenhall train came into Cambridge to the same platform as the Fenman needed, making it wait at the station outskirts while the Mildenhall train was shunted off. So I caught my London Connection, and the 'Fenman's pomposity was somewhat dented.

AE. Disbrey - NOTE – I HOPE TO BE ABLE TO GIVE YOU THE CHRISTIAN NAME BEFORE PUBLICATION - from Cambridge writes:

“My mother, Margaret Northrop, was born in 1894, the third child in a family of six girls and two boys. They lived in a small house at Harston, one in a row of twelve. It had a living room with a large walk-in pantry, the stairs went straight up into the front bedroom which then led to the second bedroom. There was no back door, just a small front garden with a bucket privy.

“How did they all manage? As soon as they were old enough, 13, the children went off to live in domestic service. Two girls went to London, one to Shrewsbury where she married the son of a former Mayor. One son went off as a boot boy at a local big house and my mother went to Letchworth.

“At the end of 1904 there was a prolonged period of cold weather. The ground was frozen hard and for my grandfather, who worked on a farm, there was no work. In those days it was ‘No work, No pay’. He applied to the Guardians who offered him some money but said that the family would have to go into the workhouse. This was considered a great disgrace, and grand dad decided that they would manage somehow. So it was sparrow pie for Christmas. They were more numerous then, mother recalled, and were easy to catch but the devil to pluck.

“After that things seemed to improve for the family. Grandfather started up a carrier's cart business. He had a flat top wagon and horse doing local carting and running in to Cambridge twice a week to do people's shopping. We have a wedding photograph when one daughter married in 1913 showing him in a bowler hat, Grand ma dressed up and six bridesmaids with big Edwardian hats.

“Things went downhill later. Grandfather liked a drink or two and when he died in 1926 the family were hard up again. Like others of her generation, my mother had the life-long fear of the workhouse. When she was getting frail in her 80's she would say ‘You won't let them put me in the workhouse, will you’, although the workhouses had long since gone. One daughter died in her 50's but all the others lived until well into their 80's, and one reached 94. So perhaps sparrow pie for Xmas didn't do too much harm!”

Sparrows were a pest in the early years of the 1900s and villages organised Sparrow Clubs to encourage their extermination: that at Great Chesterford killed 2,845 in 1927. An article in ‘The Boy's Friend, a monthly journal’ issued in 1866 gave hints as to their capture as did various books on field sports. The young birds once skinned and cooked were a welcome addition to frugal diets and until the time of the Great War sparrow pie was a regular item in many rural areas. The birds were bonier than the boniest fish but what little meat there was was good and they made a rich and nourishing gravy

More memories of sparrow pie are included on a film DVD entitled 'Common Ground' that tells the story of Victorian fen life in all its aspects, harsh, funny and bleak. One of the poignant scenes is that of the old folk, too frail to work in the fields who were condemned to wait alongside the babies under the hedges until the day was done. The film was produced by The Field Theatre Group based in Littleport and features a cast of local folk and recollections of local people. It is a remarkable production that would prove a welcome addition to the stocking of anybody with a DVD player. It costs just £10, plus postage from thefieldtheatregroup@hotmail.co.uk

Mary Perry emails: Memories flooded back when I read your article on what young people did fifty years ago. I remember going to Bourn Youth Club a few times, but I was eleven in 1960 so it would have been later. The thing that interested me was your mention of Captain Hudson. I grew up in Caldecote, off the main road near Hardwick Woods. Captain Hudson lived further along from us so I knew him well. He was eccentric in our eyes but very kind and would help in any way he could, he was very involved with village matters. My mother told me he had been educated at one of the top schools in the country. On one occasion he let us young teenagers camp out in his field, also he used to teach us ways of 'surviving in the wild', how to make fires without matches etc.

What did we do otherwise? Well, we spent a good deal of time in the woods and I knew it like the back of my hand. In the winter months, twice a week, Mr Oddy came to the village hall and showed films. I remember watching A Town Like Alice with my mum and brother. As we got older and had cycles we would go around the villages to see friends from school, in the holidays we earned extra money fruit or potato picking. A very simple life!"

There was also the occasional visit from a travelling fair – John Carter snapped a picture of Caldecote youngsters with the coconut shy man in August 1954.

Memories 29th November 2010 by Mike Petty

Christmas is a time when for making contact with old friends and remembering times gone by. Charlotte Jordan from Oakington has been rereading a letter from abroad that arrived at her former home in St Ives many years ago.

Her father, John Harrison, was a basket maker and willow-grower at Filberts Walk and during the war quite a few Italian and German prisoners-of war were billeted with the family. Although enemies they became great friends. Charlotte remembers the thick winter coats they made for the family, their hand-made rag rugs about the house and the letters that they sent after their repatriation to their home country

The Italians especially were very jolly, always singing very loudly at Mass on Sundays. They took long walks in the afternoon to Fenstanton, Holywell or the Common at Hemingford Abbots. Although too young to have personal memories she recalls local people saying how much they missed them.

The family treasure one letter, dated February 1946 written by the Italians just before they went home.

“Before we leave it is our duty to thank you for all your past kindnesses. Really we are unable to explain all our gratitude for all you have done for us. We are sure we will never forget the years we spend with you. Really we don’t know what we are feeling on leaving you, but we are happy to think that now we are finally on the way back to our own country. On this occasion we want to wish you and your family all the best. Hoping that in the coming future, when many things will be changed, you will remember and forgive us if we have done any thing wrong”. It was signed by Carlo Pavesi, Mario Pazi and Zepito Pesseri. They posed for a snap before they left together with another of their countrymen, Desiderio

The Germans remained somewhat longer and many played a vital role during the great floods of 1947, an incident recalled by another snap. In a letter, now crumbling to pieces, Johann Schroder, told of his experiences after the ship that finally took him home left Harwich for the Hook of Holland

“The sea was very raw and I feed the fishes three times. We arrived at the transit camp Munsterlager. There we must stay for four days. Our nerves were nearly finished, you will understand that. The food was very bad, I could not eat it. The journey went on and I arrived home in my village of Tondorf just before 12 o’clock pm. My people were well and they were very happy to see me again. I work in summer and autumn on my sister’s farm till I married on the 20th of November. My sister where I live with got that time a very bad sickness”.

Johann then seeks information about his former hosts. “How is your family? How are the workmen? Is St Ives still the same place as it is when I live it. Tell me please the news from there. I can’t forget England and the lovely place St Ives. I always remember the grateful family Harrison. I thank you very much for all that what you have done for me. I never felt like a prisoner when I was with you. Please don’t look after the mistakes in this letter, it is the first which I write in English. With the best greetings to you and your family, your father, Margaret, Walter and the other workmen, Mrs Walls, Mrs Daniels and their family”

Do you have mementoes of German or Italian prisoners of war?

Doris Wright of Cambridge recalls the immediate post-war days in Cambridge and the importance of prefabs such as those in Lichfield Road. “My husband and I lived there from 1951 to 1963. He was allocated a prefab because he had been in Papworth Hospital for two years and Dr Phillips, one of the head doctors at the Shire Hall, was allocated 10 per year for people coming out of hospital. It was a lovely road to live in. Food was still rationed but on Sundays a crowd would get together and we would share out what we had. So many lovely memories”

Michael Knights was a neighbour. He lived at no.118 Lichfield Road from 1953 to 1958 and recalls: “I went to Morley Memorial School and along with children from Lichfield Road and Golding Road attended the very large 500+ strong Sunday School at the Cherryhinton Road Congregational (now United Reformed) Church. Lichfield Road was a very friendly place, neighbours looked out for each other”. Mike also tells me that he was one of the audience in 1976 when Cliff Richard gave the concert at Lady Mitchell Hall that I featured in Memories on 18th October. He was part of the Youth Group at Arbury Road Baptist Church and biked there. In October 1977 Cliff gave another concert at the Kelsey Kerridge Sports Hall when his backing band was Dave Pope and the Athenians. Both were great and very enjoyable, he recalls

Snow in winter? Whatever next!

Extremes of weather always make headlines at the time - and are then forgotten.

Many Christmas cards will carry views of stagecoaches stuck in the snow, a reminder of the great storm of 1836 when snow, almost unparalleled in living memory and accompanied by a severe wind from the north-nor-east caused drifts so big as to form impenetrable masses. The road from London to Cambridge was completely stopped up and many passengers were stranded at Puckeridge. There every bed had been taken and upwards of forty people were compelled to pass the night as comfortably as possible on chairs at the Bell Inn.

The Lynn Union coach from London had finally forced its way into Cambridge some 22 hours late. Even then the journey had only been possible by taking the horses off the coach and driving them through the snow to beat out a track for men to clear. By the time it had reached Barkway the snow had been level with the top of the coach yet the men who should have been clearing the roads were snug and warm in the Wagon and Horses at Barley refusing to work until they were paid.

Even so, old men contended, it had not been as bad as the January of 1814 when the whole country, from Land's End to the Highlands of Scotland had been blanketed in a dreary, deep expanse of white.

Nobody now recalls the very great frost of 1895 which lasted from January to March, the heavy snow of April 1908, or 1916 when trainee soldiers fought snowball fights with townspeople on Parker's Piece

Then there was 1927 when snow began to fall on Christmas day & led to most complete stoppage of road & rail traffic since the coming of motor car. Many of the main roads in the county were blocked with snowdrifts from six to ten feet deep. Trains, motor buses and cars were held up and travellers stranded. The wheels of the mail vans were equipped with chains with the result that hold-ups were uncommon, though one van on the Histon – Milton road had to be dug out.

The Ortona motor buses had a terrible time in the blizzard. Two got trapped in snowdrifts out Newmarket way, another near Teversham corner, a Willingham-bound vehicle got stuck near the Five Bells on the Huntingdon Road, a Caxton bus ground to a halt near Toft and passengers for Saffron Walden were stranded near Whittlesford station. Another bus got nearly to Sawston before it had to be dug out while the Fulbourn service could only get as far as the Robin Hood at Cherry Hinton.

In early 1947 the snow seemed as if it would never stop, reaching up to touch telegraph wires. All roads to Ely were impassable as drifts piled ten and twelve feet high brought road traffic to a standstill. But children rejoiced in freedom from school and indulged in tobogganing, snowball fights and building snowmen Villages cut off by snow included Elsworth with waist-high drifts in the village street. When the thaw finally came it came quickly and melting snow, further diluted with heavy rains, caused extensive flooding.

We forget the heavy falls of January 1962, but probably not the great blanket of snow which started at the end of the year. For this was the great freeze. Until the end of December Cambridge – like now - felt itself fortunate to escape the worst of the weather that was sweeping the rest of the country. But it was not to last. By January 1st 1963 drifts up to seven feet deep meant the city was cut off for the first time in living memory.

Temperatures remained below freezing for days and the River Cam froze, prompting skaters in their hundreds and cyclists by the score to turn out on to the river. By 20th January Cambridge police station was turned into a temporary boarding home to accommodate 15 people cut off by blizzards. Two days later the temperature was 32 degrees below freezing. Next day the city's water mains froze and fuel supplies of all types were under pressure. A brief thaw saw Parker's Piece turned into a lake, quickly turning into a skating rink when it froze again. The bitter conditions continued throughout February with air frost on 27 nights and the Lent bumps were cancelled for the first time in 136 years. It was March 6th before spring-like weather arrived with temperatures soaring into the 60's.

In January 1977 heavy snow hit again as the worst weather for 14 years caused nationwide chaos and led to wide scale disruption on the roads and railways. Thousands of people were late for work as hard-packed snow, freezing fog and black ice made driving treacherous. Many trains were late or cancelled despite an all-night fight against the Arctic conditions by British Rail who called in their full cold weather emergency procedures.

Two years later in January 1979 the Botanic Garden recorded 4½ [FOUR AND A HALF] inches of snow – the biggest fall since 1963. The situation was compounded by a strike of municipal workers. Ungritted icy roads produced a nightmare tangle of cars and lorries which choked all main roads into the city for up to three hours in the worst traffic chaos for decades. Dozens of car drivers abandoned their vehicles and walked into work while thousands of schoolchildren waited in vain for buses which failed to get further than the road outside the bus depot. The traffic only began to move again when council workers broke picket lines outside the Mill Road depot and brought gritting lorries back into action.

It all seems too familiar, the same old stories time after time. Probably by the time these Memories appear we shall already have started to forget last week!

But which winter do you recall?

Memories 13th December by Mike Petty

Peter Sumner from Cambridge is looking for information on an interesting potted meat container he discovered in an antique shop. The circular ceramic pot is stamped 'Finest Quality Home Made Potted Meat. Sturton Brothers, Cambridge'

A little research shows the firm was established in Fitzroy Street in 1839 by Joseph Sturton who ran it for 40 years before passing it on to other members of his family.

After his retirement Joseph devoted his time to public service. An ardent Liberal, he was elected to the Borough and County Councils. One of the main issues of the day was the housing of the working classes and about 1868 he bought a large plot of ground. Rather than develop it himself he made small plots available to working people, allowing them to pay off the cost in instalments of as low as a sovereign. In less than five years the whole of the land he'd purchased had been sold off and 'Sturton Town' was part the Cambridge landscape

Meanwhile the shop in Fitzroy Street was experiencing exciting times. One night in September 1898 people living nearby were startled by a loud crash and discovered that one of the shop windows had smashed. Investigations showed that number of hams and cheeses had been stored in the window and one had become dislodged. It rolled down into the glass, completely wrecking the window and fell out onto the street. Police and remained on guard until Mr Sturton arrived and had the window boarded up.

Then in July 1902 the firm was summonsed to the Old Bailey Central Criminal Court under the Official Secrets Act. Richard Sturton testified that they had tendered to supply meat and vegetable rations for the War Office. Having been successful they'd delivered the goods and submitted their bill. Shortly afterwards they received a letter from a clerk in the Supply Depot at Woolwich Dockyard who'd offered to supply details of the prices being quoted by rival firms. This would enable Sturton's to increase their tendered sums, earning hundreds of pounds extra. In exchange the clerk requested ten percent of the profit.

But the Sturton family was not one to indulge in such practices. Richard went straight to the Cambridge Chief Constable and, following his advice, started a correspondence that ensured the clerk ended up in the dock where he was found guilty.

Next year there was more excitement: In February 1903 thousands of Cambridge people witnessed the spectacle of a fire at Laurie and McConnal's in Fitzroy Street. Despite the valiant attempts of the fire brigade, cheered on by the crowds, Laurie's was destroyed. But Sturton's shop next door was saved from the blaze.

Then in October 1907 history the shop was again fortunate after fire broke out in the back yard of their shop close to a number of paraffin barrels and tanks containing oil. Fortunately the blaze was quickly spotted by William Meeks of Maid's Causeway who climbed over the wall and opened the gates from the inside, allowing others to attack the flames while they awaited the arrival of the brigade.

Joseph Sturton died in November 1910 but the business continued to trade in Fitzroy Street until the 1950s – do you remember them

Peter Sumner had travelled all the way out to Norman Cross near Peterborough where I was speaking on the site of a Prisoner of War Camp where thousands of Frenchmen were incarcerated during the Napoleonic War. En route some of them were held overnight in a lofty thatched barn in Shelley Row, Cambridge. It was later occupied by a blacksmith, Henry Herring Smith who could clearly remember the French prisoners using it as a resting-place. He recalled that they made dominoes and dice out of bones which they sold to people as curios. The barn was demolished in October 1909.

Similar memories have been sparked by a recent article on Italian Prisoners of War during the Second World War.

Stephen Bull from Bar Hill recalls: One such camp on the outskirts of Elsworth housed Italian PoWs who were employed by local farmers. They were not renowned for hard work, preferring to sit around and watch other people do the jobs! Despite their reputation my father, John Bull, developed a good rapport while working with them on Church Farm in Boxworth. The Italians used to engage in craft work making useful objects and toys from odd pieces of available material which came to hand. They gave my father a delightful wooden toy dog (a 'Spotty-Dick') for his two children, one of the few toys we possessed during the War"

Paddy James emails: My mother and I moved to The Lane, Hauxton for a year in the early 1940s. We walked through flower meadows to the Mill and paddled and picnicked by the river - now the scene of that awful pollution. My mother wasn't very happy with the school and we moved to a big house on Newmarket Road in Royston, where she was housekeeper to the Misses Langton. I carefully carried home their egg ration from the shop one day, put them safely on a chair and then sat on the chair to change my shoes - oh dear! I fled to the comfort of the baby goats from a rather cross mum. We used to get a lift on a cart to Cambridge from Hauxton. As we drove we passed prisoners of war - I thought they were Italian - in brown uniforms behind a wire fence - they used to smile and wave at us

Memories 20 December 2010 by Mike Petty

Jason Prociuk has emailed for information about an ancient engraving of King's College chapel, a building very prominent at this time of year with its famous service of lessons and carols

He has acquired a piece of Irish linen on which is printed a view entitled 'Kings College & part of Clare Hall in the University of Cambridge'

The artist was Peter Spendlowe Lamborn an engraver and miniature painter who was born in Cambridge in 1722. He studied engraving in London then returned to his home town where he married Mary, daughter of Hitch Wale of Little Shelford, with whom he had three sons and a daughter. Both Mary and Peter exhibited at the Society of Artists in London to which he was elected fellow in 1771.

The view that Jason has is a copy of one of four originally published by subscription in December 1765. The price at that time was fourteen shillings, to be paid in stages as the work was completed. Non-subscribers would pay four shillings more.

Lamborn produced another view that is more interesting. It shows the old bridge of King's College which was removed as part of the landscaping of the Backs in 1819. Instead of the present lawns sloping down to the river there was a high wall rising sheer from the water. These were lowered in 1775 when the stone gateway shown to the east end of the bridge was replaced by an iron gate.

A line of barges is shown making its way towards Mill Pool. With so many bridges to pass under the bargee could not hoist the sail and as there was no path along the bank the towing horse is having to wade down the middle of the river. The cargo was probably coal and on arrival at Silver Street there would be gangs of men anxious to earn a penny or two by hoping to unload the fuel into the riverside coalyard, now part of Darwin College.

Such supplies were essential to keep the college chimneys smoking during winter weather. But during periods of prolonged cold the fenland rivers would freeze, trapping the barges in the ice and leading to a fuel shortage similar to that being experienced by heating oil customers this year. And the men who depended on casual work had no income, adding to the harshness of the season.

Peter Lamborn issued various other topographical illustrations including a view of Chesterton church from the river. His biggest job was to engrave most of the 48 plates in a History of Ely Cathedral by James Bentham which was published in 1771. In one of these he depicts the Lady Chapel with the rest of the cathedral removed – thus saving himself hours of painstaking work engraving the adjacent wall.

At his death in Cambridge on 6th November 1774 Lamborn was living in Free School Lane though his wife and children were settled on the farm that he had purchased at Little Shelford. He was buried two days later at Great St Mary's, Cambridge

May Tiplady from Histon has written to share her memories of wartime prisoners. At that time she lived on a Chivers estate out in the fens. It was a small community accessed by a private road with its own shop, school and chapel. The nearest doctor was at Lakenheath about four miles off.

May recalls: "I was quite young when the first Italian prisoners of war were bussed in to work on the land. They had a double-decker and we watched out for it at the end of the day, standing in our gateway to wave and call out 'Hello'. The bus never stopped but they made and gave us presents. There was a big elder bush opposite our house and they tied string onto the gifts and hung them in the bush as they passed. I still have a chalk boot they made with a lizard lying across the front of it.

"Later in the war we had a group of German Pows who lived in a remote farmhouse on the estate. They looked after themselves and were provided with food, tobacco and supplies but were not allowed to have money. Each year the Sunday School went all round the estate carol singing. Although the farmhouse where the Germans lived was some way away from the nearest house and along a rutted cart track it was decided we should go and sing to them. So, leaving our bikes but taking our torches, we all set off to walk a good half-mile.

"We sang two carols which they came out to hear. There were 12-14 men and one who spoke English said they were sorry they had no money but they would sing to us. They sang 'Silent Night' in German, in harmony. It sounded lovely.

"It was a perfect setting, a quiet still frosty starlight night and it is something I will never forget. When I hear that carol now I always think of them"

John Carter from Cambridge has lent me a picture of carol singers that was taken in the very early 1960s. Do you recognise anybody?

Memories 27 December 2010, by Mike Petty

Boxing Day 1910 was devoted to sport.

There were good crowds for the Cambridge Town and Cambridge United Football matches and the Cambridge Whippet Racing Club meeting was also well patronised.

But for many the highlight was provided by the Cambridge Costermongers

These were the men who sold fish, fruit, vegetables or poultry from barrows. As a class they were noted for their general improvidence, pugnacity and love of gambling. Victorians had commented on their total want of education, their disregard for lawful marriage ceremonies and their ability to 'swear like a costermonger'.

Boxing Day was the time to reflect another side to their character.

This was the day that saw Newmarket Road and the neighbourhood in holiday mood and the whole population of the district turned out en masse to watch husbands, brothers, sons or friends distinguish themselves.

Quite when the tradition of the Costermonger's Marathon Race to Bottisham and back started is uncertain. But today it is a tradition that seems to have disappeared from memory

The rules were simple: each competitor had to wheel a costermonger's barrow from the corner of East Road to the Swan public house Bottisham and back, a distance of nearly 13 miles.

In 1910 some 15 competitors lined up and with the previous year's winner Sam George now acting as a judge, the favourite was Tom Nunn.

Tom was strong in the opening stretch and before the Paper Mills were reached he was forging his way to the front closely followed by Ben Warren. By the new Cemetery at the corner of Ditton Lane he was in the lead and setting a cracking pace. Nunn then kept up a continual unbroken trot until he had a lead of nearly a quarter of a mile as he passed Quy church. By the time he got to the Swan at Bottisham he appeared as fresh as ever.

On the return route he met other runners, less fit or less impetuous, some struggling along gamely. They were being urged – or jeered on – by spectators. "Yer won't do it", one boy told a perspiring coster, "yer can't train on beer". One of the more colourful characters known as 'Black Sam' stuck to his task though he never looked like a winner.

But out at the front there was drama. Tom Nunn had over-estimated his staying powers and began to flag badly before half the homeward journey was completed. Ben Warren passed him somewhere between Quy church and the Teversham turning before showing a turn of speed that it was impossible for Tom to match. At the Cemetery he gave up the struggle and rode home on a passing vehicle.

From then on Warren was so far ahead that he could go as he pleased, completing the course in the record time of one hour, forty-four minutes.

Second home was J. Smith followed by J. Pilman and then a man named Kelly. Each was awarded a cash prize ranging from 25 shillings down to half-a-crown, the fourth man took a special prize of goods to the value of five shillings, given by Messrs Walker and Sons.

All the other competitors who finished within 45 minutes of the winner's time also took home two-and six, so Messrs Chilvers, Bourn, S. Melopop, G. Carter, Esau James, Sanfield and B.J. Adams had some reward for their effort.

But Ted Nunn did not go home empty-handed. Although he never completed the course he received two special prizes of five shillings given by Charles Hunter and Mr Preston to the first man reaching Quy church and Bottisham Swan.

The main beneficiary was Addenbrooke's Hospital for collections made at the start and along the route raised nearly three guineas for their funds

Ben Warren was obviously proud of his achievement and. posed for a photograph along with the other costermongers. Twenty-five years later he sent the picture to the Cambridge Daily News who published it as a reminder of past days. By then Ben was one of the few left alive and the race itself had died out with the coming of the Great War.

But do you have mementoes of the costers and their marathon?

Memories 3rd January 2011 by Mike Petty

I was sitting watching television the other evening when my eye was caught by a light in the sky. I watched as a flaming ball drifted from beyond the trees opposite. It was followed at intervals by three or four others. The mysterious apparitions were Chinese lanterns launched from a villager's Christmas party, simple but strange

On New Years Eve 1910 people flocked to the centre of Cambridge to watch other lights. Amongst them was a News correspondent whose prose captured the spirit of the occasion and related the same old events that had been reported for almost a century. It deserves to be reprinted 100 years later

People began to arrive on King's Parade at about 11.30. Some of them came from the Theatre, others from parties and dances. It was really quite an ordinary night, but there seemed to be a new atmosphere, an atmosphere of increased good-fellowship and sincerity.

There was a time when steaming punch was the staple diet on such a night, but either the making of it is lost or the secret is applied by very few. But wassail of a modern sort there must be. A glass (or glasses) in the old year has a wonderful way of linking up memories and good things when cemented by a glass (or two) in the New. And so many a pocket on King's Parade bulged with a small something-or-other, or hid, until the proper moment should come, a flask imprisoning a spirited old fellow called Johnnie.

Not so much as a gramophone lent a cheery sound to the still night but the ardour of youth tires hard. It struck some bright lad that he would be nearer the show end of the rockets if he climbed the blind stays fixed to a shop on the 'K.P.' His example was followed by his companions and the blind, resenting their behaviour, swung out its arms and landed the passengers on the ground once more

The life of 1910 ebbed slowly out. It died precisely at midnight, peacefully and without the tears that marked the last days of its old age. The air was crisp and exhilarating. It was a healthy time for the arrival of the New Year

Ten minutes before the new Ambassador of Time was expected the bells of Great St Mary's Church pealed out their insistent ding-dongs which echoed away over the house tops and round and round the alleys and courts.

In the last second of 1910 there was a faint hiss, and a long stem of golden light shot suddenly into the sky. Straight up it went, and when it had grown to its full height it flowered, bursting into a cluster of beautiful stars. Before it had faded a louder hiss had signalled the departure of the second rocket. "Whish" sang the flaming herald of another year as it flew higher and higher into the air. And then it seemed to light a star hung between heaven and earth that sailed away, trailing with it three more stars, in bridal colours, changing in hue as they drifted away.

There was much cheering, the sound of which floated out on the still night air to the watchers in the suburbs, and hearty congratulations and good wishes were exchanged. The ceremony and the cheering over, bed was the only immediate sequel. The year was dead and life was leased to his successor for a year

But sadly in his excitement the reporter forgot to record just what he had witnessed

The tradition of setting off two rockets from the space in front of King's College dated back to 1815 when Isaiah Deck, a chemist, had decided to it would be an appropriate way to celebrate victory at the Battle of Waterloo. It was repeated as a way of marking the New Year by three generations of the Deck family until 1913 after which it was banned during the Great War. It did not restart.

The News pressed for its return: "there are many losses we could submit to with less regret than the loss of the rockets and the abandonment of a celebration which was based on good fellowship", it lamented.

In 1922 the custom was revived but it was thought no longer safe to use Kings Parade for the launch and the ceremony was transferred to Parker's Piece. That year a thousand people assembled to watch the rockets. But it was not quite the same atmosphere, numbers dropped off as people found other attractions such as dances on New Year's Eve. So it was that 1929 arrived uncelebrated by any rockets and one of the most celebrated of Cambridge customs fizzled out.

At last people could sleep peacefully in their beds. [SCAN]

This Monday should be a red-letter day in Stretham.

For our village Post Office is expecting its first post-Christmas delivery of second-class stamps. If they arrive we can at last despatch those thank-you letters for any slightly-disappointing presents received from Auntie Flo. Instead we've had to buy a first-class stamp and ask the Post Office to take their time over delivering it.

Paradoxically in the old days, when letters were the essential means of communication, a post office without stamps would not have presented too much of a problem.

For at the bottom of Red Lion Street – subsequently renamed 'Chapel Street' at a time that the Parish Council was dominated by Methodists - there was a small shop run with a sign on the wall announcing that it was licensed to sell postage stamps, thus saving customers the long plod up the hill. The sign was shown in a picture taken during the floods of 1912 and remained long after the shop had closed down in 1963

There was another way of paying for postage. For outside the Post Office itself there used to be two machines that dispensed stamps if you deposited the appropriate coins in the slot.

Such machines were once quite common. But when did they start?

Certainly when Buntingford's new post office opened in April 1929 it was hailed as the most up-to-date of its kind in Hertfordshire with automatic stamp machines that were lighted at night by electric strips. They were still going in 1966 for the new Post Office in Ely had a number when it opened that October. A photo in the News Library shows similar machines outside the Post Office in Newmarket – do you recognise any of the people queuing?

Sadly the technology did not always work properly – something a News reporter discovered way back in March 1925: 'The stamp machine attached to the door of the General Post Office in Petty Cury, Cambridge is such a boon that I hesitate to complain. But on no fewer than five occasions I have found the penny slot fail to act correctly. On the first occasion the machine delivered me two penny stamps for one copper. I was wondering what to do when another purchaser came along and slipped a penny in the slot without result, so I handed one over. The next time I received no stamp for my penny, and wiped that off as a loss. On the third occasion I got two stamps for the price of one, so cried "quits". For those who like a little speculation these stamp machines are ideal'

The problem had not been resolved by October 1933 as a correspondent complained: "Sir – needing a stamp for a letter I hied down to the G.P.O. feeling certain its automatic machines would duly deliver the goods. The nimble penny did function, but the halfpenny, though absorbed into the digestive machinery of the apparatus, obdurately refused to pass out the little bit of green paper. Obviously a serious crime as that of obtaining halfpennies under such circumstances was a matter for our every ready Borough Police. An officer detailed to investigate proceeded to test my story twice, with the result that the Revenue was again the richer, and he, alas, the poorer by the sum of one penny".

Now there are so many rules and regulations regarding the size of envelope and thickness of the contents that it is difficult to be sure you've put the right value of stamps on a letter.

In May 1960 when letters were posted to overseas destinations with insufficient stamps the Post Office made up the correct amount, then notified the sender requesting him to return stamps to cover the cost. This service was greatly appreciated and few failed to comply. I'm not sure that the same facility applies today!

In February 1957 there were scenes of great dignity and solemnity as 250 clergy from around the region journeyed to Ely Cathedral. They were joined by Mayors and other officials including the chairman of Ely Urban Council Coun W. Ruane to witness a ceremony steeped in tradition, as the Rt Rev Noel Baring Hudson was inducted, installed and enthroned as the 64th Lord Bishop of Ely.

The service was essentially the same as that performed at the enthronement of Bishop John Morton way back in August 1479. Morton had by no means been the first Bishop for that distinction belonged to a Welshman, Bishop Hervey of Bangor in 1109 after the new See had been carved from the Diocese of Lincoln.

John Morton had been a civil lawyer at Oxford in the 1450s before becoming involved in the Wars of the Roses and suffering imprisonment in the Tower of London. Like many of the early Bishops he played a significant part in national life but, unlike many, Morton is also remembered in the local area. He supervised the making of a new river between Peterborough and Wisbech that is still known as Morton's Leam and is also associated with the roadside cross at Stretham from which he is said to have walked barefoot to take up his appointment.

Over the centuries various Bishops of Ely have been involved in controversy.

Bishop Wren was imprisoned in the Tower of London during the Civil War only to be restored to his position at the Restoration. He had upset many of his congregation – including Oliver Cromwell - when he forced through reforms of services and imposed changes to the layout of churches. These included the railing-in of communion tables, something that had a practical as well as religious basis. For at Tadlow a dog had entered the church during the sermon and ran away with the loaf of bread that had been prepared for the holy sacrament. Some parishioners ran after the animal and took the bread from its mouth, returning it to the table. But the Minister did not feel it proper to consecrate it and, as there was no other bread to be had in the village, there was no communion that Sunday.

Later Bishop Bowyer Edward Sparke achieved national notoriety by promoting members of his own family to the richest positions, including appointing his ten-year-old son to be joint Registrar of the Diocese.

One constant issue facing Bishops has been the struggle to ensure that church buildings are kept in repair. In June 1947 an Advisory Committee on the Care of Churches appointed by Bishop Edward Wynn reported that eight churches were in danger of partial collapse. They included the fine medieval towers of Soham and Orwell, the interesting chancel of Hatley St

George, the roof of Caxton and almost the whole church of Wicken, which was splitting in half.

But Bishop Wynn had also realised that new churches were needed to serve people living in the expanding housing areas of Cambridge. This was one of the challenges that faced the newly-enthroned Bishop Hudson. He had graduated at Christ's College, been wounded fifteen times during the Great War, gaining both the DSO and the Military Cross, then served as a Missionary Bishop in Borneo before being appointed Bishop of Newcastle in 1941 and then Ely.

One of his first duties in his new post was to minister at the laying of the foundation stone by Princess Margaret of the new Nicholas Ferrar Church on the Arbury estate, renamed the Good Shepherd at its consecration in 1961. Others churches followed including St Stephens, St Martins and St James.

But as new churches were opened others in Cambridge were no longer needed, he felt. They included the small St Peter's on Castle Hill, St Michael's in Trinity Street and St Clement's which was clearly redundant with few worshippers. With active evangelisation All Saints could justify its purpose as a parish church but St Botolph's would probably be taken over by Corpus Christi College as a library and Great St Andrew's might be bought by the City to develop, it was believed in 1958

The challenges that have been faced by Bishops of Ely over the centuries have now been recorded in a new book edited by Peter Meadows, Keeper of the Ely Diocesan Records at the University Library. "Ely, Bishops and Diocese" is published by Boydell Press, ISBN 978-1-84383-5400 at £29.95

Alan Attlesley has emailed to say that he's doing some research on King Street Cambridge as it was in the 1960's. He believes that close to Malcolm Street there was a courtyard containing almshouses called Wray's Court. There may well have been another such courtyard nearer to Manor Street, he feels. Can anybody confirm this, he asks?

There were three sets of almshouse in King Street one of which had been endowed by Henry Wray in 1634. They were intended for four widows and widowers of the parish of Holy Trinity but have since been demolished.

Henry Wray had been a bookseller who'd lived just off Sidney Street in a Court named after him. It was sketched by News artist, the late Lewis Todd, in 1954 who captured an image of a quaint row of houses with a young girl, later identified as Christine Rae with her doll's pram and the family's black cat, Tim.

But appearances can be deceptive.

Writing in June 1999 Mrs Joan Goody told me that as a young married woman just after the War, she'd been delighted to be offered the chance to move into one of the houses in Wray's Court. That is until she & her husband Felix saw it. The yard might have looked quaint but the buildings were in very poor condition and occupied by old people. The houses had no back door, no water, no light except gas and just two toilets for all the residents, some of whom could not get out to them!

Joan's house was on three floors and had a basement full of cobwebs like upside down umbrellas – she threw buckets of water down it to force a way through. Overcoming their initial revulsion she and her husband stripped many layers of wallpaper, one layer containing pins and needles placed there by a long-dead seamstress. With blistered hands they decorated and made the place look something like a home. Only then did they discover to their horror that they had not, after all, got the house. The person who'd made the offer had no rights over it. That decision had to be made by a Committee and they would need references. The couple wept.

The Trustees of Wray's Charity, who administered this court and also maintained the almshouses in King Street, were impressed by their hard work. They told her Joan could have the house subject to certain conditions: there was to be no washing hung outside – this was after all part of 'old Cambridge' and admired by visitors – and they were not to have children. But when a baby came the Trustees relented and said they could stay provided it was not heard to cry. However the pram was never to be on view.

As the other elderly residents died or moved away so more young families moved in. One of these were Mr & Mrs K.P. Harris. They worked hard to create a "little Palace" even scrubbing the cobbles, for now babies would be crawling around (despite the committee!), though the washing lines were still confined to the basements.

The young community bonded together, organising child-minding so that each could have spare time. But then the City Council said they couldn't live there as the properties had no back doors and the occupants were re-housed in various parts of Cambridge. The Yard was demolished for the building of Sainsbury's in about 1972.

But can you tell me more of Wray's Almshouses in King Street

Intent on getting full value from his email, Roger has another question. He writes: "Do you know whether Cambridge ever possessed a 'noon day cannon?' When my family moved to Cambridge from Ely in 1957, we dug up a hedge at the bottom of the garden and found such a cannon. I've often wondered about it's history and how it got there.

Can anybody help? Write to me at the News and I'll put you in touch.

Memories 31st January 2011, by Mike Petty

I have just returned from a few days away in Lacock, the National Trust-owned village in Wiltshire that has formed the backdrop for many film and television programmes, including Harry Potter and Cranford.

It was altogether charming and – out of season at least – not overwhelmed with hordes of other visitors. Residents pointed out some of the apparently now world-famous sights that we might otherwise have missed, spoke happily about the ghostly lad who sat on the step of the upstairs lounge in one of the hotels – a gem of a room that locals insisted we inspect - where a partly-started jigsaw was waiting to be finished.

The Red Lion was welcoming and relaxed, though the barmaid did confess that the previous night she'd forgotten to lock the inn door and had walked back in her pyjamas to ensure we slept safe in our beds! We sat beside a roaring log fire, dined by candlelight but breakfasted without toast. For in all that old-world building there was no toasting fork so when the electricity supply failed the cook was restricted to what she could produce on the gas hob. Sadly without the modern electronic wizardry we could not pay the bill!

Such are the problems affecting innkeepers. Out at Linton in 1895 the landlord of The Swan, complained to the new Parish Council that the noise of the water carts filing up at the village pump opposite his hotel was waking his guests at 8:30am every morning.

Even Linton can look less than its best on a cold winter day, as a photographer discovered when he snapped the scene in about 1905. His view showed the trees gaunt against an overcast sky and a man standing beside the fence on the right. A picture postcard apparently shows he was still there several weeks later when the sky was bright blue and the trees in full leaf.

Or was he?

Comparison of the two pictures shows that they are one and the same but that the second has been hand coloured and somewhat retouched, with a branch removed to improve the composition.

Such attention to detail is typical of the care devoted by local historian, Garth Collard who inspired generations of young historians at Linton Village College and also established the Linton Local History Society, work for which he was awarded the MBE in 2007

One problem of quaint narrow streets is that they were not designed for motorised transport. On January 11th 1911, Mr WM Willis, of 15 High Street, photographed a mishap as a wagon load of sacks of grain overturned. The narrow width of the main street, the bad state of the road and the high load all contributed to the accident. Vehicles found it difficult to turn into Linton's High Street from the Cambridge Road, so the County Council purchased The White Hart Inn (behind the fallen load) for £225 and pulled it down in 1912 to widen the road.

Another photographer snapped an army tank in the High Street in 1939. The buildings behind date from the 17th century and were very dilapidated. There was a cesspool to the rear which was shared by all five cottages but this overflowed every three weeks in 1937-39.

And just what was the peculiar machine snapped in 1918 outside the Crown. At first sight it looks built for war, but seems to have been designed for agriculture with caterpillar tracks that spread the load more evenly, preventing it getting stuck when the ground became muddy.

These are some of more than 4,000 images which Garth Collard carefully documented before in 2009 he suffered a major stroke which has severely affected his researches.

But now through the assistance of Hugo Brown of the Cambridge Explorer much of the collection has been published for all to share. For over 1,700 photographs dating back to 1850 have been produced on a CD-ROM together with a selection of maps, directory entries and a series of indexes that even identify individuals shown on the many school groups. It is a remarkable interactive digital encyclopaedia of Linton life, an essential research source for anyone with a computer.

But what if you don't have a computer?

To ensure that history can be shared with as many as possible Hugo Brown has also produced a second version that can be viewed on a television from any standard DVD player. It is a constant succession of over 750 high-quality images, one blending into another, that makes its way throughout the village to the accompaniment of music from the 1920s and 1930s. The whole film runs for 110-minutes jogging memories even for those who have never visited Linton since the snapshots, photos and ephemera capture a way of life that has relevance to whatever place we each trace out roots.

For Hugo Brown this has been a work of love as he lived in Linton in the 1980s and spent many happy years in his youth wandering the streets with a camera recording scenes for posterity. A few have been included on the CD-ROM.

He may not be a Harry Potter, but has certainly devised a wizard way to appreciate history!

Garth Collard's Interactive Archive of Linton CD-ROM is £15, the Linton DVD costs £12.50 from The Cambridge Explorer at 13 High Street, Wilburton, Ely, CB6 3RB or via their website www.cambridge-explorer.org.uk

Memories 7th February 2011 by Mike Petty

Last week a crashed lorry load of feathers near St Ives brought traffic chaos to Cambridge. It forced many vehicles that would normally have gone along the A14 and M11 to grind their way through the city instead.

It is difficult to remember what conditions were like before the building of the two major roads that now bypass Cambridge

Until the Northern Bypass opened at Christmas 1978 those travelling from the Midlands to the coast made their way into Cambridge along Huntingdon Road then turned left down Victoria Road to feed the mass congestion at the junction with Milton Road that was known as Mitcham's Corner. Here the long articulated lorries tended to squeeze smaller vehicles out of the way before they crossed over Victoria Bridge.

Victoria Avenue was always an area of comparative calm between Jesus Green and Midsummer Common. But with jams that seemed to go on and on there was often a great deal of time to appreciate the view of the cows placidly grazing, whilst drivers overheated along with their engines

Next came the turn at Four Lamps roundabout into Maids Causeway and the long, increasingly less pleasant trek down Newmarket Road past the entrances to East Road and Coldham's Lane then out beyond the Gasworks towards Barnwell Bridge, the Pye Factory and finally the open road. Beyond lay the hold-ups in Newmarket – but at least one was clear of Cambridge!

Things had eased with the opening of Elizabeth Bridge in July 1971. Its origins dated back to before the building of Victoria Bridge in 1890 and there had been many delays that would make the present Guided Bus saga seem insignificant before the scheme was finally finished. However once opened it transformed the Cambridge traffic scene, making it like motoring on Sunday morning, every morning - at least for a while.

The new bridge's approaches had carved their way through previously tree-lined avenues from Milton Road and Chesterton and Newmarket Road was dualled to speed the traffic out of town.

Meanwhile those wishing to make their way from Huntingdon to London in the 1960s found their way to the traffic lights at the bottom of Castle Hill before continuing along Northampton Street and Queen's Road towards Fen Causeway – a route that had been constructed to ease congestion in 1926 despite profound opposition – and on to the leafy queues of Trumpington Road ahead.

The alternative was to cut through the historic heart of the city by squeezing down Magdalene Street and across the Cam to the comparatively broad Bridge Street where old properties on the west side had been demolished in a road-widening exercise before the Second World War.

Then it was right to the narrowness of Trinity Street, out into the sunlight of King's Parade and along past the Fitzwilliam Museum. This was one of the routes to be cut as planners sought to restrict through traffic in the 1970s.

With the heavy vehicles removed motorists could once more reclaim the Cambridge streets, except when accidents or road repairs brought everything to a halt again.

What do you remember about that crawl through Cambridge?

An email from G.M. Robinson of Wilmslow has sent me ferreting for information on the earliest days of golf in Cambridge.

Although Lord Dunedin told a meeting of the Cambridge Golf Club in King's College that he had played on Midsummer Common in 1869 the first actual course seems to have been established on Coe Fen in 1873. It was opposite the Botanic Gardens; three of the holes were on the fen and four on a strip of grass on the other side of Trumpington Road, which proved somewhat inconvenient!

After some time an effort was made to play on Sheep's Green but this was too marshy so a Cambridge University Golf Club was established on Coldham's Common in 1875. It was a far from ideal site. Noted golf writer Bernard Darwin described the approach to the course as being down the most depressing of Cambridge streets, Newmarket Road, and through the most unattractive slums of Barnwell. One turned down a particularly black and odorous lane, crossed a railway bridge and reached a flat, muddy expanse of grass of which the only features were a railway line and some rifle butts. There was also a particularly pungent smell which he believed to proceed from the boiling down of deceased horses into glue.

On arrival at the club-house he was at once surrounded and nearly swept from his legs by a yelling mob of caddies of most villainous appearance, who were supposed to be under the control of a well-meaning but superannuated policeman. Anyone who played there regularly soon found himself made over, body and soul, to these ruffians.

There were in addition an irregular body of younger deprecators who earned a precarious livelihood by stealing or retrieving balls. They enjoyed considerable opportunities because there were a good many muddy ditches – the only natural hazards. Sometimes they would return the errant ball to its owner for a penny, sometimes they would stamp it into the mud, pretend to hunt for it with a great show of energy and pocket it at their leisure when the owner had abandoned the search. This was an easy matter for the mud was of the softest and thickest and the ball would frequently bury itself on alighting without any help from human foot.

Writing in 1913 Charles Tennyson recalled that the grass grew in rank tufts that nowhere seemed to aspire to the dignity of turf. But despite this the club were never permitted to cut hazards or otherwise disturb the surface. Nor were they allowed to play during May term because the grass was removed for hay. Even in winter lean cattle wandered dolefully about it, crouching their gaunt bodies on the bare pastures the golfers called their greens but which in fact differed from the encircling morass in that they were occasionally visited by the mowing machine during the winter terms and had been worn by concentrating trampling of undergraduate feet into a delusive evenness of surface

There were no very short holes, the ground was undulating as a result of the extensive extraction of coprolites from the 1850s and the other hazards were a road, several footpaths, dry ditches, two burns and various bushes. But the main problem was the town rifle range which ran down the middle of the course and, when in use constituted a very real danger, for at two or three holes an errant golf ball had often to be retrieved under rifle fire. This was occasionally supplement by a machine gun, the shells of which hurtled over their heads with a kind of flapping hiss, peculiarly disquieting to a man of peaceful temperament.

Despite all this the course flourished. In 1887 was enlarged to 18 holes and a clubhouse and cottage built on the site of an old inn. But in 1894 came news that the Great Eastern Railway would be laying a new line over the Common, adding more distractions for golfers to contend with.

It is this that may have prompted Messrs H.J. Gray & son of Rose Crescent to establish an alternative. The Cambridge Chronicle of 18th January 1895 carried a notice that would in a few days open a golf course in Grantchester Meadows. The arrangement of links at a distance so convenient for the town ought to give a considerable impetus to this favourite sport, the paper commented. The nine-hole course was formally opened for play on Thursday Jan 31 with a ladies course due to be laid out in a few weeks. But in February a memorial signed by a number of residents at Grantchester was presented to the Council complaining that it interfered with the pleasantest walk round Cambridge and it soon ceased to function.

Another course was laid out on the Gog Magog Hills in 1901, which continues to flourish to this day, but the golfers from Coldham's Common moved to Whitwell Hill Coton where a club room opened in 1906.

Here too they suffered from the activities of avid ball-collectors. In October 1910 three labourers were charged with stealing nine golf balls and an overcoat from Charles Willmott, a groundsman at the University Golf Links at Coton. The men had gone to the fields adjoining the course and picked up the balls which they sold to an athletic outfitter of Downing Street. It was not a great success and the University Golf Club made arrangement with Royal Washington and Newmarket Golf Club for their members to play on 9-hole course at Worlington

After the golfer had departed, Coldham's Common continued as a shooting range. But by 1933 this had ceased and there came a suggestion that it be turned into a municipal golf course. The various firing points and the lower portion of the butts could be used in the construction of a very sporting course, providing work for the unemployed. The idea came to nothing and the Common became a more peaceful place free from either errant rifle rounds or golf balls

Next Thursday marks a melancholy anniversary for the congregation of St Paul's Church on Hills Road, Cambridge. For 70 years ago, on 24th February 1941, nine people were killed and many injured as a result of a severe air raid on that area of the town

On the night of the bombing, high explosives dropped along Hills Road and up to the railway bridge caused mayhem. Residents of the Blantyre Home for the Blind were severely shaken by a bomb which caused damage but no injuries. The Cambridge Daily News reported that there was hardly a window in the locality which remained intact. One of those damaged was the East Window of St Paul's Church

Details were censored at the time but Ken Fisher, who later worked from the First Aid post on the ground floor of St Paul's School in Russell Street, has recalled that he 'heard a plane start a bombing run and the first of a stick of bombs whistling down'. He had been chatting with a group, but had dived into a passage. He later returned to find the group 'ripped to pieces' by the third bomb.

Jack Overhill recorded in his newly-published graphic diary, 'Cambridge at War', that on "hearing that Hills Road had got a pasting, we went to have a look. The scene was people, cars, wardens, police, wreckage and glass smashed all over the place and little craters in the road. We couldn't find out about the casualties".

One of the survivors was Joyce, a seven-year old girl then living at the Cottage Home, an Orphanage for Girls run by the church, whose staff and girls regularly attended services. Her testimony has only been tracked down recently

"I haven't thought much about the war, but this is what I remember. The searchlights, gas masks, sirens, debris on the way to school and learning how to quickly get under the desks with arms wrapped around our heads. Drill was frequent as were drills to quickly don gas masks. I kept my mask until the rubber completely deteriorated

"I do recall a little of the night of the bombing. We all trooped down to the kitchen where grey, lumpy mattresses were spread on the floor. I remember the sound of the air raid siren. We sang the hymns 'Eternal Father Strong to Save' and 'Safe in the Arms of Jesus'.

"After the 'all clear' we returned to our bedrooms. My bed was next to the window and was covered in shards of glass. I'm pretty sure I also remember that the window had some kind of metal grill on it. I think our chimney was hit, as I remember black soot in what may have been the parlour'

Another testimony comes from a Canadian Forces Padre, Bob Sneyd who was staying in Cambridge and worshipped at St Paul's church, whilst his wife, Ora, remained in Canada. They had made an application to adopt little Joyce and take her back to Canada. Bob was concerned that the little girl had been awakened during the night with broken glass falling all over her bed.

But the next morning brought news that the immigration authorities in Ottawa had sent definite permission for her to go to Canada. Bob was just about to leave Cambridge on the 12.57 train but got a taxi and was able to visit the Cottage Home on his way to the station to tell Joyce the wonderful news.

He also called on Mr. Lee at St Paul's Rectory who gave him a piece of stained glass from the shattered window, that was almost literally warm from the intensity of the raid.

The names of those killed in that raid are recorded on the church's Second World War Memorial plaque:

Bertie Ashman, Age 42, (Civilian, St John's Ambulance, Fire Watcher.)
Sidney Harold Brittain, Age 50, (Civilian, Greengrocer, died in Addenbrooke's Hospital.)
William John Frederick Day, Age 29, (Sapper, Railway Construction Company, Royal Engineers)
Lucy Sybil Gent, Age 60, (Civilian, Air Raid Warden, W.V.S.)
Maurice Herbert George Lambert, (Age 34, Civilian.)
Frederick Dennis Charles Negus, Age 19, (Civilian, Home Guard, died in Addenbrooke's Hospital.)
Petica Corsolles Robertson, Age 57, (Civilian, Air Raid Warden, W.V.S.)
Kathleen Ada Irene Thaxter, Age 24, (Civilian, Fire Watcher.)
Ivy Florence Woodcock, Age 29, (Civilian.)

By the time the conflict was over, 23 names of servicemen had been added to the memorial which was unveiled eight years after the War and dedicated by the Bishop of Ely, Dr Edward Wynn. Since then the church has continued to conduct annual Remembrance services.

The shattered East Window remained as a reminder of the bombing and it was to be December 1958 before the War Damage Commission authorised its replacement.

But the story does not end there, as Simon Brook has been telling me.

Whilst preparing for the 70th anniversary of the Hills Road Bombing, the question arose as to what had happened to the glass piece from St Paul's old shattered window.

His research led to Toronto where Nancy Mallett, the Cathedral archivist and Stuart Mann, the Diocesan director of Communications published articles in the Toronto Anglican Newspaper.

Incredibly these were seen by Fred Sneyd, the brother of Joyce, the little girl who had survived the bombing all those years before and together they have filled in the details

Bob Sneyd, Joyce's adopted dad, had later accompanied the forces to France on D Day, where he had conducted funerals of soldiers killed on the battlefield. He had brought back the two Union flags he used during the services which are now displayed at the Calvary Baptist Church in Toronto on either side of a colourful Memorial window

The window is composed of ninety shards of stained glass that Bob had collected from bombed-out church windows in France, The Netherlands, Belgium and Germany as well as 37 English Cathedrals, Abbeys and Churches including St Paul's Cathedral and Westminster Abbey.

The beautiful panels have diagrams with reference numbers to identify each fragment. Amongst them all are two from Cambridge. One is from the Holy Sepulchre, the famous Round church, damaged during a raid that wrecked the Union Society building alongside.

The other is from the Victorian church of St Paul whose congregation still remember the night of devastation that cost so many people their lives. They will be holding a service of remembrance and reconciliation for the 70th anniversary of the bombing of Hills Road on Sunday 27th February at 10.30 when all are welcome

If you can add to the story of that fateful night then Simon Brook would be pleased to hear from you. Email him at brook215@ntlworld.com or drop me a line and I'll put you in touch.

Should Cambridge Guildhall be converted into a hotel? This is one of the proposals currently under discussion. It is an issue that was also discussed in 1932: why should such a large employer be based right in the middle of the town where parking was difficult. It would be better to relocate to the corner of East Road and Parkside and replace the old Guildhall with shops on the ground floor and offices and flats above. Only by a split vote was the suggestion vetoed.

In those days there were a number of hotels in the town centre. The most famous was the Lion in Petty Cury. There had been an inn on the site in 1493 and in 1689 the Earl of Bedford and dined there on a menu that included solamagundy - a hot salad of boiled chicken, wild flowers, fruit and potatoes - as well as carp stewed with perches, a dish of tongues, udders and marrow-bones, a jowl of sturgeon and whipped syllabubs

The hotel – sometimes known as Red Lion - had flourished during the great era of stagecoaches when it had room in the inn yard for a smithy and numerous stables.

In 1894 the Lion was taken over by a lady who had already made a reputation for her hospitality. Mrs A.A. Moyes had come to prominence as landlady at the Bath Hotel in Bene't Street whose Bath market dinner was the talk of the county. As success grew more space was necessary and she'd been contemplating extensions before being offered the opportunity of taking over the Lion, following the death of the proprietor, her late husband's father

Mrs Moyes made the Lion an institution. In 1903 it was extended by the demolition of part of the former Falcon Inn, with a raised corridor lightened with large stained-glass windows linking the extension to the main hotel across Falcon Yard

It became the headquarters of visiting sportsmen and athletic teams while companies such as the Cambridge Railway Building Works and the local branch of the United Kingdom Commercial Travellers' Association chose it for their staff meals.

Such functions were well served by William (“Little John”) Parish, so called because he was barely five-foot tall. He was head waiter to two exclusive University dining clubs, the True Blue Club and the Beef Steak Club, which were both limited to a membership of five. Each met every term with members of the True Blue Club wearing powdered wigs, blue knee breeches and buckled shoes and Beef Steak members sporting black coats and tails with silver buttons and buff waistcoats.

“Twelve to 15 courses we used to carry and they took two-and-a-half hours to serve. And, mind you, nothing less than a magnum for the table”, his contemporary Mr W. Levett - “Just William” - recalled in 1952. He also he reminisced about some Very Important Diners ranging from barons to Sultans and Prime Ministers. “I’ve served most of them ... Balfour, Asquith, Lloyd George (he used to live here almost), Baldwin – and Churchill”.

Each visitor was made to feel that he or she was the only person Mrs Moyes delighted to honour - so they came back time and again. To generations of undergraduates she was a good friend, indulgent to the extravagances of youth but firm and capable in preventing lapses into hooliganism.

Not everybody repaid her kindness: in June 1906 she had to take an undergraduate to court after he reneged on payment for the hire of three horses - he had tossed up with two friends and lost. But she lost the case, the court deciding that such hire was not a ‘necessary’ and, being under 21 years of age, the lad was not liable to pay it.

She was alert to new technology. In 1904 the Eastern Vacuum Cleaning Company demonstrated the benefits of their machines by cleaning carpets in the coffee room and the commercial room. “The carpets are rich, large carpets, so large in fact as to be almost unwieldy under the old method of beating, but under this system they have been cleaned in the most perfect manner and not a particle of dust can be found. Out of one carpet 28 lbs of dust and dirt was extracted and now the whole of the hotel is to be dealt with in similar manner”, the News reported

The former coach entrance yard from Petty Cury was covered with a glass roof and the rooms became shops for travelling salesmen who laid out samples in the yard where buyers from the big stores come to inspect the goods that were despatched by rail.

The practice died out with the increased use of the motor car and the Lion responded. In 1936 a reporter commented: “On market days its spacious yard resounded to the echo of hundreds of hooves and of the wheels of carts and carriages. Today its yards are now filled with cars”. By 1950 over 80,000 motorists were using the Lion Hotel yard annually and the Council, in their new Guildhall just down the Cury were planning a new central car park.

By then the Moyes family had moved on. They sold up in February 1938 after more than 80 years and in 1961 the Lion was purchased by a property company in the single largest property transaction the city had see. Two years later the hotel closed, though the bars remained until 1968 when the demolition men moved in and the building became history

There may be dramatic changes to Peas Hill if new plans by the Arts come to fruition. The Theatre hopes to form a grand new foyer area stretching along to St Edward's Passage with bar and restaurant facilities as well as an additional performance area seating 100 people

But few know that Peas Hill has a connection with drama dating back some 140 years. In 1871 W.B. Redfern created a new and elegant bijou theatre accommodating 170 people in rooms previously occupied by a draper at no.9 Peas Hill, near the present Barclays Bank. It opened with a burlesque entitled 'Bombastes Furioso' together with a farce and a short concert of vocal and instrumental music.

For several years the Bijou Dramatic Club provided the only dramatic performances in Cambridge that were given with any regularity. As time went on the club found that the old Peas Hill theatre was not big enough for them and they finally removed to an old skating rink in St Andrews's Street, on the site of which the New Theatre was later built. The old Peas Hill premises were pulled down in August 1923.

At about this time King's College decided to build a hostel on the corner of Peas Hill and St Edward's Passage. Once the plans had been drawn up an irregular piece of land occupied by old sheds and wine cellars remained and Lord Keynes, the bursar, realised that by careful planning a theatre could be dropped into the vacant space.

Building started 1935 and the theatre plus restaurant opened just 75 years ago in February 1936. When it came to a name the suggestion of the 'Fishmarket Theatre' was canvassed but rejected and 'The Arts' became part of Cambridge life.

The new building attracted rave reviews: 'It is a beautiful piece of work with furnishings in autumn leaf and includes a restaurant and café bar. The stage has facilities for quick scene changing with a lift large enough to raise a full-size grand piano from the orchestra pit, while the cinema and sound apparatus are of the very latest type with facilities for the reproduction of gramophone records. The fresh air supply can be warmed or cooled while the main heating by water-fed radiators is instantly adjustable to meet the vagaries of the English climate', the News reported

The Arts opened with a gala performance by the Vic-Walls Ballet Company, which included Margot Fonteyn, followed next night by the World Premier of a new GPO film unit production 'Night Mail'. This showed the work of the Royal Mail night train from London to Scotland with plenty of novel-angle shots and some quick-fire doggerel synchronised with the train beats. Since then it has survived various challenges to continue to bring high-quality arts events of various types.

Not all dramas are acted out on a stage. In June 1935 John Saltmarsh, an eminent Fellow of King's College, recalled that on part of the Arts site and hidden behind a more modern front was a tall old house with a curious cruciform tiled roof and a picturesque gable with carved wooden ornaments. It had been the scene of tragedy when Frances the daughter of Samuel Spalding, town-clerk of Cambridge, had wandered into a garret in a remote part of what was then the family's home. The door slammed behind her and she could not escape. Her parents searched frantically but failed to find her the girl before she starved to death. "One of the attics in No.6 has an evil reputation still, and ghostly fingers are sometimes heard to tap on the window”, Saltmarsh recorded in The Cambridge Review

The new extension will incorporate nos.4/6 Peas Hill, recently home to the Cheltenham and Gloucester Building Society. Formerly two separate cottages it was for a while The Sugar and Spice coffee house. The Cambridge Antiquarian Society’s photographic survey includes a photograph taken in 1935 as demolition removed the adjoining premises at no.3, a roomy rambling building built around a massive chimneystack, that had been home to Shrive’s basket makers, where clothesbaskets and wicker children’s chairs used to hang outside their shop.

Next door, at no.2, was Fletcher’s the butcher’s, a building on three floors with low mean rooms above the shop, arranged round a central winding staircase. By 1935 it has been derelict for many years; the condition had to be seen to be believed, and the seeing was attended with some personal risk, Saltmarsh commented. After rebuilding it became the new home to F.O. Sennitt, the butcher, egg and poultry dealer who had supplied butter in yard-long strips to the colleges which sold it on to undergraduates at a penny an inch. Sennitt added a fish side to the business and in April 1951 invested in one of the new refrigerated display cabinets avoiding the swarms of flies that had been so much a feature of the area in previous years.

The building on the corner of St Edward’s Passage had been Coulson’s draper’s shop which was badly damaged by fire in December 1900. Despite the efforts of Captain Greef and the Fire Brigade the flames were not extinguished until the entire stock of goods in the shop had been completely destroyed & the front of the shop badly damaged. The cause of the fire was blamed on the overturning of one of the incandescent burners in the shop window. Later, after rebuilding, the ground floor was occupied by G.P. Reece a sports shop with a wide range of Automodels equipment and was subsequently home to University Audio.

Who knows what future years will see for this small area of Cambridge

My recent article about the Lion Hotel has resulted in a letter from a man who knew it far better than most.

Fred Guy from Cambridge writes: “I was the last licensee of the bars until it closed in 1968 for demolition. I moved to Cambridge in 1963 with my wife and young son from London to help my in-laws to run the bars on behalf of Tollemache and Cobbold and moved in while they were auctioning off all the contents in 1966

“I took on the license and run it till it closed. Security was very difficult when you think we had well over 100 derelict rooms and out-buildings as well as a derelict ballroom on the first floor that would have accommodated 500 to 600 guests at one time. Most of the top floor was staff accommodation and by the time we left pigeons had occupied most of them!

“The bells for the boots and hostler were still hanging on the wall and when I see the pictures of the plush lounge it is difficult to imagine many years ago horse and traps passing through to the stables at the rear. We still walk through into Petty Cury and think this was our main entrance with Lyons tea shop opposite.”

I was one of those evading Fred’s security as I wandered around the dilapidated Lion early in the morning of 7th May 1969 to take snaps of the demolition in progress.

Another former Cambridge coaching inn was the Blue Boar Hotel in Trinity Street which closed for the last time in April 1986. It had been an inn for some 400 years as in 1693 churchwardens off All Saint’s Church, just along the street, spent two shillings “for beer at the Blue Boar on ye Queen’s birthday”.

A London-bound stagecoach set off from its doors in the 1750s and at the turn of the century the landlord John Mount advertised speedy coaches to and from Stamford, Birmingham, Norwich and Ipswich. It was also a base for the “Union” and “Beehive” which travelled at a more sedate pace – they were slow coaches.

The journey to Cambridge could be hazardous but the greatest danger was as the coach arrived. For the entrance to the inn yard was quite low and outside passengers had to duck as they went under it. One who did not was the Rev Gawen Braithwaite, a Fellow of St John’s College. The New Monthly Magazine for December 1814 recorded “As he was entering the Blue Boar Inn on the roof of the Ipswich coach, he was so much crushed (owing to the lowness of the gateway) as to cause his death in a few hours”

By 1899 the Blue Boar was in a bad way, both structurally and otherwise so Trinity College, the owners, allocated £3,000 for repairs, employing Coulson and Lofts to carry out the work. Although the firm kept to their part of the budget the total bill soared and in 1903 the College took the architect to court, only to lose their case

The old Inn yard with its extensive stabling was rebuilt as a dining room and the entrance courtyard covered in with a glass roof to form an entrance lounge.

In 1909 it was praised in an article in the “Town and Country Illustrated” magazine. “The coffee room is a model of what such an apartment should be, the smoking lounge is so luxuriously furnished as to make an after-dinner cigar even more of a pleasure and visitors who desire to enjoy a quiet ‘hundred-up’ find every provision made for them in the billiards room which contains two excellent tables. For lady guests there is an excellent drawing room looking out to the King’s Parade”, the magazine reported.

It was remodelled in 1936 with a new Georgian cornice and canopy installed with flood-lighting producing a beautiful effect. Internally structural alterations, redecoration and refurbishing made the hotel a place of comfort and restful beauty with every modern refinement to ensure the enjoyment of residents who have a choice of gas, coal or electric fires in the bedrooms, the News reported. An advertisement also promised central heating in the corridors which was particularly relevant since although there was running hot and cold water the bathroom was ‘within easy reach of your bedroom door’,

It became part of the Trust House Forte group in 1943 but started to fall below their standards: few of the bedrooms had private bathrooms, many had a poor view, it was difficult for guests to be set down or picked up and, with the loss of the inn yard, parking was non-existent.

Trinity however needed extra student rooms and designed a modern replacement which retained the historic façade with a new restaurant and wine bar.

The closure of the Blue Boar in 1986 was much regretted. City MP Robert Rhodes James missed it: he frequently took coffee there before his Saturday surgeries with constituents, while early-arriving commuters and shop girls from Eaden Lilley would gather there to sit in comfort while they waited for their businesses to open

It marked the end of 33 years service for the Blue Boar barman, Eddie Brauerski who recalled that Prince Charles had called in for breakfast whilst an undergraduate at Trinity College. He had also served film stars and television personalities including James Mason, Cyril Fletcher and Nicholas Parsons and in one month Margaret Thatcher, Harold Wilson, Edward Heath and Jeremy Thorpe had all dined in the Blue Boar's restaurant. They sat at the same table – though not at the same time

Did you ever stay there or use its facilities – what do you remember.

There are areas of Cambridge that vary immensely in character.

Many people know East Road as a bustling street lined with shops, pubs and a modern University.

By contrast West Road, also lined by modern University buildings, is quiet and largely unexplored

Both areas were open fields until the early 1800s but then two Inclosure Acts laid the foundation for their transformation.

While the East or Barnwell Fields were quickly built over to provide homes for the families who flocked to the town to find work, the West fields remained largely pasture with only a dozen or so gentlemen's residences built away from the Castle Hill to the north and Newnham village to the south

Much of the land beyond the Backs was owned by eight colleges whose need for houses for academic staff grew rapidly once rules that forbade fellows to marry were revoked. From 1870 to 1914 a 'bicycle suburb' grew up with the building of Cranmer, Adams, Sylvester and Herschel Roads to the west of the new Grange Road where an earlier house, 'Pinehurst' was demolished to make way for the erection of two blocks of modern up-market flats with 'all-electric' kitchens in 1933

Such houses were isolated and bereft of any public transport. Despite their affluence few residents had carriages and it was the coming of the bicycle that allowed easy access to the town centre and its colleges.

A favourite route was Burrell's Walk though this was closed when the land alongside was taken for a large military hospital to care for wounded soldiers during the Great War. The adjacent fields were filled with wooden huts that were later converted to emergency accommodation for families caught in the immediate post-war housing shortage. These were cleared for a Memorial Court for Clare College and a massive new University Library whose dominant high tower was used by Pye to test the robustness of its valves used in proximity shells during the second world conflict.

Once more western fields was requisitioned to aid the war effort, this time for a massive aircraft repair factory to the south of Madingley Road where Sterling bombers were patched up in hangars built on St John's College land. This proved an ideal site and a massive campaign had to be fought before it was finally handed back to the college. One compelling argument was that such a facility would have needed the construction of a housing estate to accommodate the workers and this would destroy the rural amenities of that side of Cambridge.

Post-war planning controls were introduced to ensure that Cambridge remained a university town. But while industrial development was restricted, the city's largest business – that of education – has transformed west Cambridge with the relocation of the Cavendish Laboratory and establishment of the Veterinary School and departments of Engineering, Computer and Mathematical Sciences in the former pastures.

Earlier a new Sidgwick Avenue site was established with striking architecture such as the award-winning (and technically flawed) glass History Faculty building and the recent, much-praised glass Law Faculty. And there have been new colleges such as Robinson, Wolfson and Clare Hall

Many residents can recount the changes to the area around East Road. But how few ever explore the western fringe of the city, an area that has seen as dramatic a transformation?

Cambridge's West Side Story has now been very well-researched by Philomena Guillebaud. But she would love to hear from anybody who knew the area in the past, especially if you were one of those whose families were housed in the old First Eastern General Hospital buildings.

"Cambridge's West Side Story: changes in the landscape of west Cambridge 1800-2000" (ISBN 978-0-9567294-0-8) is available from Cambridgeshire Archives at Shire Hall for £12 or by email – philguill@aol.com for £14 including postage.

“The undertaker’s eyes were mournful and sad, and his clothing was of the deepest black, save for his socks (he wore no shoes), which were of the brightest scarlet”

The deceased was an undergraduate from Emmanuel College and his funeral procession was one of the largest seen in Cambridge. But it was not what it appeared. The corpse seemed very much alive, alternately laughing and mopping eyes. He was seated in a four-wheeled carriage, neatly dressed in correct London style and with a bowler hat set at a somewhat more jaunty angle than befitted the occasion.

For this was a ‘Mock Funeral’ for a lad who had transgressed against the rules “having displayed a somewhat unnecessary and irresponsible exuberance of spirits” and been asked by the authorities “if he would mind spending a short space of time elsewhere, only returning when in a quieter and more sober state of mind”

It was hardly a major news event - there had been others in 1904, 1907 and 1910. But in March 1911 a CDN reporter was given the space to cover it in detail. His light-hearted report is well worth reprising, a century later.

At the head of the funeral procession was a hansom cab. Seated on the top with legs dangling over the side, was the undertaker. His mournful calling seemed to have cast a settled gloom over his countenance. In his hand he waved a long whip (an emblem of his mournful trade), with a bright handkerchief to match his wonderful socks tied to it.

In front of the ‘hearse’ was a four-wheeler filled with disconsolate mourners who made strange noises through bugles of many shapes and sizes. Behind it were nine carriages filled with loudly lamenting mourners as slowly the solemn, sorrowing pageant wended its way to the station.

There the deceased descended from the hearse amidst cheers and bought a first-class ticket for St Pancras. He was then carried to the end of the platform. Silence was called for and the undertaker ascended a luggage truck. “My friends”, he said slowly and solemnly, “it is indeed a bitter and sorrowful occasion that calls us together. I will now call upon the deceased to say a few words”

At that the corpse ascended the truck amidst cheers: “Dear friends, I thank you one and all for your kindness in coming to – (there was a break in his manly young voice) – to my funeral. I would ask you to cheer that most dignified and respectable association, the Proctorial body” (Cheers)

Speeches over the 'mourners' took the deceased back up the platform on their shoulders, a guard of honour with three somewhat antiquated rifles proceeding in front. At length the train steamed in and the departed got into a first-class carriage. He leaned out of the window. "Kind friends" he said, "I will tell you my story". All fell silent in anticipation – but at this point the ticket collector touched the 'corpse' on the shoulder.

"Your ticket, sir", he demanded. The deceased emptied his pockets but could not find it. Again he leaned out of the window. "Dear friends", he remarked, "When you carried me about you lost my ticket for me". The dear friends cheered. He bought another ticket and then with the big placard fastened outside the carriage the train started to move. The three antiquated rifles fired a salute, by proxy it is rumoured, the final notes of the last post wailed mournfully through the station, and he was gone – for a week

The 'mock funeral' would be followed a few weeks later by another but then was overtaken by the Great War during which the station would frequently be filled with bodies of young men who were, if not dead, were seriously injured, being brought by train for treatment

By the time the tradition was revived in 1930 things were more financially difficult, for the young 'body' was this time deposited in a third-class compartment where gifts of fruit and rhubarb were solemnly handed in. When two lads were end down in 1962 for failing their examinations they were pulled through the streets in a sports car. Perhaps you remember it?

And no, this was not an April Fools story – it really happened, just as an undertaker called Merry used his horse-drawn hearse as an ambulance to take patients to hospital, and published a photographer as an advertisement!

Some other funeral snippets reported by the News

August 1903

Sir - An exciting scene occurred at 11.30 pm when the small-pox hearse was just reaching its destination and turning round previous to receiving the body of a young man who had died that morning. The night was very dark and the hearse overturned on its side, the smashing of glass and the bumping of the vehicle on the road causing a great commotion. After some delay it was righted again, the body duly deposited inside and it rumbled and groaned off to the cemetery, grating on the road with its iron-shod wheels in the dead of the night in a most unpleasant manner. Any private firm would have an India-rubber tyred vehicle for such work but Cambridge Corporation have apparently yet to discover that such 'luxuries' exist – 'Mill Road'

May 1905

A Cambridge lady has patented a coffin to minimise the possibility of premature burial. It contains an electric bell, the button of which is fixed near the hand of the occupant with the bell on the top of the grave. There is also a glass plate in the lid together with a hammer to allow the person to break out, though it is hardly conceivable that anyone would have sufficient strength to scramble to the surface

January 1909

On Friday night a man died in an East Road Lodging House and the landlady was naturally anxious to relieve her house of the body at the earliest moment. She had no knowledge of the man's relatives and a 'parish burial' was ordered. The undertaker said she had wanted to put the body in the yard covered up with clothes but he had removed it at his own expense. However relatives complained that the coffin was too small and the body laid on bare wood with the feet sticking to the pitch. All there was to cover him was a piece of thin stuff which did not meet in the middle

Two spinsters, aged 50 and 30, appeared in court charged with stealing carnations value sixpence from a grave in Mill Road cemetery. The custodian said he saw them take the flowers from the side of the grave of Trooper Truscott; he took the ladies to his house, locked the door and sent for a policeman. They were respectable Sunday school teachers who had known the deceased well and picked up flowers that had dropped from a wreath to take home and press in remembrance of him. The custodian was legally correct but for him to lock them up, send for a policeman and cart them through the streets to the police station was very regrettable

In the spring of 1911 two military heroes were battling for the support of Cambridgeshire youngsters.

Lieut.-General Robert Baden-Powell, the famous defender of Mafeking, had propounded his 'fad' – peace scouting for boys as a means of instruction in good citizenship – before a large audience at the Perse School Hall in February 1908. The idea took off and by June 1910 a Cambridge Boy Scouts Association was inaugurated to appoint scoutmasters, register troops and patrols, encourage the movement and work in co-operation with other boys' organisations. The movement flourished and in May 1911 Baden-Powell returned to inspect a rally of 500 Boy Scouts on the University Officers Training Corps Parade Ground in Grange Road.

It was a bitterly-cold, dull afternoon but could not dampen the enthusiasm of the lads who welcomed their Chief. They demonstrated their skills in mending clothes, boxing, Morse signalling and baking bread. Amongst the speeches and cheers was one for Corporal Stone of the 1st Cherry Hinton troop who was presented with the Boy Scouts medal for saving the lives of his two little sisters and brother from fire.

That night about 150 of the Scouts slept in the Corn Exchange. It was a disturbed evening for just after a supper of cocoa and buns a blaze broke out on Cambridge Market Hill and the lads' fire-fighting training was put into practice for real.

There were troops from Cambridge, Cherry Hinton, Trumpington and Grantchester, Soham and Newmarket. But not, it appears, Histon.

Histon did however have a scout troop dating back to July 1909. Like the others they learned Morse signalling, first-aid, swimming, physical training and religion. They too recognised bravery, presenting a life-saving badge to William Gifford for rescuing another lad from downing

But their scoutmaster, Douglas Bowles, felt General Baden-Powell's organisation smacked too much of military training and had decided that Histon should go their own way. A lad should learn not to destroy but to save and preserve life, to raise the down-trodden and deliver the oppressed. Bowles wanted to inculcate chivalry, offer a full training in civil discipline and encourage study and the powers of observation. He would teach the boys to follow an outdoor life and inculcate a sense of responsibilities towards their neighbours, country and world.

Others also had their reservations about Baden-Powell's Boy Scout movement including his former London Commissioner, Sir Francis Vane, who set up a National Peace Scouts Association. Its aims echoed those of the Histon group and in March 1911 Sir Francis came to inspect them.

He found their signalling and ambulance work was excellent and their drill good. Above all the lads were polite – a most important aspect of scout life. Indeed he was so impressed that he proclaimed Histon not only the First Peace Scouts of All in England but the First of All in the World, gave them the title of "Sir Francis Vane's Own Troop" and presented his personal crest as their badge.

Then in June 1911 Sir Francis invited a contingent of six of the Histon Peace Scouts to London to take part in coronation celebrations of King George V. They travelled by train, tube and electric tram, went down the Thames to view Tower Bridge and the Houses of Parliament and on their way to the British Museum helped two City policeman to push a broken-down motor bus from a busy thoroughfare to a side road.

But on the great day it was found that no special arrangements could be made for the boys to view the Coronation Procession and after an attempt to get places in Trafalgar Square failed they gave up any hope of seeing the King and went to the Zoo instead.

Perhaps this disappointment was deeply felt for by January 1913 the Histon Peace Scouts had switched allegiance and became the 4th Cambridge District Troop (Baden Powell's). Under the continued command of Scoutmaster Bowles they spent a weekend camp at Longstanton, where they repulsed a surprise attack from the Longstanton troop.

But by then the adventure was almost at an end. Owing to business pressures and health problems, together with the scarcity of officers and other difficulties, Scoutmaster Bowles found it necessary to disband the troop which merged with the Histon Boys Brigade.

Today there is a Histon Scout Group once more. Its website shows it continues to rise to challenges. In December 2008 during a hike to Rampton "we trudged through mud and cow poo, got stuck three times in the mud and the conditions also filled our shoes with iced water with every step". They celebrated the successful conclusion of their mission by feasting on sausage rolls and (dry) Bread and singing tales of Scouts of long ago

But did they realise just how long that history dated back and how important a place in the history of Scouting their predecessors had once enjoyed.

Ram Yard off Bridge Street was an unlovely mass of bricks and timber. “Several of the buildings show no sign of occupation by night – there is one of two storeys which is occupied as a shoemaker’s workroom. Another gloomy pile, now unoccupied, was, I believe, a blacksmith’s shop. The whole block is uniformly hideous and obstructive. No one has a good word to say for it and its removal would be a matter of little inconvenience to a very few residents” a correspondent to the News claimed in 1900

But some did appreciate it. Whilst at Trinity College Lord Byron, the poet, had a collection of monkeys, mastiffs, geese, cats and peacocks. But his favourite was a tame bear that followed him around like a dog. However house-trained it may have been the college refused to allow the bear in his room, so Byron had found it lodgings in the stables at the Ram Yard where it dined on bread and milk.

Ram Yard was a narrow cobbled lane taking its name from an inn which once stood on the north side of the entrance in Bridge Street. It ran alongside Round Church Street by which it was separated by a row of buildings. The first of these was occupied by a hairdressing business established by Joseph Przyborsky about 1856. It was continued by his son, Alexander who shaved his first customer when nine years old and built up a first-class reputation, while a ladies hairdressing saloon was opened on the first floor.

The 1904 Cambridge Street Directory lists a number of tradespeople in the Yard including Susan Wilson, a seamstress, Henry Harvey a gasfitter and Elizabeth Clark an upholsteress together with a stables and a couple of pubs. One of these was the Golden Fleece, an old beer-house attached to Brown’s billiard rooms, which years before had been a celebrated resort of University billiard players. They have long since gone

Later occupants included Sid Maltby a cobbler, had his workshop in Ray Yard. He had a sign on his wall that read ‘The devil wants your souls to ruin – Sid Maltby wants your soles to mend’. Sid made sandals for most of the Jewish evacuees from London who were evacuated there during the war. Ironically the Yard was hit by German bombs in July 1942 when premises that had been used by Cambridge Christian Spiritualist Church since July 1931 were totally destroyed, a brass cross being the only thing saved. The Blue Barn Café was also a casualty

Jean Potter lived in a house just behind Przyborsky’s between 1951 & 1952. With her husband, a policeman, she rented a downstairs flat with half-panelled walls whose sitting room, bath and kitchen windows looked out into Ram Yard. They were never short of company as two police beats passed their walls so the coffee pot was constantly hot to revive passing Bobbies.

Jack Vickery, who managed 'Thrussells' shoe repair business lived next door. His home had a paved yard and as he was a keen gardener Jack lifted all the slabs and planted flowers, creating a little haven of colour. It was wonderful to live in the centre of the city, his daughter recalled in 2000 although there was one problem: "The yard light went out at midnight and if I was too late back on a Saturday night from the 'Dot' or the Guildhall dance, I had to run down this 'black hole' to get home!"

Molly Sekulla worked as a tailoress for R. Buttress & Co of St John's Street between 1946 and 1956. They had premises at 5 Round Church Street and in Ram Yard where the room was above the Cambridge University Cruising Club. Molly and some other dozen or so employees undertook bespoke tailoring, making men's and ladies' suits, blazers, University scarves, ties, gowns and hoods as well as zephyrs – old fashioned tee shirts – which were trimmed in college colours for the boat races.

Another resident was Tim Eiloart, an undergraduate who had given up his studies to try and fly a balloon across the Atlantic in 1958. The attempt failed and he rented a bed-sitting room from the Cambridge University Cruising Club. It was there that he conceived the idea of a company that would harness the brains of Cambridge University to solve the problems of British Industry. With a small team he formed Cambridge Consultants which has gone on to play a significant part in the development of the Cambridge Phenomenon

Ram Yard was swept away when Round Church Street was widened to provide access to the new Park Street car park which which opened in October 1963.

One building survived: Cambridge's last thatched cottage in Clement Place continued to provide a home in the city centre until it was demolished in 1972 for an extension to the car park. [SCAN & PIX FROM FILE]

Memories 18th April 2011, by Mike Petty

Jo Edkins from Gwydir Street has been recalling some old Cambridge booksellers.

"A long time ago, I remember hearing a rhyme about Cambridge bookshops in a Cambridge folk club. I've only just remembered what all the shops were. It should be sung to the tune of Frere Jacques - it fits very well!

William Heffer, William Heffer
Bowes and Bowes, Bowes and Bowes,
Galloway and Porter, Galloway and Porter,
Deighton Bell, Deighton Bell.

Heffer's was described by one 1920s American visitor as "one of the most thrilling bookshops in the world". Its shop in Petty Cury was a book lovers' paradise being widely praised when it was remodelled in 1929, the front design successfully combining an old-world impression with a modern style. In the basement were 'remainders' at reduced prices while the ground floor was devoted to the latest publications and an extensive foreign literature section. A wide range of second-hand volumes occupied most of the first floor where connoisseurs of original editions would find much to interest them at prices from £5 to £250. On the second floor were oriental, foreign travel and fine art books while higher still one could find Heffer's own publications, many of local interest. There was also a special reference department and out-of-print books service. When it closed in 1970 as part of the Lion Yard redevelopment some 90,000 books were moved to its new site in Trinity Street

Bowes and Bowes shop on the corner of Trinity Street had a heritage of bookselling, publishing and binding that went back as far as 1581. In 1807 it belonged to John Nicholson, son of the celebrated 'Maps' who went his rounds of the University with a moveable stall laden with textbooks calling out "Maps and pictures". Later Kingsley and other literary men held 'tobacco parliaments' on religion and politics there, Wordsworth reclined there, Thackeray dined there and Tennyson first read "Maud" in the shop. The spy Donald Maclean who defected to Moscow regularly bought books from Bowes and Bowes as did another former Cambridge student and fellow traitor, Kim Philby. Frank Reeve, the manager hesitated over the first order and checked with the Foreign Office to see whether it was permissible to trade with a traitor. The name of Bowes and Bowes continued until it changed to Sherratt and Hughes in 1987 and the site now houses the Cambridge University Press bookshop

Galloway & Porter's business originated with Arthur Cox in 1890 and was purchased by Sidney V. Galloway who relocated it to King's Parade. In May 1902 C.P. Porter joined him in partnership and the move was made to Sidney Street. In 1927 they carried a large supply of scholastic books with clients ranging from queens to factory boys and including foreign and colonial libraries extending to every part of the globe. The business continued until May last year, although by then it was only a shadow of its earlier self.

John Deighton became proprietor of a bookshop in 1778 when he joined up three separate premises on the corner of Trinity Street and Green Street. It changed its name after George Bell and William Smith became proprietors. They stocked new titles, rare editions and books from private presses with the Green Street windows featuring second-hand volumes and publisher's remainders. It was bought by Heffer's in 1987

One name missing from Jo's rhyme is that of Gustave David who came to Cambridge in 1896 and started his career with a stall on Market Hill where he traded on weekdays. On Saturday however he had a pitch on Peas Hill, just a short distance away from the shop he opened in St Edward's Passage in 1906. But by 1959 street parking in the area was restricted and motorists objected that the stall took up as much space as any car. So David moved his Saturday selling to his weekday site. By 1912 his shop was described as an institution, ten years later the University gave him a gala lunch at Trinity College – he preferred that to an Honorary Degree - and he was much mourned when he died in 1936.

In March that year Dr F. Carr of Sawston published a poem printed on antique paper with two admirable sketches of David and his stall by his son, Mr Hubert David. It included the lines

And in that time when present folk are sped.
And Peas and Market Hills they'll haunt no more;
When others, daily loitering in their stead,
Buy other tomes to add to their own store:
Ghost feet to himward being surely led
Shall find one bookstall on the Stygian shore.

It was published at a shilling and found a ready sale amongst friends and customers (the words are almost synonymous, the CDN commented) of one of Cambridge's celebrities.

But what do you recall of Cambridge booksellers and what was your best buy?

One of the controversial issues in Cambridge at present is the proposed removal of the public toilets from the ground floor of Lion Yard to an upper level.

Traditionally they were sited underground.

In 1901 an underground toilet was constructed at Hyde Park Corner under the shelter where people waited for the horse-drawn trams – Cambridge's first 'guided bus'. It could be a dangerous place to wait. In November 1902 two horses attached to a farm cart became restive while passing a flock of sheep in Hills Road and dashed off at great speed. They crashed into the shelter, dislodging the railings around the entrance to the public convenience and breaking the stonework in several places.

The central island was removed in 1957 to make way for new traffic signals. Other underground toilets were constructed in the mid 1920s at Mitcham's Corner and at the junction of East Road and Newmarket Road, all of which have gone.

Only Market traders now have the convenience of the remaining underground toilets below Market Hill. They made news around the world in 1924, when just after the discovery of the tomb of Tutankhamun, many treasures (including old pots), were 'excavated' from the Gentlemen's lavatories as part of an undergraduate rag dubbed 'Toot-and-cum-in'

They had also hit the news during construction.

When in 1902 the news of peace in South Africa was announced undergraduates decided to celebrate in their traditional way, with a bonfire. The entrances to Market Hill were partially barricaded by police but from every quarter the sound of penny trumpets assailed the ears and the demeanour of the crowd announced an intention to "Maffick". The crowd started setting fire to newspapers and sticks, which the police trampled out. A bottle of mentholated spirits was added, which singed one bobby's boots. Police reinforcements arrived and after a lusty tussle they drove their adversaries back.

Meanwhile another fire had started on the other side of the Hill and the police had to withdraw.

At the time work was under way on the construction of the underground toilets and this was too good a source of fuel to be ignored. The wooden fence surrounding the excavations was dismantled and soon flames rose up to 25 feet. Then the grads turned to the underground lavatories themselves. For 30 minutes half a dozen students were engaged in hauling up the framework of the doors until every bit of combustible material was deposited upon the fire.

The square was lighted up as if by day until, perspiring and weary though happy, the grads melted away as midnight approached and the flames died down. By dawn nothing could be seen except a heap of ashes and a wilderness of wreckage which attracted crowds of onlookers.

One name associated with the relief of Mafeking was that of Robert Baden-Powell, founder of the Boy Scout movement. He was in Cambridge in May 1911 to inspect a rally during which he awarded a medal to a young lad named Herbert Stone who had used the training received in the Cherry Hinton Boy Scouts to save his two little brothers and his little sister from being burnt to death at Rydal Villa, Hartington Grove. The window curtains had caught alight in their bedroom and spread to a chair containing the youngsters' clothes, then to a chest of drawers. Herbert stamped and beat the flames out just in time: the iron work of the large double bed in which the three little ones lay asleep was singed, as was the counterpane. Herbert's hands and feet were scorched and large holes were burnt in the feet of his stockings.

I published the details of Herbert's actions in one of last week's 'Looking Back' columns which brought an instant response from Bob Stone of Swavesey. For Herbert was his uncle and amongst the family treasures is a photograph showing him with his brothers, sister and that medal – a medal which is in the shape of the Swastika, later to be adopted by the Nazi party during the Second World War. Herbert went on to have an adventurous life despite being wounded during the Great War when a German prisoner he was escorting pulled a bayonet and sliced off part of his ear

But there is another mystery. For also in the picture is Hub's sister Molly who also helped in the rescue by bringing wet towels. She is shown wearing an award presented by Baden-Powell, though this seems not to have been reported at the time. Sadly the badge itself has disappeared over the years. Any more information would be welcome.

Do you have memories of Cambridge bookshops, I asked. Yes replies Mrs A.C.G.Brown of Chesterton who has written me a wonderful letter recalling her life in the book trade.

She was recruited as one of the original members of staff when Heffer's opened their Children's Bookshop in Trinity Street in 1969. It had light, moveable red tables and seats so children could sit and read undisturbed. Downstairs there was a big distorting mirror in one corner which gave an unusual perspective on life – but the Cambridge book world itself was full of unusual people.

Mrs Brown had spent her first few weeks in Heffer's old shop in Petty Cury where her colleagues were acknowledged experts in their fields. They included Mr Parassas, a Rumanian, who ran the theology department while Mr Gibbs from Balsham was an experienced bookseller: E.M. Forster and many of the older customers always asked for him personally. He had his eccentricities and never returned faulty books to the publisher but hurled them into a den behind the counter. In the basement was a lady described as "a strange bird... knowledgeable, highly prejudiced with her own way of doing things. She had a tic in one eye, which made her look as if she was winking"

There were also characters in other Cambridge bookshops including an assistant at Deighton Bell who was extremely beautiful in a classic, forties way of whom it was said 'she eats little boys for breakfast'.

One of the most memorable was the late Derek Gibbons who had a passion for antiquarian books and a truly scholarly knowledge of them. He became a firm favourite with book buyers, despite – or perhaps because of - his reputation for having been 'the rudest bookseller in Norwich'. He refused to sell to Germans or Japanese and if anybody he disliked looked as if they might come in would shout 'Nothing for you today' and put up the 'Closed' sign'.

After a period in Mill Road and Green Street, Derek moved to St Edward's Passage where he established 'The Haunted Bookshop' inventing the name "because then Americans will come in to ask why, and stop to buy the books".

Derek's ploy worked and as the building had previously been a lodging house former puzzled undergraduates were also constantly visiting to enquire about its supposed notoriety. In 1997 a cable television company even made a broadcast from the shop during which a psychic sensed a female presence. Various people claim to have seen her and testify that her appearances were accompanied by the smell of violets. The shop even features in books on Cambridge ghosts one of which explains how it was named after Derek had seen the charming apparition of a young girl with long flowing fair hair at the top of the stairs. But perhaps there is a little truth somewhere for, as Mrs Brown remembers, Derek was in love at one point with a blonde American girl who he referred to as 'the blonde ghost'.

Mention of Cambridge's last thatched cottage in Clement Place, off Round Church Street has brought memories for two readers.

Katharine Free from Cambridge writes: "My maternal grandparents lived at Number 10 Clement Place, which was the thatched cottage, for very many years. There was no water, gas or electric supply when I knew it as a child. A brass tap in an enclosed yard provided water. Opposite the cottage was a large coal shed and next to it an outside chemical loo. Indoors, a black lead stove provided heating by an open coal grate, with an oven to one side and a tank on the other for heating water, while a large black kettle sat on a trivet, to be swung over the hot coals when boiled for tea making. Lighting was by oil lamps and candles. It was a very cosy home, with two fairly large rooms downstairs and four bedrooms upstairs, approached from the living room by what we called 'the staircase in a cupboard'.

"Clement Place itself was quite wide, with tall houses up steps on the right hand side and terraced cottages behind small front gardens or yards on the left. On washdays, sheets swung on lines stretched across from house to house and woe betide anyone who left a mark while dodging in between them!"

Her cousin Betty Dickerson from Madingley Road was born there over 80 years ago when one half of the cottage was home to her grandmother Clara Slater with Mrs Camps next door. It was low and dark but had a garden with a wash-house and coal yard and there were stables nearby. From there it was a short stroll with her elder sister to Park Street School or Mrs Arnold's sweet shop. Betty has a sketch of the old house that was drawn by Lewis Todd, the News' cartoonist, and sent to the family as a calendar in the 1950s.

The recent news of the theft of 200 supermarket trolleys from Tesco in Fordham Road Newmarket left me reflecting on other occasions when such mundane items have been in the news.

They played a major part in the Jubilee celebrations of June 1977 when amongst the attractions of rustic games, music, a river boat procession and fireworks on Midsummer Common was a supermarket trolley race for women that was won by a team from Robert Sayles.

But there have been regular complaints of trolleys being discovered far from their rightful place: in August 1980 Tesco stores at Bar Hill paid out £40 to recover stray trolleys impounded by angry parish councillors. They had been dumped around the village and despite protests the store had failed to recover them. So workmen were sent on a trolley round-up and recovered 40 from roads, play areas and ditches. They were then locked in a barn and an invoice was sent to Tesco to cover the cost of the operation. The store said the price was 'fair under the circumstances'

However trolleys had been around long before that in the form of a basic flat platform for moving various objects and in this capacity have been featured on a number of occasions

In 1927 police were alerted by the management of the Rendezvous cinema in Magrath Avenue after their placard trolley, which toured the streets of Cambridge advertising the week's films, was seized by a party of merry gowmsmen. They pulled it in triumph down Hertford Street and Magdalene Street before trying to dump it in the river at Quayside. It first fell on to the landing stage but with undampened ardour the undergraduates finally consigned it to the cold depths of the Cam before going on their way rejoicing. [PICTURE OF MAGRATH AVENUE SHOWING THE REX CINEMA IN 1964] [PICTURE OF QUAYSIDE IN 1930S WHERE THE TROLLEY WAS DUMPED. IT ALSO SHOWS THE CHIMNEY OF THE ELECTRICITY GENERATING STATION MENTIONED IN THE THOMPSON'S LANE SNIPPET]

Horse-drawn trolleys gave scope for even more drama. There was much excitement in Saffron Walden in 1897 when a horse attached to a Great Eastern Railway trolley bolted from the goods yard. It went at a rapid pace up the Station road, down South road and Fairycroft road before the animal turned the corner and ran across East Street into the front of the house of Mr W. Samuell, harness maker, doing considerable damage. The trolley was broken and the iron axle snapped in two.

Next year came a similar event as a trolley belonging to Mr E. Beales, carter to the G.E.R., was being driven along the Fordham Road, Newmarket, when the animal bolted, apparently without cause. The efforts of the driver to check the animal were futile and the trolley collided with the stone steps of the Jubilee Clock Tower, then ran between two of the buttresses and a lamp-post where it became wedged.

Not all trolleys have been horse-powered. In 1923 a huge boiler mounted on a trolley towed by two heavy traction engines that was being conveyed to the Electric Light Company's works off Thompson's Lane sank into the tarmac after the road collapsed under the strain of the 40 ton combined weight. It took several hours before the boiler was extricated. [CHOICE OF PICTURE OF THOMSON'S LANE 1930S]

Then in 1924 there was excitement at Fenstanton after one of thee trolleys being towed by Thurston's traction engine caught alight. It was carrying the organ of a scenic railway and the flames quickly spread. No water could be procured so sand from the gravel pits was thrown over it. It was no good: the whole organ and the trolley upon which it was mounted completely collapsed. [PICTURE OF FENSTANTON IN 1920S]

Then there have been tea trolleys, though by February 1983 the tea lady was thought to be a dying breed. One in five had been forced to pack their tea bags because of the recession and the sight of a tea trolley on a Cambridge office floor was reckoned to be almost as rare as a Cambridge United away win

And of course the sweet trolley has also featured in many a restaurant review. In July 1975 a News food critic decided to push the boat out: At the Ferry Boat inn at Holywell we decided on avocado vinaigrette, & prawns and scallops in batter with tartare sauce at 75p and 85p. From a wide choice we selected coq au vin, the cheapest meat course at £1.95 and a steak au poivre at £2.30. Vegetables cost an extra 25p a portion and we shared the sauté potatoes, garden peas and mushrooms. The sweet trolley bore a choice of deserts, all priced at 50p. We ended with coffee and a brandy and cointreau which, with a bottle of Gevrey Chambertin brought the bill to a total of £11.50. Perhaps he should have

Yesterday Stretham celebrated Feast Sunday, part of a tradition of village life and the time when relatives return home from all parts of the country

In my childhood there used to be a parade of decorated floats right around the village led by the village bobby and a local band. From the backs of lorries or tractor trailers children - and adults - dressed as 'Red Indians', people from other lands or cavemen endeavoured to collect money in nets at the end of sticks. Sixpences, threepenny bits, even farthings – it really did not matter as long as there was something to add to the funds for worthwhile causes such as cancer research or the blind.

Such parades owed their origin to the Friendly Societies who supported their members through illness and unemployment in the days before social security or free medical care. At Waterbeach the Shepherds, Foresters and Victoria Benefit Societies combined for an annual parade from the Green through the High Street to the Baptist Chapel, where a united service was held. When in 1893 Addenbrooke's Hospital issued an appeal for financial help to maintain and improve their services the Societies responded to the call by linking their parade with a collection for the Hospital. So 'Hospital Sunday' came part of rural life

Stretham procession paused half-way for a united service when the pews were packed with a most colourful and seemingly multi-ethnic congregation. This alternated between the parish church and nonconformist chapels in the days when the village had such things.

A second element of Feast week used to be a funfair, an event eagerly looked forward to. Newspaper correspondents report how at Histon in 1900 there were roundabouts brought by Messrs Barker and Thurston, shellfish and confectionery stalls and dancing in the public houses. In Rampton one of the traction engines pulling the amusements hit a tree on the Green in 1912 - it could still be seen to be leaning years later. There was a rock stall, toy stall, coconut shy, swinging boats and shooting range - halfpenny a shot at clay pipes - or for the same money you could get a strip of liquorice, about 15 inches long.

But even then there were laments: "Village feasts have sadly degenerated of recent years, and that of Milton is a striking example", a correspondent complained in 1899. "Years ago merry-go-rounds, shooting galleries, and coconut shies were erected, but this year there are only a couple of stalls on which cheap toys and indigestible looking sweets are exposed for sale. In the licensed houses musicians play interminable polkas which are danced more or less gracefully by country maidens and their swains"

At Stretham the stalls were set up in the village streets, prompting complaints that were echoed at Fulbourn in 1901: The booths and stalls standing in the road were a great nuisance. The people in the caravans were not of the better class; they were a dirty lot and their sanitary arrangements were very bad. Little bags of filth were left about the street and proved very objectionable. Fulbourn was a respectable and clean village and it was a disgrace they should have such a state of things.

With so much fun and amusement it was little wonder that people journeyed from their own village to visit the neighbouring feast. Rampton would be packed with people from Cottenham and Willingham who walked or cycled to get there. Things were not always peaceful: writing in 1957 C. Barlow recalled how at Madingley feast “Lolworth men usually came over for a cricket match in the afternoon and in the evening the men of Girton visited the Inn. This was the time when all the children were chased indoors and the door locked. The curious went upstairs and watched from their bedroom windows while the gentlemen of Madingley and Girton enjoyed their annual battle after the Inn had closed – the men of Girton were great fighters in those days. Sometimes there was a ‘Dancing Booth’, a large tent where one could dance all the evening for one shilling – one dance cost twopence. Music was provided by a concertina and ‘fiddle’.”

Feast celebrations went on for a number of days but Thursday morning was the saddest of the week; on the way to school children would see the wagons all packed up and ready to go, on returning at dinner time the Green would be empty with just the memory to last until next year.

The travelling fairs have largely become memories themselves and it is some years since one came in the right week. So now there is a village fayre with a dog show, ox roast, stalls and dance performances along with sports events, recalling the tradition of the past

Outsiders are welcome at the Feast but it is afterwards when streets are empty and front rooms full that a feast of food and a feast of memories combine to unite families on this most important day in village life

What do you remember of life in 1986?

It was a period of financial hardship. Libraries were threatened with closure and Ely Cathedral started charging for admission. Newlyweds were told they stood no chance of buying their own homes because of rocketing prices – houses in Cambridge averaged £57,000 – and farmworkers were pressing for an increase in their minimum wage of £89.70 for a 40-hour week

But youngster on the Arbury estate had other concerns: “We did a survey of the 30 pupils in our class and found out that 30 pupils had televisions, 20 pupils had radios, 20 pupils had video-recorders, 14 had micro-computers, 12 had telephones, 11 had music centres, 10 had electric cookers, six had micro-wave cookers and five had Citizen Band (C.B.) radios. Nearly everyone in our school wears training shoes. Adidas was the most popular followed by Dunlop, the least popular was Donay. Most people spent between £10 and £20 a pair, some spent £30 and some only paid £5" [PHOTO OF ARBURY YOUNGSTERS AND THEIR TRAINERS 1987]

These details were recorded as part of an attempt to capture the essence of life by a 'Domesday Project' pioneered by the BBC. The country was divided into 'Domesday Squares' and schools and community groups asked to record what it was like to live, work and play there.

It was to be a contemporary rather than a historical survey and it used the latest technology developed by Cambridge-based Acorn computers, creator of the BBC Micro-computer that was then transforming teaching with pupils at Netherhall School leading the way [PHOTO OF NETHERHALL SCHOOL PUPILS AND STAFF WITH THEIR COMPUTERS – PLEASE USE THIS]

But very few ever got to see the fruits of all of their hard work. Not all the material was submitted – many squares are unfilled. The information once processed was published on a Laser-Disc which could only be read on a machine that was too expensive for schools to buy. Then the Discs started to deteriorate leading to fears that they would become unreadable. [BBC ERROR MESSAGE, FROM WEBSITE]

Now some of that information gathered in 1986 has been reformatted on a new 'Domesday Reloaded' website enabling those young historians to at last look back on their work of 25 years ago.

Bar Hill

We found that 64% of our sample moved to the village because the housing is the cheapest in the area, but still very convenient for Cambridge. There is also a high proportion of young and ambitious professionals who tend to stay two or three years and then move on. We hope that once the building stops, which it will do soon, the flow of people leaving the village will be balanced by those moving in. Even though so many people were forced to live here because of the high price of housing in our area, 87% of our sample is very happy living in Bar Hill. [PHOTO OF BAR HILL CHILDREN AT OPENING OF PLAYGROUND IN 1989]

Caldecote

Caldecote is nicknamed 'Tin Town' because of the way the earliest buildings were made. Some were old railway carriages, some were little more than shacks with a timber frame covered by sheets of corrugated iron. Gradually these have been replaced with permanent brick houses of very individual style. We used to live in Cambridge but a year ago we moved to Caldecote. We bought some land with an old reinforced concrete bungalow, disgustingly filthy. We started to build a new bungalow. We built the lounge and bathroom first then knocked down the back lobby and moved in

Littleport

The biggest shop in Littleport is the Co-operative supermarket, while there are newsagents, chemists, butchers etc. The main factory makes Burberry coats and employs many people. Mr.B.Wright has run his saddlery for 51 years repairing and selling leather goods as well as tarpaulins, sports and PVC articles. Thornhills Bakery, its factory dating from 1933, supplies five shops in the area. There are 10 workers making 80 different varieties of cakes. Lees Builders employ 8 people and a bulldog called Clementine. There are several lorry depots. [PHOTO OF BURBERRY FACTORY THAT CLOSED IN 1986]

Youngsters from Bottisham and Little Thetford were amongst those analysing agriculture:

“In the past there were large numbers of men employed on the land as well as work for the seasonal worker (mainly harvest time). Today, however the opportunities are not as good. As farming has become more and more machine intensive the numbers of men required has been drastically reduced. Their output has actually increased at the same time as one man can do much more work with the help of machines. Also the number of farms in the area has declined leaving fewer but larger farms thus reducing the opportunities still further”.

Chatteris - Fen Houses

We went to visit a typical farmworkers cottage. It was at the end of a track in Langwood Fen, surrounded by arable land. The hut was cramped and dark and bare and had been deserted since 1958. It was made of a brick base with corrugated sides and roof. Inside the walls were made of wood, painted in dark brown at the bottom and a slightly lighter brown at the top. There are only two rooms plus a pantry and an out-house. The main room has only an iron cooking range. The people had no mains water supply so they drank boiled water collected from the roof. For washing they used river water. A large family probably lived here in considerable discomfort, without any of the things which we think today are necessary for life, not even a lavatory!

Now the BBC is inviting people to update their information. How will things have changed in the past 25 years:

Lion Yard Shopping Centre

“There are many different shops ranging from restaurants to Early Learning Centres. There are balconies leading to the courts and to W.H. Smiths. On one balcony teenagers breakdance and gyrate to a cacophony of sound from their stereos. By the Red Lion stand buskers playing their instruments hoping for someone to drop pennies in their cases. There are tramps and drunkards ‘dossing’ around drinking beer and there is even a tramp laying on a bench covered in newspapers. There are also a lot of shoppers. Lion Yard is a busy place” [PHOTO OF LION YARD 1985]

Memories 30th May 2011 by Mike Petty

A recent story sparked Memories for Val Burton from Fen Drayton. It featured an incident reported in the News on 28th June 1924 when one of Thurston’s fairground attractions was being moved from Cambridge after Midsummer Fair:

As one of the tractor engines was nearing Fenstanton on the way to St Ives, the middle of the three trolleys it was drawing was noticed by some workmen in a gravel pit nearby to be on fire. The alarm was at once given but the flames, assisted by a stiff breeze, quickly spread and the organ of the motor scenic railway, which was on the trolley, was soon well alight.

Captain Giddings of the St Ives Fire Brigade and the police from Fenstanton arrived on the scene, but as no water could be procured, sand from the gravel pits was thrown over the fire. Despite these efforts to cope with it, the fire proved too strong and in less than half an hour the whole organ and the trolley upon which it was mounted had completely collapsed

No definite explanation can be given for the origin of the fire, but it is suggested that the outbreak was due to a spark from the engine which found its way through the protecting pieces of wire gauze on top of the chimney and set fire to the tarpaulin cover over the engine.

An eyewitness of the occurrence described it as 'the quickest thing I have ever see' All that remains of the organ and trolley is a heap of heat-twisted metal, brittle springs and discoloured cog-wheels lying on the left side of the road. The hedges on the near-side were considerably burned but serious damage to the tarmac was prevented by throwing sand upon it.

Beside the organ of the motor scenic railway, several hundred pounds' worth of other machinery was involved in the fire, and personal property belonging to the workmen was also destroyed. The total damage is estimated roughly at £2,500

But Mrs Burton can add more

'Our grandfather, Tom Desborough, was the foreman at the nearby gravel pit and later that year his employer, Mr Allen of Fenstanton, had a bungalow built for grandad and his family to save him walking from Elsworth (father was 16 at the time)

Father used to tell us that the remains of the Thurston's fire were buried under the bungalow. Although we had to have the property demolished 16 years ago no metal work or ash was found, just sand (no footing) on which the pebble dashed concrete blocks stood – no wall insulation either, no wonder it was always cold and damp

Grandad Tom bought the bungalow and eight acres for the sum of £100, when Mr Allen went bankrupt, an awful lot of money in those days. We often wonder how he managed to pay for it. Father never passed on any details as he took it all over when he got married. Grandad continued to live with us in the old bungalow until he died in 1953. Times were hard but my sister and I have happy memories of Grandad Tom. Thank you for reminding us

All this took place outside the village, opposite the present Travel Lodge, but various other travel-related stories have been reported from Fenstanton itself:

In June 1910 John Holley, a village farmer, was driving from his home when the axle of his trap broke. The wheel came off and frightened the horse, causing it to bolt. Mr Holley was thrown to the ground though his fall was somewhat broken by his coming down on the cushion of the trap which was cut into two parts. The gig was practically demolished. The horse continued its wild course along the road until stopped by Mr Burgess's yardman, a man named Jefferies, at considerable risk to his own life

In December 1910 a chauffeur in charge of a motor car had a very unpleasant experience. He was driving from St Ives to Fenstanton but when he had got to the White Bridge the water in the road was so deep that his engine stopped and he had to remain in the flood all night. PC Beecham saw the car with its powerful light just before two o'clock but did not think anything was amiss as the chauffeur did not sound his horn to attract attention. The car was discovered next morning and a horse had to be obtained to drag it out of the water.

Although they might not notice a stationery car, police were very keen to spot those which were travelling too quickly.

In October 1908 an Essex motorist was convicted of driving his car through Fenstanton to the common danger. Frederick Leith of West Mersea said he'd driven for 10 years and had never had an accident or been convicted of speeding before. He'd travelled through the narrowest part of the village at about 12 mph but had accelerated as he approached the open road.

However an old man, William Hewson, claimed he'd been doing 20 mph, which he considered dangerous. This was confirmed by a policeman undertaking a speed check just down the road. He had timed the car over a measured distance of 328 yards which was travelled in 24 seconds. This equated to 29 miles 1,680 yards an hour – all this in the days before speed cameras

Last Sunday afternoon I was taken punting along the Backs by a group of active young Americans who soon realised that such apparently sedate activity is far more strenuous than it appears from the bank.

As we navigated our way under the Bridge of Sighs we encountered battling flotillas of other punts intent on occupying the same foot of Cam.

I enjoyed the sight of familiar landmarks from unfamiliar angles and overheard unfamiliar 'facts' being conveyed to unsuspecting tourists by chauffeur punters. But many of these young men know far more about the colleges that we were passing than those of us who have never had the opportunity of prolonged residence within their courts.

For colleges are not just architectural jewels in the Cambridge landscape. They are and have been homes to generations of men and women each of whom will have memories of their time at University.

Now a glimpse of some of the people who have lived, taught, studied and served within the walls of St John's College has been published in a massive 750-page book that chronicles the college's first 500 years.

Throughout that period there have been many Johnnians that have influenced the world far outside the college gates – such as anti-slave-trade pioneers Thomas Clarkson and William Wilberforce or Sir Harold Jeffreys. He was a lifetime Fellow and Plumian Professor of Astronomy who achieved an international reputation and won many medals. But he was also a keen photographer and deposited in the Cambridgeshire Collection are some of the photographs he'd taken of the great snowfall of February 1916, when he was an undergraduate and the college was home to Army Officer Cadets, planning for war.

Not all students were academics: Cecil Beaton confided "I'm really lucky to be up here without having passed the exam & I'm awfully lucky in getting these nice rooms and they are so central. I am glad Daddy has such good whisky, because I think that's the reason that Armitage allows me here".

Then there was a one-time Senior Wrangler who was "reported for various acts of insanity as well as spreading rumour that the Junior Bursar was 'marking down all the Fellows gradually for the asylum', for inciting undergraduates to throw one of his colleagues into the Cam for contemplating divorce".

There are reflections too of the relationship with Trinity College next door which climaxed in 1922 with the decoration of the pinnacles of St John's New Court with 18 of that college's wooden lavatory seats. In comparison more recent undergraduate japes such as suspending an Austin car under the Bridge of Sighs in June 1963 seems positively simple. Although its arrival may have been due to students, its removal was down to some of the army of men and women who have been the backbone of the college over the centuries.

Porters, bedders, kitchen managers – some of whom made fortunes by lending money to undergraduates at extortionate rates of interest and booking it down as 'goods supplied' in their kitchen accounts - have kept the ship afloat. And they too have their place in the history, including a once-regular face in the City Library, Bill Thurbon who joined the college as an office boy in Easter 1920 at the wage of 15/- (75p) a week and became Bursar's clerk. His photograph is featured in the book alongside that of long-dead Fellows.

One of these is a colour study of a profoundly dejected Professor J.E.B. Mayor reflecting on the loss of the manuscript of the Latin dictionary he had been working on for 60 years. After advertising all over Europe for its return, he discovered that it had been used by his bedder to prop up the broken leg of a chest of drawers and had been in his own room all along!

There is little fear that this new history will suffer a similar fate: there are just too many fascinating details of college life to allow it to gather dust for long!

Seventy-five years ago a Cambridge Band made the headlines. The News of 6th June 1936 reported:

Friends of the Cambridge Town Silver Band will be glad to know that they are to give another broadcast on Saturday afternoon, June 14th. This will be on the 'National' wave length but all B.B.C. stations are taking the programme. On the last occasion the band opened with an original item by the conductor (Mr Robert E. Austin) called 'Cambridge Bells' which featured the melody of the Roman Catholic Church chimes. This time they will start with a new military march of Mr Austin's composition, which he has called 'Cantabrigia'.

The programme will be of a much more ambitious nature than the previous broadcast, as the BBC programme directors are insisting on bands performing a definitely higher class of music than heretofore. But Mr Austin has put forward a programme which, while not 'highbrow', is good music, catering as far as possible for all tastes

Broadcast over the Band boarded a coach to return to Cambridge where that evening they played at a promenade concert on Christ's Pieces. Despite the threat of rain more than 200 people turned out to enjoy a programme of marches and waltzes including 'Cantabrigia' and a selection from 'The Two Foscari' with which they had won the East Anglian Championship

The Cambridge Town Silver Band was one of the earlier incarnations of what is currently the City of Cambridge Brass Band. Under various names it can trace its roots back to 1910.

Their earliest days were recalled in January 1973 by Stanley Brown of Teversham. He was one of five members of that family who formed the nucleus of the band in which his father had been a leading light. The lads played cornet, baritone, euphonium, trombone and tenor horn. Stanley had started playing just after the First World War, meeting for rehearsals twice a week and playing at engagements on Thursdays, Saturdays and Sundays. These ranged from local sports and fairs to promenade concerts and garden parties. The highlight of the year was a visit to the Crystal Palace for the national brass band competition

They were always short of good first cornets and towards the end of the 1920s advertised for a new man. Along came an out-of-work pattern maker from Oldham who hadn't had a job for seven years. His name was Leonard Lamb, and he played like a dream, Stanley recalled. With him in the band they achieved their best performances ever in winning sections of both the national and East Anglian brass band championships three years running. Leonard later went on to become musical director of Fairey Aviation Band.

By then there was more harmony in the local music scene. After a dispute amongst the members over a failure to attend rehearsals and over-drinking, a number had gone their own way and started the Cambridge Albion Band. But they reunited in 1927 and decided to buy a complete set of new triple silver-plated instruments made by Messrs Hawkes of London. This would greatly improve the tonal qualities of the band and there was not another in the eastern counties with such instruments, they claimed

The Band enjoyed considerable success with prestigious concerts involving such guests as Harry Mortimer, Richard Baker, Sir Vivian Dunn, George Chisolm, Maurice Murphy, Ifor James, James Shepherd, Phillip McCann, Peter Skellern and Rod Franks.

In 1979 the band competed for the first time against the elite of the brass band world in the national championships at the Royal Albert Hall. It has regularly appeared on national and local television and radio, including an unforgettable appearance in the BBC's "Best of Brass" series, broadcast from the Assembly Rooms in Derby. One of their most memorable concerts was held in Ely Cathedral in 1981 when they played a specially commissioned work composed by cathedral organist, Dr. Arthur Wills, entitled "Symphonic Suite: The Fenlands", thought to be the first large-scale composition for organ and brass band.

Now they hope to reprise one of their earliest pieces. They have the BBC's master recording of 'Cambridge Bells' from the 1936 broadcast. This is on a 78 rpm record which they do not play for fear of damaging it. Now they would like to find a copy of the original score so that it can be performed again.

With your help 'Cambridge Bells' may once again be heard. If you have a copy of the score or can add more to the Band's history email please email manager@cambridgeband.co.uk. Or drop me a line and I'll put you in touch

Alan Cunnington has a picture that is causing him some puzzlement. It shows a group of policemen and court officials in front of the Assize Court on Castle Hill, Cambridge

There will be few who still remember this structure with its grand frontage with a row of figures along the parapet representing Law: Justice, Mercy & Power along the top. It had opened adjacent to the County Gaol in 1842 on the site of the Norman gateway of Cambridge Castle. It was the place for official proclamations, the site of assizes and general quarter sessions and the centre of County administration until a new County Council was established in 1888.

The Assize Courts were not the most convenient of buildings. There were complaints that when the jury retired to consider their verdict they were taken down a flight of cold stone steps into a narrow chamber of sordid aspect, dimly lit by three barred windows and furnished with two bare wooden forms. The justices did not want the retiring room to be too comfortable but there must have been times when juries made up their minds hastily to escape from that dungeon. A new room was built with a lavatory in 1908 but the court was still illuminated by gas and silver-tongued barristers had to halt while the custodian, armed with a long pole, leant from the dock to light it.

Things got worse in 1925 when a fire broke out in the Grand Jury Room at the front of the building destroying woodwork and furniture and causing smoke damage to other parts of the structure. As repairs were put in hand another problem was identified. Dry rot had attacked the floors and was spreading up the walls and plaster into the roof

By 1952 the whole of the structure was pronounced to be unsafe and liable to collapse at any time. The County Architect had no doubt that demolition was the only answer. But some City Councillors objected. Dry rot did not necessarily involve the demolition of the whole structure of an affected building – none of the Colleges had resorted to such drastic remedies, though many of them had been affected over the years, they argued.

At least the façade of the Assize Building with its Italian style portico supported on columns should be preserved: the Mayor suggested it should be taken down and used as a ‘Marble Arch’ for the new Spine Relief Road then being proposed. But it was to no avail and the building passed into history. Its site is now the car park for the Shire Hall that was built in place of the County Gaol in 1932

Alan’s photograph probably shows the scene at the opening of an Assize and since the Judge’s officials and the policeman on the left are wearing black armbands it was probably taken just after the death of King Edward VII in May 1910.

Alan is researching police history and thinks that one of the officers in the front, Pc 60, was Jim Keep who joined on 7th December 1907. The other officers are Pc20 and Pc44 – a number that was first allocated in 1851 though there is a big gap in the records until 1919 when Pc Yeomans had it. The other officer, Alan believes, is from the Isle of Ely, as the two forces shared the four Assizes every year with two being held at Cambridge and two at Ely.

If you can tell him more then please email Alan at his website <http://www.thebadgerslair.com> where there are various early pictures of Cambridgeshire bobbies.

Another reader, Jane Gilmour, also seeks assistance in identifying a group picture. It was taken by H Wallis who described himself as an “Art photographer” and worked from 47 Burleigh St Cambridge around 1910. Nobody will recognise the faces but can you place the building in the background

A Memories picture of an Austin car suspended under the Bridge of Sighs has brought a response from Roger Jordan who worked for St John’s College for 44 years. He was pictured on the left-hand side of the group retrieving the vehicle. Roger recalls: “At a later date the students suspended a Bond three-wheeler in the same fashion but it was down & away before the press were notified. Some of the best feats were on the “Wedding Cake” (E staircase New Court pinnacles), varying from a canoe to chamber pots even a Union Flag. It was quite a regular thing to retrieve these things with just a ladder & going hand over hand (no health & safety those days). The students on seeing us up the Wedding Cake & getting these things down would take us to the buttery for a beer”

The Coronation of King George V and Queen Mary at Westminster Abbey in June 1911 was attended by scenes unprecedented in the history of the Empire.

And Cambridge too celebrated in style.

Shops in the town centre were decorated with flags and bunting which were battered by blustery winds. This did not deter immense crowds of people deciding for themselves which tradesman had done the best. Most endorsed the judges' choice of Stetchford Dairies' premises though the Dorothy Café was a very close second. Here elegant flowers, ferns and foliage plants, red geraniums, night marguerites, Canterbury bells and blue lobelias decorated the frontage along with feathery spays of asparagus fern in the midst of which gold, red, blue and green electric lights gleamed like jewels

In Petty Cury nearly all the houses were decorated, and strings of flags and banners spanned the street. George Stace, the Mayor, illuminated his shop with coloured electric lamps and a large crown made of coloured electric lights. The Home and Colonial Tea Stores had its fascia hidden by crimson and gold hangings while the Empire Meat Company's electric EMC sign was surrounded by shields and flags

Mr Vawser's shop front was almost hidden by garlands and loops of paper flowers but Boots the chemists adorned their upper windows with real ones.

The Maypole Dairy Company combined celebration with commercialism plastering their window with numerous small Union Jacks on which were printed advertisements for their leading lines. But there was no doubting the patriotism of the German Fair which covered the front of its building with coronation bells and rings of colour crinkled paper enclosing small medallions of the King and Queen.

In Sidney Street the Gas Company showrooms featured circular pictures of the King and Queen with the letters 'G.R.' and two large stars all beautifully lit by gas jets. Not to be outdone John Johnson used coloured electric lamps to outline his windows. James Owners featured a fine East Anglian flag as the centrepiece of a string across the street while Sidney Sussex College adorned their railings with lines of coloured maps and streamers Coronation Day itself dawned early for lads of the Cambridge Boys' Brigade and Boy Scouts who gathered on Parker's Piece before marching behind the Brigade's band for a service at St Andrew the Great. Then they made their way to King's College chapel to form a Guard of Honour for the arrival of the Corporation, Board of Guardians and representatives of the Ancient Order of Foresters.

Meanwhile members of the Territorial Forces together with the Royal Army Medical Corps, Volunteer Fire Brigade and 80 postmen and telegraph messengers assembled on Market Hill before making their way to King's. Service over they followed the Cambridgeshire Regiment band along Trumpington Street to Addenbrooke's Hospital where musicians from the Gordon Highlanders who had been entertaining patients played them past

All headed to Parker's Piece which was packed with a crowd of some 10,000 people. They watched as soldiers of Cambridgeshire Regiment in their scarlet-coloured uniforms raised their rifles and fired, the puff of thin acrid smoke vanishing into the air as the dry rattle of the discharge ran from right to left along the first rank and then back along the second.

Piece proceedings concluded with the National Anthem and 'Three Cheers for the King'. But the Military involvement was not done. The scene shifted to Jesus Green where mounted detachments of the Royal Horse Artillery, Hussars and the Loyal Suffolk Yeomanry took part in a tournament featuring tent-pegging, lemon-cutting and other equestrian feats. The finale was an attack on a convoy by a party of savages which bravely beaten off by the Cambridgeshire Regiment together with the Artillery's 18-pounder guns

Still the celebrations were not done. Nearly 5,000 children wearing Coronation colours assembled at their schools before marching in orderly ranks to Parker's Piece where seats had been arranged around two platforms. The sky was dull and a brisk wind blowing but it could not spoil an entertainment of clowns, jugglers, acrobats and trick cyclists. Later grown-ups made their way to the Guildhall for a musical celebration featuring the Magpie Concert Party and a speech by the Mayor, newly returned from London where he had been watching the actual Coronation proceedings.

Nor were the villages any less patriotic. There was a luncheon at Chittering with a Coronation mug for each child, a packet of tea for each wife and a useful tool for every working man. Caldecote had swinging boats, coconut shies and sweet stalls together with a weighing machine with each guest's weight being chronicled on neat little cards. Conington played cricket and held sports until heavy rain interrupted proceedings. They tried again next day but again the weather was unkind and so was not until the Monday evening that the celebrations were concluded with dancing on the lawn of Conington Hall.

Elsworth flew a flag from the church tower – the first seen in many a year, Fen Drayton held a knife-and-fork tea and danced till late while at Cottenham there was a church service and parade. Linton had a procession followed by sports, a fancy dress competition and a decorated cycle contest.

But it was not just for the young. At Fen Ditton 82-year-old Harry Martin, who proudly boasted that he had worked on one farm for 73 years, joined the guests for a meat tea in Mr Wright's barn then participated in the concert featuring Mr Fitzherbert's gramophone. He enjoyed himself as well as any of the juniors

And so Cambridgeshire celebrated a new reign that was to see the world through a turbulent period in its history. The events of that day in June 100 years ago have been largely forgotten – but do you have a memento of the occasion?

Memories 4 July 2011, by Mike Petty

Last week our village became festooned with colourful posters announcing the arrival of a Wild West show. Then a big tent arrived and both young and old flocked to an entertainment that included musicians and tight-rope walkers. 'It was really good, exciting' was the verdict from two parishioners at widely-different ends of the age range.

Such travelling performances have long been a highlight of rural life. In 1925 Christopher Marlowe described one such show at Chatteris:

"A crowd was already gathered about the entrance to the tent, in front of which was a table where a very fat man, with a bloated face, was haranguing the youths of Chatteris and bidding them roll up in 'undreds' to witness 'this absorbing, this utterly arresting and magnetic drama,' after which 'there will be a mouth-organ competition for them as fancies theirselves.'

"This had the desired effect, and there was an immediate scramble for the sixpenny places. Now the overture, thumped out on a vile piano, announced the beginning of the drama, and a man having carefully blown out all the lamps save the two for footlight purposes, the curtain was pulled aside to reveal a miniature stage. Everything was explained to us by a prompter in the wings, who apologised for the lack of scenery and told us what the articles were supposed to be

"The evening passed merrily enough. Chatteris had not revelled in such excitement for a long time, and as we all trooped home, about eleven o'clock, we heard such comments as 'Twern't arf bad, mother. I reckon as we'll go agin next week'

But neither of these could compete with Buffalo Bill's Wild West Show that arrived at Ely in September 1903. Stables were quickly erected for 500 horses while wigwams were pitched for the Indians. From the burning sands of the Arabian desert, from the eternal snows of the Ural Mountains to the torrid plains of Uruguay, Cossacks, lancers, cavalrymen and foot soldier had come to the fens.

And the men and women of the fens came to marvel flocked to see them

The programme opened with 'The Spar-Spangled Banner' played by the cowboy band. Then came New South Wales horsemen, Mexican cavaliers, Arabs from the wastes of North Africa and the gorgeously war-painted and feather-decked Indians - Sioux, Ogallallas, Brutes, Uncapappas, Cheyenne and Apache tribes. Close behind were the US cavalry.

Once assembled all cheered as a figure with flowing grey locks, riding a superb horse, swept into the arena. This was Colonel W.F. Cody, Buffalo Bill himself, the world-renowned scout who knew more of Indian warfare than any man living.

The programme continued with Japanese jugglers, galloping gauchos and even a man jumping through space on a bicycle.

But it was the cowboys who stole the show. They rode bucking broncos, demonstrated wonderful sharp shooting and the lassoing of a horse-thief. Firing their six-shooters they drove off the Indian attack on a wagon train crossing the plain and the Deadwood Stage got through, even if peppered by arrows thicker than porcupine quills

The performance climaxed with Custer's last stand at the Little Big Horn with red limelight effects redolent of bloodshed and slaughter though the 'whoop' of the Indians was not nearly as terror-striking as expected.

Then it was over. Horses were fed and watered as tents were dismantled ready for a start for somewhere else.

A few months later, in June 1904, they were back.

This time the first of three special trains pulled into Cambridge station just after three in the morning and many people rose early to line the route to Dennis James' field on the Huntingdon Road. By two that same afternoon the audience were in their seats and the show was on. A second performance followed six hours later before the spectacle moved on once more

By contrast the showmen who visited our village had a more leisurely time: they arrived on the Sunday evening, performed for three nights, then drove away in convoy.

As before the Wild West had come and gone but will live on in the memory of those who had been there and seen it for themselves.

Pymoor is an small community at a bend in a road deep in the fens close beside the great Bedford Rivers that run parallel through the landscape.

Each year it holds an agricultural show where very large and very modern pieces of farming machinery compete for attention with heavy horses, ancient tractors, vintage lorries and much more. Amongst all the stalls was one from the Pymoor Community Archive, a group dedicated to preserving a pictorial record of the past, who featured a series of old photographs, including one that particularly caught the eye.

It shows men crossing the mighty Hundred Foot River about 130 years ago. They have moored two boats in the stream and laid wooden planks between them so they could walk to the washland beyond. Who were they, what is their story? Sadly their wonderful website offers no clues.

One who might have known was Gwendoline Stevens. She was born in 1911 at the nearby Hundred Foot Pumping Station where her father was the engineer: "I was fascinated by the big diesel engine ... my father would often let me watch him go round and adjust the drip feeds. He told tales about local people, talking as much to himself as me because the sound of the big engines was monotonous and the atmosphere stuffy, and keeping awake was something of a job. Especially during the times of high water when he would run the engine for a day or two nights, having only a brief break for sleep while his stoker took over”

As years passed that young Gwen herself married a drainage engineer, Cyril Clarke, and they had a daughter. She also grew up in a fenland pumping station, this one beside the Old West at Stretham.

“If a 100 hp beam engine could have been considered a toy, that was how I saw it”, Diana recalls. From her father she learned old ways of the fen such as catching eels with a gleeve and the complexities of working a steam engine – secrets that were normally closely guarded: “you mustn’t go high on that con-rod and when she starts to judder you must adjust that or she’ll stop, and you don’t want her to stop, you’ve got to keep moving one way or the other ...”

There was more to the job than just pumping: the drains had to be kept cleared of weeds. “Two men would be stationed on either side bank with a chain saw as wide as the drain itself and with polished wooden handles. They would lift it over the boundary fences and then making sure they had a good firm foothold on the sloping bank would start to pull it across the Drain and back in a steady rhythm. The cut weed would at first bob up in the air, then tumble sideways to lie on the surface from which it would be raked with a very long-handled rake and piled on the edge of the fields so that the farmer could plough it in”

Diana also observed the farming routines: chopping out and singling sugar beet – back breaking work often conducted by women on hands and knees straddled over the rows of seedlings with the black dirt getting up their sleeves and into the nails so they ended up more like a coal miner than a farm worker.

As a girl during the summer holidays she joined her mother picking plums and apples at Everitt’s orchards in Wilburton – Rivers, Czars, Victorias and greengage. The kids were not allowed to climb ladders but any fruit that had fallen was theirs to gnaw at, ripe or not. They made dens in the wooden fruit boxes, were chased by wasps, covered with dust, sticky with fruit juice and exhausted by knocking off time. Then it was home on their bikes to allow their weary mothers to cook the evening meal for husbands at half-past four.

Diana married and left the fen but has never really broken free from the black soil of her childhood. Now she has been listening again to tape recordings she made years ago of her parents talking about their grandparents. To these she’s added her own in a booklet entitled ‘Parallels’

In its page are Ted Lowe the one-handed carrier who was such an asset that the village collected money to replace his horse when it died, Charlie Parnell the butcher, Cruger Gillett, the pig-man who boiled surplus potatoes for the saddle-backed pigs he reared – potatoes the children would steal and eat. Then there is Finchey, a dear gentle old horse keeper who was always welcoming to a child with not much to do.

Percheron horses were used to pull the cutter-binder, to plough and draw carts. But are these memories from Diana or her parents – or from the youngsters who stood captivated at this year’s Pymoor show as the mighty monsters demonstrated their strength once more.

“Parallels” is available from Diana Cockrill at 57 Smitherway, Bugbrooke, Northampton NN7 3PT for £10 including postage. ISBN 978-1-4520-8113-7

Memories 18th July 2011 by Mike Petty

Last week the News reported the conviction of a gang of burglars who had targeted dozens of local homes. But despite the distress they caused their victims these lads had nothing on two villains of over 200 years ago.

After an early life of petty crime Richard Kidman had decided to learn some trades. He took up clock-making, plumbing and glazing which gave him ready access to college buildings. His accomplice William Grimshaw also knew his way around the colleges - for he was a chimney-sweep

Together over the next four years they conducted a series of robberies which defied the vigilance of the police and kept the whole of Cambridge in a continued state of amazement and alarm.

Their first robbery took place in August 1796 at the treasury of King's College where the college plate had been locked up for the summer. Using his clock-making skills Kidman made a copy of the key, stole the silver and locked the door up again. It was several weeks before anybody knew it had been pinched. Grimshaw used the same method to let himself into the buttery at St Catharine's College and a Fellow's room at Trinity.

Now they were ready for something bigger. Kidman cut keys to the great iron gates at the back of Trinity College and let himself in. He left with a sack so full of silver that he could hardly lift it.

A robbery of this magnitude caused a great alarm and Bow Street Runners stopped every cart on the turnpike road to London. In Cambridge police searched Kidman's house where they found tools of all sorts. Rather than raising their suspicions they came away full of admiration for his skills as a clockmaker! He was a good bricklayer too - for the High Constable actually leaned up against a wall in the cellar behind which he'd just bricked up the college silver!

The burglars became bolder: Emmanuel Master's Lodge, Caius Combination Room and Christ's College were robbed successfully, though they were disturbed during a second break-in at Emmanuel College and fled leaving their booty behind. Then Grimshaw climbed down a chimney he'd been employed to sweep at Trinity and carried off the treasure in the soot bag.

But all the while they were planning their biggest ever robbery, an enterprise which required all their courage and skills.

One night they entered King's College, stole the key to the outer door of the Chapel and let themselves in. Once there they worked on the interior locks. But these being antique were a real challenge and it took a week, returning each night, before they had opened all the locks except one. But by now Grimshaw had had enough - 'the place looked so awful, that he trembled every time as if he had the ague'. His panic communicated itself to Kidman and they abandoned the robbery.

This might have been the end of the story, were it not for the man who was helping to dispose of the loot. He encouraged and chivvied them to return. Eventually Richard went back, cracked the last lock and found a treasure chest. He picked it up, shook it, then panicked and put it down again before letting himself out empty-handed. Once more he was pressured to go back and this time brought out a locked box containing gold and silver.

The robbery of King's College Chapel caused outrage and every college increased its security. It didn't prevent the pair removing sackfuls of treasure from Gonville & Caius College, though it took six weeks of undetected nightly raids to accomplish.

Things then quietened down but in January 1801 the house of an Alderman was entered and a considerable quantity of plate stolen. The old suspicions were immediately rekindled. Police searched Grimshaw's property in Newmarket Road but found nothing. They then arrested and interrogated Kidman; after a week he cracked.

Back went the police to William Grimshaw's house, this time they decided to pull it down, brick by brick. As they did so they revealed hidden cavities containing the Alderman's silver together with various items of college plate he'd not disposed of.

The trial took place at the County Assizes. Grimshaw made no defence and the judge sentenced him to death. At this he broke down, begging for mercy and bringing tears to the eyes of the jurymen. It was no avail: too many colleges had been robbed to allow for any mercy in this world. He was hanged at Cambridge castle on 28th March 1801.

Kidman was transported to New South Wales for life. But he was back in Cambridge within seven years where he settled down to his old job as clockmaker and died in January 1832

Ely's history has come under the spotlight as never before with the production of major works by its two principal lady historians

Both acknowledge the assistance of one man. Reg Holmes was a railwayman who'd devoted many years to researching the city's past, delving deep into its ecclesiastical documents and amassing a considerable collection of books and illustrations that lined the walls of his home in Fieldside.

Anne Holton-Krayenbuhl consulted him in 1984 when researching the story of the ancient former Three Blackbirds public house in Broad Street. Reg had introduced her to a remarkable survey compiled on behalf of the Prior by Richard Hildersham and Thomas Hervy who back in January 1417 had worked down each street, road or lane recording details of the residents.

For centuries copies of this ancient document have been preserved amongst the Cathedral archives and in the British Museum, its significance appreciated by a handful of scholars able to decipher the ancient handwriting and translate the medieval Latin. People like Anne. For the rest of us it was literally a closed book.

But now the text has been published for the first time with a reproduction of the Latin script on one side and her translation on the other.

It shows that starting with the stretch from the High Bridge to Castle Hithe the clerks had continued to Potters Lane, Baldock's Lane, Winfarthing Lane and Liles Lane, past the gate to the Bishop's vineyards and an old mill near Turbutsey.

And in Broad Lane John Dunham, Margaret Frank and John Brewer lived near Thomas Hervy – one of those who compiled the survey - who rented a building that that later became the Three Blackbirds, the property that had sparked Anne's initial interest

Fast forward over 500 years to 1933 and the Ely Red Book Directory repeated the exercise, once more conducting a street-by-street survey. This shows that in Broad Street a Mr Holmes had a workshop only two doors away from the residence of Thomas William Blakeman, the owner of a Leather Factory.

Thomas and his wife Hannah had a daughter named Pamela who attended Ely High School and later became a teacher at the City of Ely College. She became a Blue Badge Guide and a Trustee of Ely Museum and in 2009 was awarded the Freedom of the City.

Pam Blakeman had been inspired to take up a keen interest in Ely's history by Reg Holmes and on his death in 1983 Reg had bequeathed her his entire collection of local photographs, ephemera and research material.

Now she has spent months working with Hugo Brown of Wilburton to ensure that much of that material can be shared with other researchers. More than 1,700 pictures together with half-a-dozen maps and other items have been linked with detailed indexes to unlock the story of Ely as never before.

They show that in 1903 a man named John Durham was landlord of The Rifleman public house in Back Hill literally just round the corner from the Broad Street property rented by his namesake of 1417!

This wonderful resource has been produced on a CD-Rom that can be searched by anybody who has an interest in exploring the past.

And a computer.

But what if you don't have a computer?

Now over 700 of Pam's most interesting pictures have been compiled on a DVD that can be played on a television.

Old pictures merge one into the other, some even changing colour before your eyes. For nearly two hours it takes you down memory lane to every area of Ely – its river, roads and railways, the shops and market, pubs and hotels, schools and sport, people and events. And then there is the Cathedral itself.

Here the soundtrack switches from dance music of the twenties to the sound of the organ as pictures of the past explore the interior and exterior magnificence of the building that has dominated the city for centuries, with some engravings depicting it as it was when Richard Hildersham knew it 600 years ago.

The topography of medieval Ely edited by Anne Holton-Krayenbuhl is published by Cambridgeshire Records Society – ISBN 978-0-904323-22-1 at £18

Memories 1st August 2011 by Mike Petty

As children start on their long summer school holidays many will wonder just what to do with their time. In the past this was not a problem, for the 'Harvest Holiday' was meant to be just that: an opportunity for farmers to take advantage of young muscles to help in the busiest time of the year.

In 1952 Cambridgeshire Conservative and Horticultural Society asked the County Council whether arrangements could be made for schoolchildren to assist in the potato harvest. There was a shortage of labour and food was more essential than education in the case of boys between 14 and 15. The County MP agreed saying: "I don't think it does any harm to children that they should lend a hand in gathering the potato or any other harvest"

In September 1953 the News appealed for people to accommodate 800 German students who were coming to help farmers harvest potato and sugar beet crops. Traditionally families from London had journeyed into the fens to help with the fruit picking at places like Friday Bridge near Wisbech and this developed into working holidays with one farm camp in 1968 expecting between 400 and 500 visitors during the peak harvest season, each bringing their own Wellington boots and thick gloves. They would recover their £6-a-week accommodation costs by piece-work in the fields, picking strawberries, gooseberries or raspberries and later plums, apples, beans and potatoes, with the farmer supplying packed lunches, sheets, blankets and pillows.

But there was another group whose importance has been largely forgotten: these were the gangs of Irishmen who came over in numbers to supplement the workforce in the years following the Second World War.

As Rex Sly of Crowland recalls: “One of them would find suitable men who wished to pick potatoes and gather around him a 'Paddy gang' of between four and six people. They would come over to one of the Fen towns and frequent the pubs where farmers went to look for potato pickers. Certain pubs were renowned as 'Paddy pubs'. I remember going around some of these with my father looking for Irish labour in the 1950s”.

Most farms provided accommodation to house these gangs either in empty cottages that were called 'Paddy kips' or 'Paddy huts'. These huts were usually purpose-built in nearby paddocks or in the farmyards. They were constructed mostly of brick or were ex-Second World War Nissen huts and often only had one room, similar to the army barracks-type accommodation. Inside would be beds or bunks, table and chairs and a calor gas or solid fuel cooker. Toilets were often soil type outside and washing facilities were simple.

They were very basic even in those days, Rex recalls, yet the occupants always appeared to be of good humour, especially after returning from the local pubs. They could earn good wages on piece work and most of their earnings were sent home to their families in Ireland.

“I remember their needs were simple but I do also remember they never skimped on food: hard work requires calories. They would buy good joints of meat and invariably have flitches of very fat bacon hanging from the ceiling, and they ate copious amounts of it for breakfast and lunch.

“Beer was a very important part of their diet, keeping the local pubs going with a good trade. It was a common sight to see droves of these men on a Sunday, which was a day of rest, going to a local Catholic church in the towns. Publicans knew this and after Holy Mass they made them very welcome in their 'tap bars'. One local pub down at the bottom of a long fen road was reputed to bring a bath tub into the bar and fill it with beer. When the Irishmen arrived they could fill their large jugs directly from the bath and replenish their pint glasses much quicker than they could get the beer out of the barrel.”

By the 1960s potato harvesting machines were being used extensively on the black fen and silt soils but where potatoes were still being grown on the heavier fen soils, and clods were difficult to separate from potatoes, handpicking was still carried out by the Irish labour force into the 1970s.

Entry into the Common Market in 1972 greatly increased the profitability of cereal growing which influenced the heavy land farmers to cease growing potatoes. This was the start of the demise of the Irish labour in the Fens and one of the last gangs of Irish potato pickers was noted at Bourne Fen, Lincolnshire in 1973

In his latest book Rex has charted the changes in agriculture from land reclamation, small-holdings and horsepower to aerial spraying and multi-national workforces, interviewing smallholders and drawing upon his own experiences to pay tribute to the families who fight to feed us all.

Did you help out in the harvest fields or do you have memories of Irish potato pickers – write to Mike Petty at the News

This week a new chapter in the story of Cambridge transport begins with the opening of the guided bus to St Ives, Huntingdon and beyond.

It is not a new concept. Cambridge had a guided bus system back in Victorian times, only then it was called a tram.

The original scheme ran smoothly, in contrast to the protracted hold-ups of the modern version.

The proposals were first aired at the end of November 1878 when two groups, each called the Cambridge Tramways Company published their plans. One proposed a line from the Station straight down Sidney Street to Huntingdon Road with another branch from Hyde Park Corner to Newmarket Road.

The other had a more modest route from the Station, along Lensfield Road and Trumpington Street as far as the Senate House. It was this that was agreed though soon it was extended to include another line down Regent Street to Christ's College

The first step was to obtain an Act of Parliament a process that had completed its legislative passage within nine months.

Even before that work had started on the arduous task of installing the track along Hills Road and by September the section to Christ's College was complete. A test vehicle ran on 13th October 1880 and a fortnight later came its official inspection. The Town Clerk, Improvement Board Surveyor, Company Directors and others joined the Board of Trade official on the first run. There were no snags and the new route was declared ready to go less than two years after the scheme had been mooted.

The official opening on 28th October attracted great interest and the following day 801 people travelled in the six tramcars that ran at fifteen-minute intervals from the Post Office to the station. Next month the line from Hyde Park Corner to Market Hill was opened to be followed a short while later by a track along Gonville Place to the Tramway shed off East Road. Other minor extensions followed until the route was complete. It was not all plain sailing: the turn from King's Parade into St Mary's Street was somewhat sharp, causing timid passengers to fear that the tram might topple over and had to be realigned

One concern was over the time it took to get from the station to the town centre. It was not that the trams were particularly slow but as there was only a single track they had to pull into passing places when meeting an approaching tram. Passengers could board anywhere along the route, which led the calls for designated tram-stops, and delays could be cut by the issue of season tickets or the installation of an honesty box into which fares could be dropped.

The speed was literally one horse-power and that single animal which found difficulty pulling the weight of a fully-laden tramcar, especially after double-deck vehicles were introduced. On Saturdays, when the crush was at its worst, it was not unusual for passengers to jump off and give the animal a push to get it going. Letters poured in from animal-lovers but the RSPCA decided they were well-stabled and looked-after. The Company experimented with two-horse working and later came suggestions that the trams should be electrified. But the prospect of overhead cables disfiguring the streets were too horrendous to contemplate

When competition came in the form of horse-drawn omnibuses the Company countered with horse-buses of its own. Motor buses were launched in 1906 and despite initial problems flourished under the name 'Ortona' whose successors are now running along the Guided Busway to St Ives

Inevitably there were accidents: in August 1900 the driver of Great Eastern Railway van was killed after colliding with a tram along Gonville Place, the custodian of the Perse School for Boys was knocked down as he tried to cross the road in a heavy rainstorm and 12-year-old Florence Ebbon died after falling as she got off a tram.

The main problem was the track.

The basis of the permanent way was a six-inch deep concrete bed upon which were laid transverse wooden sleepers to which the steel girder rails were fastened. At its opening the track was described as 'of so permanent a character that the heaviest locomotive may pass over it with perfect safety'. But vehicles were damaged by crossing and recrossing the lines and cyclists suffered many upsets.

It was the cost of maintaining the lines that proved decisive. The Tramways Company negotiated a fee for the Corporation to repair the roads but it was a charge its competitors did not have to meet and prices rose at a time when its income was falling.

By 1912 the Street Tramways Company was fighting for its existence and two years later gave up the struggle

The final day, 18th February 1914, was the busiest the trams had ever seen: they were packed as people took their children for a last ride. The last tram left the station at 6.25pm guided by Ephraim Skinner who had driven for the firm for 34 years.

The vehicles and horses were sold off. But Cambridge had not seen the last of the tramlines. For the expense of removing them was not something to be incurred as the country drifted to War and sections of line were discovered during road repairs in July 1927 and November 1976.

The Cambridge Street Tramways epitaph was written by Will Thomas of the Black and White Concert Party

Who killed the Tramways?
I said the motor bus,
For there wasn't room for both of us
I killed the Tramways

Now other 'poets' are praising its successor

News of the outbreaks of unrest in London and other cities has spread around the world. It is of course nothing new. Various local villages have seen 'riots' over the centuries with Littleport always being cited after the outbreak of disturbance in 1816.

But there was another at Fenstanton in April 1789 after the Rev John Hammond, a retired minister, refused to allow his labourers time off to join in celebrations for the recovery of 'mad' King George III. Other villagers were incensed at his lack of patriotism and threatened to break his windows. So the Reverend determined to defend his property. He locked his gates and doors and stood guard with a loaded blunderbuss and bayonet. Alongside him armed with a scythe attached to a long pole stood his servant who had bolstered his courage by an excess of liquor. The sight of this drunken man put villagers 'into bodily fear' and they called the constable who had to read the riot act before peace was restored.

Some of the worst outbreaks of unrest took place in 1830 when agricultural labourers felt themselves under attack through the lowering of wages and the introduction of agricultural machinery.

Disturbances broke out across Cambridgeshire. At Balsham 200 farm labourers met demanding increased wages and there were similar gatherings at Horseheath and Shudy Camps. As the situation worsened one of the county's Members of Parliament travelled home so he could be on hand should the situation deteriorate into the full-scale riots that people feared.

Farms were set on fire at Coton, Bassingbourn, Somersham, Eaton Socon and Pampisford Mills. Elsewhere between 40 and 50 men assembled in Sawtry and started to demolish two threshing machines which were seen as the cause of much of the problem. They were joined by a larger group from Upton and Alconbury who wrecked machines at Alconbury Hill, Stukely Lodge and Monk's Wood. Soon the mob numbered between 200 and 300 who continued on to Buckworth while others made their way to Stilton.

But now landowners organised to defend their homes and after several skirmishes the ringleaders were sent under escort to Huntingdon gaol. There a number of special constables had been sworn in and despatched to the villages where insurrections had occurred. Under cover of darkness they surprised and arrested 25 of the labourers who had been involved, together with three poachers who happened to blunder into their path.

Then just when things seemed to be quietening down came rumours that a large body of rioters were on their way to break open Huntingdon gaol and liberate the prisoners. Several active young men formed themselves into troops of cavalry and infantry, 60 of the principal farmers also came forward while 300-400 men were sworn in as special constables.

At March the magistrates were told that a gang of 200-300 agricultural labourers, headed by a number of poachers, were approaching from Northamptonshire and Huntingdonshire, destroying property as they went. Everybody considered the labouring population of the town to be as peaceable, loyal and satisfied as any in the country. If March rioted, nowhere was safe. People were urged to come forward to be sworn in as special constables. Soon 400 were prepared to fight and an alliance was formed with Whittlesey pledging that should one town be attacked the other would come to its defence.

Meanwhile in Cambridge itself over 800 respectable townspeople assembled at the Guildhall to be sworn in as special constables after rumours that an attack would be made on the colleges and the University Library burnt down. But in the event, not the slightest disturbance occurred and the episode hardly rates a footnote in the history of the town.

Magistrates had been placed in difficult circumstances; they were literally in the front line, being prominent landowners in areas threatened with conflagration. Some sympathised with the labourer's case and recommended the establishment of a uniform rate of wages and the discontinuance of threshing and other machinery.

But the Government insisted that all magistrates demonstrate a firm resistance to such demands, especially when accompanied with violence and aggression. Notices were issued warning of the penalties for various offences: it was death for setting fire to any church or chapel, house, stable, coach-house, shop, mill, granary or any building carrying on any trade. It was death for any persons who riotously or tumultuously assembled together and by force demolished any building, bridge or wagon-way. It was death for any who set fire to any stack of straw, hay or wood.

Such sentences proved effective in both quelling the riots and stoking up resentment.

Who knows what the answer is this time.

With farmers' fields filled with massive machines Lorna Delanoy has been reflecting on harvest times in years gone by.

She writes: "Mechanisation has changed the Fen Farming scene completely in my lifetime. When I was a child, the Summer Holidays, all six weeks of them, were known as the Harvest Holidays. My Granddad was one of a team employed to 'take the harvest' at the Hinton Hall estate, six miles from Ely. Fields were much smaller than they are today but still they took families days to harvest. 'One man went to mow' was a popular song and it really did portray the fact that in years gone by a gang of mowers was needed, each man with his own scythe to 'mow the meadows'."

P.H. Emerson in his book 'A son of the fens' published in 1892 described such work as if told in dialect by one of the harvest-men:

Tuesday night a boy came and told me Mr Gilbert was going to begin harvest in the morning so Wednesday morning I got up soon and met Joe, for he was going along to do a harvest for farmer Gilbert too. We went to the blacksmiths and bought our scythes – three & six each – and they weren't good neither, I slit too that harvest. I got a pair of gauntlets and a big straw hat from the shop.

We went back to the blacksmiths to grind our scythes. All the gang were there – lord and all – some of them fitting new sticks to the scythes and some of them putting in tacks and some of them making grass nails and fitting them.

Joe and I began to hang ours, after we ground them, so I took my Fanny – we always named them after our fancy girls or wives, and I hung her. Joe he hung his full length, but I took mine in two inches. There was a younker there that couldn't hang his so I say 'I'll hang it for you Josh'. 'Do bor', he say. I hung it and he took it and said 'Ah bor I can mow with that'

Then away we go with our baskets strung on the end of our scythes and our reap hooks in our hands. We went into the piece to make a beginning. Bor that were a bad piece. There were thistles and dindles and foul grass and clover– we didn't like that.

The lord he cut in first. He started in the gate and he began to cut. We always round off the corners for the cutter. We set down our things just inside the gate. There were eight of us beside the lord and his chummy what tie up after he start in. We cut two or three sheaves and tied them up – just to make a beginning, and then we took off our guddles and rub bags and laid them together and covered them up with wheat so that shouldn't rain – that was unlucky to leaves them rubs uncovered. If you do that would be bound to rain.

Next morning we begun in earnest. Five o'clock. We started in and cut the corner round with the scythe. Bor that were a bad piece. There were a lot of funky places and all – it was 'Here come Mr Funky' all day – that's where it gets beaten down by the rain.

'That cut none too fit', says Joe. 'That's rather ripe – that might have been cut a'fore,' say another. 'Am I to have this spell, or will you' I ask Joe. 'I think I'll have the first spell mine's a new scythe, I want to get her an edge'. 'How does she do it' I asked as I was taking off after him. 'I think she'll come to an edge. I think you'd better have a whet'.

And so we'd turn up and sharp, then start on again a little bit further. Then I say 'Let me have a try to see how she hang' and he said 'alright, I'll have another sharp then you can have a try.' He'd stop and sharp and I'd take her and mow a stroke or two – 'Bor that hangs like a fiddle, I think though she's ligging at the point a little. Where are our other chummies'. There they be, they're holding up their hands – beer-o. We'll go and get some cocoa

Time we're after that the cutter comes and the lord get up on it. He started on the left side of the piece and go round and round to the right till he come up with nothing. We had to follow and tie up directly the cutter started.

So we go on tying up till noontime when away come the wives and the little girls with the dinners. Then we make a little house with the sheaves and start to get our dinners at half after twelve. Half after one the lord would get up and off things and away we'd go. And so we'd go on till fourses – and then away would come the old girl with fourses at half after four to five – most of the old girls would come because they'd done work at home. They'd bring baked pears, apples, bread and butter, cucumbers and plum cake.

We was allowed half a hour for fourses and after that we wouldn't cut no more. Some of us would go shocking, and some of them racing to see who could get to the end first, shocking up, whilst others hauled in sheaves. We'd stop till nine o'clock shocking. And after that we asked the lord 'What time in the morning'. 'Well', he say, 'that all depend on the weather. If that's a dry morning we'll be here at five'. 'Aye aye' we all say. And then he say 'John you go and get the horse up of a morning and I'll come and help you to yolk'. 'Alright', John say, 'four o'clock?' – 'yis'. And then he'd say 'Night y'go lads. 'Night y'go we'd answer and off we go home.

Does any of this strike a chord with you. Did you wield a scythe in the harvest field – sent me your memories

Residents of Herbert Street and Springfield Road are planning a Street Party and are seeking assistance from News readers who may have memories of the area.

Mary Burdett is leading the research into its history. She writes: "I moved to Herbert Street in November 1974 and have lived there ever since. From the start, my neighbours were very friendly and I got to know many of them, particularly the older ones, who walked down the road to the Chesterton Road end to catch buses into town.

"There was a corner shop called "The Patchwork Orange" which sold patch-work items handmade by the proprietor. Other businesses in the road were Ginn and Sons' Builders Yard, at the Milton Road end, now replaced by modern terraced houses, and the mill (currently an architect's offices) in which a loom was used to weave samples for potential buyers elsewhere".

She continues: "People I remember are Mr Proctor at No. 8, Mrs Pomeroy who used to feed her black toy poodle on beef steak and Mrs Royston who walked her elderly Sheltie dog down the road every day. My next door neighbour, Mrs Martha Langley, who died around 1985, aged over 90, used to tell me that she could remember the time before houses were built on Gilbert Road".

Mary has trawled through Directories which show that many of the residents of Herbert Street she had met in her early days there had been living there for many years before - it was quite a settled population. They also reveal that there has always been an eclectic mix of occupations with residents such as a minister of religion, boat builder, coal porter, tobacconist, dressmaker, classics tutor etc. And so it is still today.

Herbert Street, linking Chesterton and Milton Roads, was part of a massive expansion of housing following the enclosure of the Chesterton fields from the 1850s and was probably named by Francis Thoday the builder after his son Herbert Searle Thoday who was born about 1854.

One of its first residents was a policeman, Walter G. Turrall who had reached the rank of Chief Superintendent by 1863 when records show that his weekly pay was three pounds week soaring to four pounds and nine pence by March 1872. His income was boosted by that of his wife, Ann, who was employed as a female searcher at the police station

Some details of his duties have come to light. In 1867 he was sent down to London to make enquiries about a man accused of drawing on false cheques at Mortlock's Bank. Later that year he was praised for the way he had ensured that Guy Fawkes Night had been peaceful, enforcing a magistrates' ruling banning fireworks.

His colleagues prevented potential disaster in January 1907 when a shed caught fire in Springfield Road. It was spotted a policeman who sprinted from Ferry Path to tackle the blaze. He was followed within three minutes by four others, including a sergeant and the danger was soon averted. It gave the lie to a common complaint that a policeman on night duty in Chesterton was as rare a sight as a dead donkey.

When a News photographer visited Herbert Street in 1967 he found motorists were using it a handy place to park and youngsters had less space to ride their bikes. But were you one of them or do you remember their names. And can you add anything to the story of Herbert Street and Springfield Road or the folk who have made it their home.

Mary has several specific questions:

When was the corner shop last used as a grocers? She knows from the Trade Directories that it was still in use in 1965/66 with Mr W. Nunn.

When were the car showroom and flats at the Chesterton Road end of Herbert Street built?

When was the road closed at the Chesterton Road end, turning the road into a cul de sac?

What was Bindon House? It is mentioned as being number 54 in Herbert Street.

You can email her at mryburdett@gmail.com or drop me a line and I'll put you in touch

James Greenwood was born in 1832 and began a career in journalism. He wrote novels, children's books, short stories and collections of journalism. Then his brother, who was editor of The Pall Mall Gazette, suggested James spend some time as a tramp. The ensuing articles entitled "A Night in the Workhouse" were published in 1866 and caused a sensation with their graphic descriptions of the casual wards where men and women found a bed. General Booth, of The Salvation Army, called it "The beginnings of the reform of our poor law"

Greenwood wrote and lectured as the 'Amateur Casual' for the next thirty years, producing further observations of the poor districts of London. All this is well documented.

What is less-known is that in August 1911 he turned his attention to Cambridge, contributing an article to the Cambridge Weekly News entitled 'A Night in Cambridge Casual Ward'

He noted how Cambridgeshire roads were filled with men and women tramping from place to place. The 'Weary Willies' and 'Slippery Janes' were "padding the 'oof', most of them intent on going 'Tater pickin' on the big farms in the fens.

But out of every hundred 'travellers' along the 'Lone Main Drag' only 10 percent were genuine unemployed actually seeking employment. Of the others about a third were ex-soldiers, many, even in their tattered garments, still well-set-up stalwart men, from whom a solid regiment might be drawn. Then there was a sprinkling of women and children, poor souls, degraded – lost! The puny babes in soap-box vehicles, mounted on disused wringing machine wheels, loll inert in uncomfortable positions, drugged often to quietude by sips of beer or spirits.

According to Greenwood the vagrants visiting Cambridge could be divided into four classes.

First the 'Gagger', a vagrant of the first water, a capital judge of human nature, whose modus operandi was to 'pull up' benevolent-looking personages or undergrads in the streets and 'pitching the fork' – telling a pitiful tale – ask for alms

Second came the 'Griddler', an obnoxious way-farer, who, taking up a position in some bye-street, clasped tightly the lapels of his well-worn coat, and in a raucous voice hurled on the air such ditties as 'Oh, where is my wandering boy tonight?'

The 'Moucher' or door-thumpers were well-known to Cambridge householders. Carrying a small tin can - his 'drum' he termed it - this vagrant warily appeared at the back doors of people's houses with a pitiful appeal for tea, hot water or food.

The last class of roadster was the genuine unemployed man seeking work. But owing to pride or of experience, they often went hungry, and not finding work, gradually drifted into the ranks of the regular tramps. The ancient 'Weary Willie' said "Once a tramp always a tramp" and "once a man gets a taste of casual ward life he seldom loses it". From Ely workhouse in the shadow of the water tower, they plodded past the gaunt exterior of Chesterton workhouse, preferring the comparative luxury of the one in Mill Road

Greenwood joined an old weather-beaten tramp as he plodded along from Ely. "Lor matey", he said "Cambridge 'spike' aint such a bad 'un. Yer'll find it pretty free and easy an' the work ain't nowt"

Six o'clock saw Greenwood with four other "roadsters" invading the sacred precincts of the Police Station opposite the University Arms, where they needed to procure a ticket of admission to the 'Spike'. He was required to furnish particulars of name, age, occupation, destination, birth-place and height, all of which were registered in the 'Books of Casuals'

Then he joined the column of men crossing Parker's Piece, attracting curious glances from visitors not used to a sight that was all too common to local residents. As he made his way along Mill Road Greenwood purchased a pennyworth of tea and sugar from a kindly grocer. Then on arriving at the Workhouse lodge he handed in his small possessions, supplied further information to the porter and then underwent a cursory search.

In his article he records what happened next:

"Round t'yer left an' in'ter the first door' directed one of the inmates on duty, and I found myself in the bathroom, where, if required, each 'Weary Willie' could indulge in the pleasant luxury of a hot bath. But the 'reg'lar' is no lover of cleanliness. 'Lets the cowl inter yer bones', he says "Receiving my supper, 8ozs of "dry rooty", alias bread, I and my tramp friend, brewed two pints of strong, milkless tea. Then I was shown to my bedroom, a small cell furnished with a bedstead, straw bed and three dingy rugs as a covering. Here I consumed my meal and listened to the conversation of the occupants of the other cells as they compared notes between their meals. About 7.30 I undressed and arranged my bed, creeping between the dingy rugs with no little trepidation.

"At 6 o'clock the next morning I was aroused and, quickly dressing, received 8ozs of bread as my breakfast. Then we washed, sat about or talked of the coming 'drag' (journey) until 7, when the porter arrived, marshalled us in the yard, and allotted to each a task to be performed in return for the accommodations provided by the ratepayers.

"Six reg'lar vagrants were put to stone breaking, and so small was their tasks that most of them finished within two hours. Others were set to pick oakum, or to work the pump, while I, with three young vagrants, were ordered to clean the establishment. My share consisted of washing out ten cells and cleaning a long passage, and this task I managed to finish just after 9 o'clock. Then I was free to depart."

Such was the regime of Cambridge Casual Ward at Mill Road Workhouse. "It is certainly governed in a humane manner, and there is a lack of the bullying element among the officials so often found in such institutions", he concluded.

But was his reporting accurate, do you have memories of tramps – or have you padded the roads yourself

Doubt still surrounds the future of one of Ely's most dominant buildings, the magistrates' court on Lynn Road.

Its interesting, and largely forgotten history dates back to 1820 when Parliament passed an Act for the construction of a new Sessions House together with Houses of Correction at Ely and Wisbech.

It was to replace one of the two prisons in Market Street – then known as Gaol Street. While the former Bishop's Gaol still stands and is home to Ely's Museum, there was also a Bridewell next door. This had been built in 1651 and was in a poor state of repair: inspectors in 1811 described how it included a 'strong room' which had 34 iron bars across the floor to which inmates were chained.

The new Sessions House with its white portico front was designed by Charles Humphrey of Cambridge and completed in 1821. Edward Christian, one of the Chief-Justices of the Isle - the man who had sentenced the Littleport Rioters to hang just five years earlier - praised the elegance and beauty of the structure. As well as 'a handsome and commodious new court room' the building housed a chapel and prison infirmary.

Behind it was erected a prison for those convicted of larcenies, misdemeanours and other minor offences as well as debtors owing less than 40/-. Those owing £10 or above continued to be placed in the Bishop's gaol.

The new gaol had 16 single cells for criminals together with dormitories for debtors and women. There were four day rooms warmed by stoves in severe weather, although the convicted were allowed fuel only on Sundays. It was entered through the Keeper's house from which there was a partial inspection of the four exercise yards.

But conditions were quickly condemned. In 1827 the Chief Justice described it as one of the most ill contrived and inconvenient places he had ever seen. There was no room for the proper classification of prisoners or means of keeping them clean and faulty drains meant that the exercise yards flooded. It was too late to remedy these evils but it was a great misfortune that the building had been left in its present state, he commented

It was also too easy for prisoners to escape – one simply slipped away from the line of convicts returning from chapel on Sunday and hid in the Governor's coal cellar before calmly walking off. Even so the prison became overcrowded, though conditions eased after the Bishop's Gaol closed and some inmates were transferred to that building.

In 1842 plans were made for a larger gaol attached to the east side of the earlier building. It was designed by James Basevi the architect and comprised two storeys with cells in three tiers opening onto a lofty corridor with cast iron staircases leading to galleries.

Ely at last would have a gaol fit for purpose.

Instead it proved a disaster. The design was flawed: one woman prisoner simply climbed on the roof and dropped down into the street.

But there was something worse. At first the dampness of the new brickwork prevented its occupation by prisoners, who were removed back to the old gaol until it dried out. Then the inmate's health deteriorated and symptoms of scurvy appeared. The medical officer reported "As long as they were in the new building I had the greatest difficulty to keep them from sinking". In order to improve conditions ordered that the prison's doors and windows should be kept open!

He added: “My assistant noticed an unpleasant odour prevailing in the cells, but being deprived of the organ of smell myself I could not detect it”. On examining the water closets it was found they’d been wrongly constructed.

Slowly things improved. By 1852 the prison was in good repair but several of the water taps leaked and the cells were not as clean as they should be. Corridors were lighted with gas and some light in the cells would enable prisoners during winter to work to proper hours instead of passing at least 13 hours in bed.

The most graphic account of conditions comes not from an Inspector but a reporter who visited in February 1876. He described a cell with its bed strapped to the wall, a simple gas light and shelves filled with books of a religious character. There was a tread wheel and a hand-crank set in a wall which prisoners sentenced to hard labour had to turn 10,800 revolutions each day. If this proved too easy, the gaoler would tighten the screw to make it harder.

The gaol closed in 1878 and the site is now home to East Cambridgeshire District Council offices, one of whose windows are covered with bars.

Justice continued to be dispensed from the Sessions House until earlier this year, when the Magistrates court closed. Now the current occupants of the old gaol will help decide its fate

Harry Bye from Ely – who is still riding his bike at 94 – has shared his memories of the tramps that were once a common sight on the Fordham to Exning Road in the mid 1920s. His family lived at Plantation Stud, Snailwell and regularly met them while fetching milk from Harry Smythe’s farm near the railway bridge.

Harry recalls: “We presumed they were walking from Ely to the White Lodge Workhouse on the Exning Road at Newmarket. We often had some call at our house for food and drink and, though we were poor, my parents mostly gave them some bread and cheese or dripping, or even some stale buns. When my grandmother was staying with us once a lady who had been sleeping in some bushes called round for some food and drink. As she left after thanking us, gran said 'That was Old Kate'. She is often around when race meetings are on. She's a tipster'. At that time I wondered what the meaning of a tipster was".

One man who knew tramps better than most was James Greenwood. Writing in the Cambridge Weekly News in September 1911 he described conditions in the kitchen one of the common lodging houses on Cambridge's Newmarket Road where they sought shelter for the night

"A flaring gas jet lights up the squalor of the place – a dirty stone floor, a fly-infested ceiling, rough-hewn tables and forms strewn with the debris of the last meal. At one end a fire, with a huge cauldron of water swinging from the hook above it, sends out a stifling smoke. In this kitchen a score of human beings, male and female are assembled. The air reeks with a conglomeration of odours – the sharp smell of the humble bloater mingling with the pungent scent of frying onions and the reek of strong tobacco".

Amongst them was 'The Man with the Bible' – an itinerant hawker. His 'Bible' consisted of a small box in which his 'swag' comprised pins, needles, cottons, combs and studs. He'd bought the needles for a shilling a thousand and sold them at ten for a penny while a gross of studs, costing him a shilling, were sold at a halfpenny each. The lowest in this class of trader was the man with the 'stretchers', or bootlaces, which he hawked as an excuse for begging in the crowded bars of public houses. Pedlars were supposed to carry a 'brief' or 'docket', an annual licence obtained from the police, but often they did not.

Then there was the 'Mush-fakir' or umbrella mender, ('mush' being the Romany term for umbrella and 'fakir' meaning patching up). He was seated on a low form and by his side sat his mate, a harsh-faced woman of about forty years of age, puffing meditatively at a well-blackened short clay pipe. Things were hard, he complained:

"Mush-fakin's about played out. If it warn't few the owd lass, who on the quiet does a bit of 'mouchin' (begging), Lor knows wer' we'd be. Nowadays there ain't many fowks as wants 'mushes' repairing. They goes inter Cambridge town an' buys a smart-looking 'mush' fer about one an' 'levenpence 'apenny, an' when it gets brokken or blown out they chucks it away an' buys another un. Now I can remember when blokes round 'ere town giv' a quid an' more for a 'mush'. They takked care on 'em then, an' when the poor owd 'mush-fakir' came round 'ad 'em looked to an' repaired. Lor', some of them owd 'mushes' lasted a 'undred years"

Mush fakirs often also worked as scissor-grinders. In August 1898 an itinerant umbrella maker and scissor grinder was sentenced to three weeks hard labour for stealing tenpence from Kate Taylor, domestic servant to Mr William Cutlack, of Littleport. She'd given him a pair of scissors to grind for which he charged 2d and then he'd replaced the handle of an umbrella for 1s.6d. But the man had gone off without giving her change from the half-a-crown she'd paid him.

Probably the most famous umbrella-carrier in Cambridge was the Rev Charles Simeon who as a young man had attracted great opposition when appointed vicar of Holy Trinity church in Market Street. The parishioners boycotted services and the wardens locked the church doors leaving the congregation out in the rain. But Simeon overcame their hostility and remained minister for 54 years. He was depicted by Robert Dighton in 1836 – carrying a brolly.

At various times Cambridge undergraduates have adopted umbrellas as a fashion statement: Edward Moden in a cartoon postcard of about 1905 depicted 'The New Arrival' with a neatly rolled umbrella. A correspondent to the News in 1927 described grads wearing knickerbockers and carrying an umbrella while the Varsity Handbook of 1957 commented that an umbrella 'adds character to your appearance when neatly rolled' and along with a duffel coat and tweed cap, gave a touch of affluence.

But of course they have a practical use.

In May 1910 the News told how 49 years earlier several undergraduates had been overtaken by a heavy rainstorm while walking along the Madingley Road. There was every likelihood they would be thoroughly drenched until an old lady living in one of the brick-built cottages noticed their plight and took them in. Before they left the kindly old dame insisted upon one of the young men accepting the loan of her umbrella. It was returned the next day with a substantial gift in recognition of her kindness. That undergraduate afterwards became King Edward VII

If any of this prompts memories, write to Mike Petty

Bruce R. Johnson, Pastor of the Scottsdale Presbyterian Church in Arizona has emailed seeking details of a meeting that took place in Cambridge in 1943

It was a course for RAF Chaplains that was held at Magdalene College from 23rd November to 2nd December, one of a number of Chaplains Schools that were addressed by such academics as C.S. Lewis of Magdalen College Oxford. He was later to become Cambridge University 's first Professor of Medieval and Renaissance Literature and to make Magdalene College, Cambridge his home for the last ten years of his life

Lewis' connection with the Chaplains schools has been recorded by its former Commandant, C.H.F. Gilmore who recalls that initially the Academic had difficulty in communicating with his audience. But then a remark about prostitutes and pawnbrokers being forgiven in heaven had caught the men's' attention and the rest had gone swimmingly.

There are seven photos of the Chaplains meeting at Magdalene preserved in the RAF Chaplaincy Branch Archive at the RAF Museum, London. They were taken by Stearns, the Cambridge photographers, and it is the whereabouts of the original negatives that Bruce was seeking to track down

For over 100 years the name of Stearn was synonymous with photography in Cambridge. Thomas Stearn and his wife started their business about 1867 and the firm continued at number 72 Bridge Street until their merger with Eaden Lilley's photographic business in 1970 after which the bulk of their negatives was destroyed.

Despite the shortage of photographic material during the Second World War Stearns had continued to record the local scene - a scene which now included many of the organisations evacuated to the safety of Cambridge.

But Central Cambridge itself was not a safe place to be. Following a bombing raid in July 1942 the Union Society building, just down the road, had been badly damaged and flying shrapnel gouged holes in the stonework of Whewell's Court, opposite Jesus Lane, just a few doors from Stearn's premises. After this the firm sent their glass plate negatives to be processed by a firm at Brighouse, near Leeds.

Here they remained forgotten until a memorable day when I joined an Eaden Lilley driver and took a trip to the Midlands. Box after box of large glass negatives were loaded into the back of a van and brought back to the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library. They include views of the Light Anti-Aircraft Regiment with a Bofors gun on Parker's Piece, D Flight of the RAF at Pembroke College and various Home Guard groups.

Bruce knows the names of those attending the Chaplains' course who posed at the front of the Pepys Library at Magdalene. They include the chaplain seated on the far right, Herbert Thomas Yeomans who later became Vice Principal of the School, the first Commandant, Wing Commander (Rev.) Charles Gilmore and the school's initial Principal (wearing vestments) Canon (and former Olympian) Sidney Ernest Swann. Also shown is W. C. R. Stewart who commanded the No. 2 Initial Training Wing at Cambridge

What he may not appreciate is that for one of the others, it was probably not the first time he had been photographed by Stearns. For E.J. Strover, seated one from the right on the front row, had attended Selwyn College and rowed for their Second Eight in the Lent races of 1905. Selwyn's Boat Club history shows that they dumped their cox, fully clothed, into the icy waters of the Cam after his poor steering robbed them of a bump. The treatment worked and they went on to make five others. This had been a most unfortunate year for the Bumps, for in May three people had been drowned when the ferry at the Plough Inn, Fen Ditton, had overturned

After University Strover had joined the army. He was based with the 3rd Brahaman, Indian Regiment at Singapore in 1912 and fought with them during the Great War. By then he had learned to fly and joined the Royal Flying Corps, being shot down by Anti-aircraft fire over Loos in 1915. He later served in Mesopotamia with the Sikh Infantry, being promoted to Major in 1921. Later he became rector of Lawford church near Manningtree in Essex where his widow was buried in January this year, aged 106

If you can add similar details about any of the people shown on the photograph, or have memories of life as an RAF Chaplain, then Bruce – and I – would love to hear from you.

You can email bruce@scottsdalechurch.com or drop me a line and I'll put you in touch.

Margaret Scott contacted me from the picturesque Oxfordshire village of Rochester-on-Thames where she has been clearing out her attic of her home. There she has rediscovered some old glass negatives taken by one of Cambridge's most important photographic firms, Scott and Wilkinson.

The Scott family's story has yet to be thoroughly researched: it is complicated with three members of that family marrying an equal number of Farrens, another Cambridge photographic and artistic dynasty.

David James Scott first started as a photographer in partnership with a Mr Wilkinson at 47, St Andrew's Street Cambridge in 1884. They bought an existing business from H. Faulkner White for £300 and worked together for five or seven years before the partnership was dissolved and David continued trading as Scott and Wilkinson.

When the Cambridge Graphic was launched in 1900 as the town's first photographically-illustrated weekly newspaper it was Scott and Wilkinson who took their large well-reproduced pictures covering topics like the opening of the new Police and Fire Station in St Andrew's Street, just across the street from their studios.

The Scott and Wilkinson name appeared on a wide variety of pictures varying from University ceremonies to portraits, groups of amateur skaters to views of stately homes for estate agents' brochures. They also issued an album of photographs of central Cambridge depicting the usual classic sights as others have done before and since.

The business flourished but by the 1930s more folk had their own cameras and professional portraiture was seen as a luxury during a period of depression. In September 1932 the firm relocated to 59 Regent Street for a short time but then ceased trading.

However it was not the end of the family's connection with photography. The original premises in St Andrew's Street were adjacent to the New Theatre and the Cambridge Daily News offices. In 1933 the paper expanded, installing new Linotype presses to enable it to publish a 24-page weekly edition. Pictures were to assume a greater importance so the News took over the old studios to expand their photo-engraving department bringing the whole process from the first negatives to the finished halftone blocks all under one roof. David's son, William Scott joined the paper and managed the department until his death in 1954.

Amongst the negatives stored in Margaret's home, and now brought to Cambridge where they will be offered to the Cambridgeshire Collection, are some most interesting and unusual images. They include scenes of the construction of the University Library in May 1932, the interior of the Playhouse cinema in Mill Road and the YMCA in Alexandra Street along with views of Grantchester and Trumpington

Some in a box labelled 'Emmerson' record a river trip on the motor boat "Will 'o 'th' wisp" journeying down the Cam and Ouse to Prickwillow. At Upware they photographed a group of cyclists, apparently on a Botany outing, crossing the river on a chain ferry for a drink at the 'Five Miles from Anywhere'

Amongst the views of bumping races is one which shows a group of young men who have climbed a tree to get a better view of the proceedings. Almost certainly this was taken in June 1927 when the News reported: One of the largest crowds in memory witnessed the last of what may go down in history as the "Microphone Mays". Both banks of the Cam at Ditton presented the spectacle of an unbroken line of sightseers. There were three men up a tree at Ditton Paddock; they and their friend on a microphone were telling all England what was happening and theirs was truly a romance of the tree tops.

If you have other Scott and Wilkinson pictures I'd be delighted to share them through the Memories page. And if you can add more to the family's story then Margaret would be delighted to hear from you. Contact me and I'll put you in touch.

Longstowe is staging a village history fair at the village hall next Saturday afternoon, 15th October. There will be plenty to jog the memories of those whose families have a connection with the small village, just south of Caxton..

Exhibits will include photographs of 20th century people and events, the old school record book and Sports Club history, together with accounts of farming and railways.

Longstowe won the 'Best Kept Village' competition in 1976 but life in the community has not always been idyllic

In October 1935 the chairman of the Parish Meeting described conditions: 'The housing position at Longstowe is scandalous for there have been no working men's cottages built for over 70 years. There are three families living in one house and several others where the sons and daughters are married and living at home with their parents. Two old thatched cottages had been condemned but last week one of the tenant's daughters got married and is living with her parents with her husband in the condemned house as they have nowhere else to go'

But South Cambs Rural District Council had already been taking action, applying to the Government for permission to acquire a site for the erection of two three-bedroomed council houses to be built by Messrs Wisbey and Son for a cost of £600, including paths, drains and lighting

It was no use having houses if there were not the facilities to support life. At Longstowe in 1935 part of the parish had to depend on water collected from the cottage roofs. This was inadequate and of unsatisfactory quality. Half the residents had to go half-a-mile for drinking water and mothers complained they are unable to wash their children's clothes. However Hunts Water Company said the village suffered no special hardship when compared to other places. During the drought the villagers only had to fetch water a matter of 500 yards and improvements would need a new mains.

Water supply in Longstowe was still an issue nearly 20 years later in February 1954. One councillor said: "During this spot of bad weather I was ashamed to see children going along before school early in the morning, carrying sacks containing bottles of water for cooking and for washing. Some are having to walk over a mile". It had been hoped to start the scheme in 1952. If the consulting engineers were no good why not throw them out and get some new ones, he asked. But the engineers complained the plans had been changed so many times it was not fair to blame them for the delay. Water has now been connected so visitors will be able to enjoy a cup of tea.

There had been improvements: in 1935 the post office had started a second delivery of letters, there was a public telephone and the County Council had spared a little tar and gravel for the roads – though sadly not enough to actually finish the job. Yet village men tramped the roads looking for work.

One thing the village did have was a school, though it was expensive: it cost £26 a year for nine years to educate every child, yet when they left some could hardly read or write their own name.

And it had its own railway station on the Cambridge to Bedford line. But this was closed as part of the Beeching cuts in the 1960s. In December 1972 the Old North Road station house complete with booking office, waiting room and goods shed was sold by auction for £23,000. Part of its story will be included amongst railway memorabilia on display. The organisers of the display will welcome more material. If you can assist then phone Dick Murden on 01223 719628 or take it with you when you visit the exhibition on Saturday afternoon

The discovery of negatives taken by the Cambridge photographers Scott and Wilkinson has sparked interest.

The other evening I spoke to a meeting of Peterborough Family History Society where I met Pam Haswell. She'd contacted Memories a year ago seeking information on William Caunt, one of Cambridge's earliest policemen. I could tell her that in January 1932 Mr H.P. Brown of Hooper Street had sent the Cambridge Chronicle a copy of a picture of the Borough Police force taken in the Corn Exchange in the 1880s together with a list of names. There on the front row was a PC 'Gaunt'. Now I was able to inform her that amongst the negatives preserved by Margaret Scott is an even earlier picture of what appears to be the Cambridge police force. A copy is already winging its way to her via the internet and she will be waiting with magnifying glass poised to see if she can identify him

Jim Neale from Burwell has emailed to say that the picture of groundwork at the University Library in 1932 interested him as his Grandad Neale worked as a bricklayer on the building. "I remember my Dad saying that my Grandad was one of the last to be laid off, so must have worked at great height on that rather precarious scaffolding! He was born in 1879, so would have been 53 when work started. He biked miles to work and helped to build Airfields all over the country during WW2. He died aged 84 in 1963, and still rode a bike on his 80th Birthday"

Memories 17th October 2011 by Mike Petty

Last weekend crowds gathered at Duxford airfield to celebrate the 80th anniversary of the de Havilland Tiger Moth. But it was just over 100 years ago that Cambridge became part of the aviation age.

At 5.30 pm on 10th October 1911 PC Naylor, was on duty near Sheep’s Green when he heard a droning noise in the sky. Looking up he saw something phenomenal: a flying machine.

Aeroplanes had been glimpsed over Cambridge before: in June five had been seen making their way to the army manoeuvres being held at Hardwick. But this large monoplane was very low and the engine sounded as if it were misfiring. It skimmed over Lensfield Road well below the top of the spire of the Roman Catholic Church, just cleared the house-tops in Regent Street and descended in the north-east corner of Parker’s Piece. It landed gently, like a huge bird, and came to rest after running about 20 yards or so.

A young man, with keen, clear-cut features, wearing an airman’s helmet with ear-flaps, and a short, khaki-coloured, woolly overcoat, cycling knickers and shoes, stepped out of the well of the machine just behind the wings, and climbed down to earth. He was quickly recognised as Mr W. B. R. Moorhouse, formerly of Trinity Hall, and now of the firm of Radley and Moorhouse who had established an aeroplane factory on Portholme Meadows, Huntingdon.

A contingent of police were quickly on the scene and the pilot, confident of their ability to keep his machine safe from the ever-increasing crowds, sought a little much-needed warmth and refreshment in the University Arms. There he gave the “Cambridge Daily News” an account of his adventure. He had been heading for Huntingdon but had got lost and followed a railway line. It was only when he recognised the smoking chimneys of the cement works at Cherry Hinton that he realised where he was. “It was so dark by this time that I could hardly see my way. When I got over Cambridge I recognised the Piece and came down. I don’t think I could have gone a mile further: the petrol tank was absolutely dry.”

By now the Mayor (Ald. George Stace), who had distinctly heard the roar of the machine as it passed over his house in Lensfield Road had arrived, and had a short chat with the airman. Later in the evening the aeroplane was wheeled across to the corner of the Piece, near the University Arms, where it remained during the night, covered over with a tarpaulin and guarded by policemen.

The News reporter described the Bleriot poised lightly on its pneumatic-tyred wheels with its tail pointing towards Regent Street. With its graceful white wings extended, and its long frail-looking, slender tapering body of light, thin woodwork braced together by a network of steel wires, it looked for all the world like a huge dragon-fly. At the extremity of the body was the rudder, and a short distance in front of this were the small elevating planes. Immediately behind the wings was the well, protected by canvas, in which was the aviator's seat and his control levers. At the head of the machine was the engine, a seven-cylindered "Gnome" of 50 horse-power, which when going revolved and so helped to keep all the cylinders cool. Behind the engine were the petrol and oil tanks and in front was the double-bladed propeller, or, to give it its proper name, tractor. The modern machine remained the centre of attention to thousands of people until a late hour.

Moorhouse spent the evening in the New Theatre and the night in the rooms of a college chum. He was up early an unimpeded takeoff. But crowds had gathered and it took more than 20 Inspectors and Constables to clear the Piece. Photographers took snapshots as three mechanics who had arrived overnight from Huntingdon wheeled the machine round. Moorhouse took his seat, and two men hung on to the rear of the fuselage while the third started the engine. One or two pulls round of the propeller and the engine started to bark, slowly at first, but rapidly increasing, until the explosions seemed to merge into a continuous roar, and the engine and propeller were spinning round at terrific speed. The whole machine trembled violently, and tugged and strained to get free. The blast of air flung backwards by the whirling blades was like a miniature tornado. Leaves, straws, pieces of paper, were sent flying far to the rear, and the men hanging on behind had all their work cut out to hold her.

At last Mr Moorhouse gave the word "Let go," and the machine darted forward across the turf at a great pace, heading slightly to the left of the electric light standard. After running about 120 yards the wheels lifted off the grass, and the whole structure inclined gently upwards. A few yards and she was wholly clear of the ground, and soaring gracefully away. There was something awesome in the sight. One seemed to be looking on at the birth of some strange new thing of wondrous possibilities - the dawn of a new era in the history of mankind.

Within couple of days Moorhouse was back, this time gliding over Dant's Ferry to land on Midsummer Common, disrupting several football matches that were taking place. He left the machine almost at once to take afternoon tea with an undergraduate friend, giving crowds – and police – just time enough to assemble before taking off, circling over Chesterton and heading off back to Huntingdon once more.

Cambridge had truly entered the aeroplane age, though neither Parker's Piece nor Midsummer Common would become regular landing strips.

Recently Cambridge University elected its new Chancellor. Voters poured into Cambridge from around the world, donned their academic gowns and proceeded to the Senate House to make their choice from four nominated candidates: a grocer, an actor, a lawyer and a Lord. Now Lord Sainsbury has succeeded Prince Philip in the ancient post.

The contest attracted considerable interest, but nothing compared to that surrounding the Chancellorship election of 1847. On the death of the Duke of Northumberland the senior members of the University had nominated Prince Albert, consort of Queen Victoria. The Prince indicated that he would accept, provided he was unopposed.

But another group of academics had already approached Northumberland's brother-in-law, Earl Powis. He had been educated at St John's and had served as an MP before being elevated to the House of Lords. Albert had neither distinction.

This placed the Prince in a dilemma. It would not be proper for a Royal to indulge in a contest that he might not win. But the arrangements had already been put in place and the only way he could stop them was by declaring that he would refuse to accept the position of Chancellor if elected. Such a declaration he did not deem it respectful to the University to make.

So the election went ahead. For three days voters flocked to Cambridge in a variety of conveyances from all directions. Two gentlemen from Bury St Edmunds braved the weather on Newmarket Heath in an open gig, returning the same day, one voting against the other. Omnibuses bearing the name of the rival candidates ferried their supporters from the station where no less than 10 special trains were laid on from London on one day alone. The railway company announced that should the Prince be victorious they would construct a grand new carriage to bring him and the Queen to Cambridge for the ceremony

There was an immense rush of voters and electors queued to enter the Senate House where one academic was knocked down when a crowd broke down a barrier.. There were dukes and bishops, senators and lawyers, cabinet ministers and country curates pushing and bawling and striving for entry. One man claimed to have brought up 100 voters for the Prince and paid the expenses of many of them. Some votes were refused and arguments broke out over whether now-eminent men had indeed completed their University studies decades before.

Inside, despite the bitter cold, the Senate House galleries were crammed with undergraduates cheering and jeering, blowing horns, howling like asses and showering peas, wood and halfpennies on those below as they declared their votes.

When polling started the Earl gained an early lead but slowly the Prince's supporters gained the ascendancy and he was elected by a majority of 116 votes.

However nobody was sure whether he would actually accept. The official confirmation of the result of the election was carefully inscribed on vellum, endorsed with the University seal and placed in a box covered with blue Morocco leather. Then it was taken to Buckingham Palace by the Vice Chancellor who was kept waiting some time before he was admitted to the Royal presence. To his immense relief Prince Albert expressed himself highly gratified.

But in a letter to the University he expressed his displeasure: "The election has now terminated and a majority of the University, including a very great number of its members most eminent for their services to the church, the University and to the cause of literary science, declared in favour of my appointment to the vacant office ... I have resolved to accept the trust which the University is willing to confer on me. I have been influenced by a respectful deference to the wishes of a majority of its members, but a great unwillingness to invoke the University in the probable necessity of another contest"

The inauguration ceremony took place in the Throne Room at Buckingham Palace in March 1847 when the Masters of Colleges together with 130 members of the University attended in academic robes. It was a very formal affair described by Joseph Romilly, the University Registrar, in his diary and was followed by a grand dinner, though Romilly did not like the quality of the wine and asked for a glass of beer instead.

Then preparations were put in hand for the Installation of the new Prince Chancellor. Cambridge received a spruce-up: “one cannot turn a corner of a street without running against a ladder or a can of paint”, one paper commented. On Monday 5th July 1847, a bright, brilliant, burning summer day, every shop closed early. Banners and streamers, laurels, flowers and happy faces were everywhere, church bells rang and every house sported a flag, some a dozen or more.

Queen Victoria and her husband arrived by train and drove in a carriage with a cavalry escort through ecstatic crowds for a reception at Trinity College. Then it was on to the Senate House where, the new Chancellor, dressed in robes of black and gold with a long train was officially proclaimed. The Queen was proud: “My beloved Albert looked dear and beautiful”, she recorded.

Now a new Chancellor will shortly follow in the Prince’s footsteps as the University turns another chapter in its history.

When Margaret Scott of Dorchester-on-Thames decided it was time to find a new home for more than 120 glass negatives she’d persevered from the family photographic firm, Scott and Wilkinson, she did not know just what scenes they showed.

Now they have been digitised it has become more apparent, and already they are starting to attract interest from various researchers.

Several were taken from unusual angles:

One is a magnificent and unusual view of the interior of King’s College chapel looking from above the organ loft – how on earth did the photographer get his camera so high up?

The bulky equipment was apparently carried to the roof of the Castle Hotel, pulled down in 1935, to secure a view along St Andrew’s Street. Dominating the background is the massive mansion built by Henry Rance who was Mayor in 1878 and 1882 and dubbed ‘Rance’s Folly’. It had several lifts, four bathrooms and central heating but also featured facilities not usually expected in a town-centre house. These included a swimming pool, a tennis court on the roof and a ballroom whose floor was laid by experts brought specially from Germany. It survived until 1957

One negative shows the YMCA in Alexandra Street which survived until the demolition for Lion Yard. There is also what I take to be an interior shot of the stage and another of a meeting room but as I never went inside I can't be sure. Can anybody confirm this is what is indeed shown?

Other photographs show a military band parading at Chesterton. In the background there is a fine view of the church and a glimpse of Pye's massive aerial that dominated this part of the city. Can you tell me more about it?

From out in the county comes a wonderful view of Bartlow Hills – reminiscence of the Wittenham Clumps overlooking Margaret's home village that I puffed up when we made the trip to Oxfordshire to collect the negatives

The majority of the pictures I can recognise but there are a few which seem very familiar, yet currently puzzle me. One shows a line of thatched cottages, another a couple of windmills, one of which is derelict. Do you recognise there they were?

Most of the negatives have now been delivered to the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library where they will be preserved amongst the many thousands of other images held in the library.

I was recently invited to speak at a 'Petersfield Celebrates Age' meeting at the Cherrytrees Centre in St Matthew's Street, off East Road. Instead I spent the time listening to fascinating people who know this part of Cambridge far better than I ever will.

Amongst those who had made their way there was Betty Wilson. She'd not had too far to come, for she was born just around the corner in Sturton Street, a long narrow street of terraced houses developed in the 1870s and 1880s to house a growing population of railway workers and now home to many young dons and professional people. Betty has lived in the area for over 80 years and has penned me a personal account of her part of the city

Betty writes: “My father’s name was Walter (Wally) Waller. He married mum (Jess Randall) and they lived with my grandparents, Lil and Harry Randall for sometime at 79, Sturton Street. Grandad was a chimney sweep all his life. He worked for Mr Kirkup who lived in King Street. He sold sacks of soot to neighbours for about sixpence; it was his ‘pin money’ which he could spend in his local pub, the City Arms. I used to see him everyday, about one o’clock on my way back to York Street junior school - we went home for our dinners then, as there were no school meals in those days.

“Everyday the Co-op horses would pass the house on their way to the top of the street, where they were stabled. Grandad had a shovel and pail to collect what the horses left behind on the road. He must have had the best grown fruit and veg in the street! I also remember cattle coming through on their way to the Co-op slaughterhouse. Sometimes one would escape and get into the back garden and cause havoc. I didn’t like this.

“My Grandmother worked for many years at Trinity College as a bedmaker, a lot of women did in those days. When someone in the family passed away, Gran would be sent to ‘lay them out’ and she also helped bring babies into the world”.

Betty recalls some of their neighbours in Sturton Street: the Reed family, Mrs Overhill and family, the Smiths, Mrs Pope, Mrs Brown, the Fletcher and Haslop families.

The small homes did not come with the facilities taken for granted today. “The Bath house was in Gwydir Street, opposite Dales Brewery, and a small shop called Hoppits. We went to the baths every Saturday, in all weathers. I remember going when the snow was ankle deep. Sometimes they would let my sister or a friend share a bath with me, it was great fun.

“My favourite sweet shop was Goodliffe’s and other shops that come to mind are, the Co-op grocers, Cable’s bakers, Biggs dairy, Samson butcher, Tom Flacks sweets and groceries and a Mr Saggars, who sold rabbits and fruit and veg. I loved rabbit stew and dumplings.

“My brother Peter had a friend named Jack Reynolds, who lived in Leaders Row, which led into Staffordshire Street, where there was a hot pea shop. We would take our own basins for the peas, and sit and eat them on our doorstep. They were lovely, with plenty of salt and vinegar. We also got a bag of chips from Taylor’s fish and chip shop in Norfolk Street.

“On the corner of Norfolk and St Matthews Street, was a Post Office, or a grocers shop, I am not quite sure. There was a fish shop that sold cockles, winkles, shrimps etc that we would buy for Sunday tea, as a treat sometimes. Wheatley’s scrap yard was in Gas Lane, and we would take empty bottles and rags and got a few pennies for them. There was also Clovers sweet shop nearby.

“Fred Summerfield’s shop was on the corner of Vicarage Terrace, and sold almost everything: groceries fruit, veg, and a lovely selection of sweets. One of my favourites was quite a novelty: it was a square box, with rows of small holes on the top. You pierced a hole, and a coloured ball would roll out. You always won a bar of chocolate, if you were very lucky, a silver or gold ball won a small box of chocolates. I would spend most of my pocket money on this”.

Just before the war Betty lived in Vicarage Terrace and for a while it was a very happy time in her life.

“My best friend was Gladys Clark. Her father worked at a fruit and veg shop in Burleigh Street. Some days we would take his dinner and a can of hot tea, and he would give us a bag of overripe fruit. What a treat that was. I remember most of the people in the Terrace. The children I played with were Jean Martin, Betty Watson, Betty Fordham and Tony Summerfield. Mrs Hinson was our next-door neighbour, the other people I remember are, the Palmer family, Langfords, Clarks and the Fordhams.

“There were two air raid shelters we went to when the siren sounded. They were in Gas Lane, which was at the end of St Matthews Street. They were cold in the winter, as they were dug into the ground, and the walls were concrete. There was often water on the floor, and it always smelt damp. We made up a bed from a small tin bath for my baby brother to lay in, and carried him into the shelter in it. Everyone was in good spirits, and we would enjoy sing alongs, read books and play cards etc. I remember someone playing an accordion.”

All that changed on a June night in 1940 when German bombs smashed into Vicarage Terrace, destroying homes and lives. Some of the children Betty played with were amongst the fatalities, including best-friend Gladys

The events of that terrible night can never be forgotten, but for those who survived life had to go on:

“At the end of the war I was going to St George’s School, and we now lived at 30 St Matthews Street, on the corner of Vicarage Terrace, where my brother Colin was born. Almost everyday I pass the house where my Grandparents lived, and remember the happy years I lived with them until I married in 1948. I am only a few doors away, where I have lived for 46 years, so I have many memories of living in Sturton Street”.

Thank you, Betty, for sharing them.

If Betty’s recollections have sparked memories for you, then please drop me a line at the News

Memories 14th November 2011, by Mike Petty

Whilst browsing through the House of Commons Parliamentary Papers website I chanced upon the report of the Board of Agriculture on wages in 1919. There was one section in particular that caught my eye.

The Parliamentary gentlemen were concerned about the provision of housing for rural workers, especially in the fens where many farm labourers had a long bicycle ride to and from work along roads that were often flooded.

There were few cottages in those inaccessible areas and more were needed. But what would the ideal fenland home comprise?

One of those who gave evidence was Miss Constance Cochrane. She had been speaking about housing to about 60 women in a fen village in the Isle of Ely, and had asked them what sort of cottages they would like if a kind fairy presented them with money for the purpose

She reported: "Every woman held up her hand for three bedrooms, they clamoured for this before everything else. In low crowded rooms, even with the small windows open at night, the closeness of the atmosphere often caused headaches and feelings of suffocation. In illness the third bedroom was essential while some women spoke of there being nowhere to place the dead in a cottage with two bedrooms and one living room"

The mothers were unanimous in objecting to putting their growing girls and boys in the same bedroom and to having nowhere to accommodate relations, married children, those in service and perhaps a sick nurse. Nearly all would be satisfied with a fireplace in just one bedroom but wished that chimneys might be built not to smoke

Downstairs, the ideal kitchen was about 15 feet long by 12 feet wide. There would be a pantry or larder facing north or east, which should be long and narrow – 10 feet by 4. So much space was required for bread pans, meat in pickle, flour bins, drinking water, vegetables, apples, home-made jams etc. One woman complained she had to keep the onions under her bed because there was no other place for them and Miss Cochrane reported that she had often seen wheat heaped up or in sacks in a small living-room or bedroom

All the women wanted a large living room but opinions were divided as to whether the house would be better with a large scullery or a smaller scullery and a separate parlour.

Many would prefer one room away from the cooking, washing and undressing of the children or drying of clothes. One they could keep tidy and where the children's prizes, presents from absent sons and daughters and the many household treasures might be displayed. The husband or elder children, wanting to be quiet in the evening, the mother, tired or with a headache, the visitor or friend, would use it constantly, if not every day, and always on Sunday. One young woman had another concern: 'There's nowhere for me to have my young man in the evening, so I am forced to go out with him in the street'

The rooms should be about eight feet high, certainly not more than nine, because of the difficulty of reaching to whitewash. There should be one large sash window but not more, on account of the cold, problems of cleaning and the trouble and expense of blinds and window curtains. They must be sash types so that only the top needed to be opened in wet and windy weather. Other windows were difficult to clean and liable to break.

The majority of ladies wanted the copper and sink to be in a shed outside, because of the steam. This should also contain a small fireplace just to hold a kettle or saucepan for cooking in summer. But rather less than half of them cared for a bath and the others would be satisfied to continue the use of the wash-tub. This indifference was partly due to the great scarcity and difficulty in obtaining water, it was explained.

All this was very unlikely to come about but, Constance noted, “it was touching to witness the gratitude and pleased surprise of many of the women at such unusual importance being attached to their opinions and ideas of comfort”

It is interesting to speculate that these ladies’ opinions may have influenced the inter-war council housing boom that saw new homes springing up throughout the county.

Memories 21st November 2011, by Mike Petty

Denis Christian from Oakington has sent me copies of some of his late father’s writings. Sid Christian will be remembered by many as a baker with shops in Gwydir Street, Sturton Street and Dover Hill, off East Road. Born in 1900, he got to know the area very well and in his latter days set down his recollections of his boyhood.

In them Sid recalled how, as a lad, he would stand in Mill Road outside the Royal Standard public house, opposite Belgrave Road, where Mr Fletcher the landlord used to play his accordion outside on certain holidays. He was waiting for a bus – a horse-bus.

There are very few memories of this form of transport but a newspaper report from the year of Sid’s birth makes interesting reading:

In April 1900 as the horse bus was waiting for passengers opposite the Royal Standard and the driver was talking on the path, the horses for some unknown reason bolted. The driver and conductor immediately ran after the animals but were unable to catch them. Two passengers named Annie & Frances Scull, who were on the top of the 'bus jumped off, escaping with grazes. When the bus was about to pass the Durham Ox it collided with a market cart belonging to Jonas Wilmott the Orwell carrier and then hit another cart idriven by Eli Newman, a hawker from Bottisham. The runaway bus was finally stopped by Charles Lewis, a clothier and Robert Nelson a labourer.

But the accident did not seem to have worried the company too much, for Sid recalled: "Ginger the driver, always let me sit with him on the high front seat and he would give me the reins and let me drive, sometimes with two horses. There was very little on the roads those days so I used to guide the horses all the way to the Bank near the end of Petty Cury". He adds "Ginger would check the pennies in the box attached to the back of our seat - there were a few that did not pay".

It may have been this failure to collect the fare that led to the company being wound up in 1902. The news was received with a great deal of regret down Mill Road where people felt it would lead to a depreciation in the value of property. Shop and office workers would also now it difficult to get to and from their places of work in the hour usually allowed for dinner.

Sid recalled a journey along Mill Road: "Just past Malta Road it was all waste ground, where we went blackberrying. Gone are all the allotments, the football ground and the railway line, where they shunted all the carriages, now all built on" – the site of Coleridge Road

Then there was Romsey Terrace leading down to Polecat Farm. The shop at the corner selling fruit and vegetables was kept by Daddy Dawson and his wife. He was a big man who always wore a high sort of bowler hat and tight whipcord trousers. Sid had a regular job on Saturday fetching Daddy's wife a bottle of milk stout in a fish bag from the off licence across the road and was rewarded with several over ripe bananas.

Next door was the shoe repairer, "you could always see him standing in the window banging away with his hammer". Then the baker's shop kept by Mrs Anderson and her sister; their bread was delivered by a man who drove a high two wheeled van with a white horse that was getting old. "I remember standing outside the wheelwrights in Perowne Street when the driver went into the yard and came out with the blacksmith who carried a short stick with a rope loop on it (a twitch I think he called it) and a large file rasp. He twisted the loop round the horse's bottom lip to keep its mouth open then began to file his teeth straight so that the animal could chew its food better."

Alongside was a large sweet shop where they made ice cream. This shop was taken about a couple of years later by Eddie Goodlife. "I used to do jobs for him: I made his monster bottles of mineral waters which sold for one penny, as well as halfpenny and penny bars of chocolate and packets of broken toffee - one penny per quarter - and very large biscuits one penny each. When the First War started and the army was billeted near Romsey school I trundled a handcart to Malta Road and sold them to the soldiers"

Some of Sid's income would be spent in the Tracy Hall in Cockburn Street where he used to go once a week to pay a penny for a magic Lantern show, a cup of tea and a bun. Then came Smith's Lodge between Sedwick Street and Cavendish Road with its high wall – "but not to high to stop us lads from nipping over and borrowing his Williams pears before throwing the cores back over the wall".

The horse buses had been replaced after a year or two by Ortona motor buses and Sid had a particular memory of seeing one unable to make the gradient over Mill Road bridge: "Mr Walford, the manager, was putting a large wooden chuck under the back wheel to stop the bus running backwards”

Once over the bridge there was a café at the top of Devonshire Road with its large copper urn always gleaming. Then passing St Barnabas Church he would watch the men going into the Workhouse or Union, known as 81a Mill Road, and wonder what it was like inside. At the corner of Covent Garden was the windmill Public house, replaced at the beginning of 1912 by the Playhouse Cinema, itself now history.

Then there were two small cottages with the gardens in front which were occupied by two bedmakers: “you could see them going to the colleges about six o clock in the morning dressed in small black bonnets and long black cloaks under which they carried a bag for all the odds and ends the gentlemen did not require”. This corner was all cleared with several small shops built, Mr Page the butcher had one and Mr Cambridge the photographer.

Ahead lay Parker’s Piece which was the scene of much excitement on Good Friday when crowds would flock for the traditional skipping and tugs of war while games of Bat and Trap or Quoits were played for a small barrel of beer.

But the more valuable prize for a boy like Sid dressed in a new straw hat and celluloid collars with fancy Dickies covering his not so fancy shirts might be a smile from one of the young ladies displaying their new frocks and hats gaily bedecked with coloured ribbons.

Perhaps you too have family writings recalling such things from all those years ago. Share them with me at the News

Memories 28 November 2011 by Mike Petty

Last Monday’s News carried the headline “A14 ‘may have to become a toll road’” But as a recent book makes clear, toll roads are nothing new.

Until the 1600s roads were maintained by the individual parishes through which they passed. But locals had little incentive to look after the more distant cross-country sections only used by travellers.

In 1663 Justices became particularly concerned about the state of the heavily-used Great North Road between Wadesmill in Hertfordshire and Stilton near Peterborough. They came up with the idea of putting a spiked pole across the road and charging travellers a toll to pass through. The money raised would be used to keep the road in repair.

The idea caught on and soon other ‘Turnpike Trusts’ were set up. In 1724 routes into Cambridgeshire were improved by a trust covering the Chesterford to Cambridge and Newmarket roads. Others followed including Chatteris to Somersham in 1728 and March to Wisbech two years later. However travellers from Cambridge to Ely continued to make a muddy journey along the fen causeway between Rampton and Aldreth until the building of a new bridge over the Old West at Stretham Ferry opened up a more direct route – the present

A10. This was turnpiked in 1763 and the road extended to Littleport, Mepal and Downham Market in 1770.

Fees were set down by Act of Parliament and varied according to the type of vehicle using the road: some caused more damage than others and had to pay a higher charge. The rates were displayed on a board, part of one of which was recently discovered by a Haddenham farmer.

Inevitably people tried to get out of paying: one carter at Lt Shelford who had four asses drawing his wagon lifted two of them into the cart before he got to the turnpike gate and so reduced his bill. There were other ways of evading the charge: at Lt Abington people could escape the toll by turning off the road and travelling through a farmyard.

The toll-taker was not a popular figure. He was described as ‘a cold hearted wretch, planted in his vile little cot like a spider in his den, ready to pounce out upon every passenger and extract his odious dues. No feeling of remorse or sympathy had he for any fellow-mortal. It may be a wedding party rolling merrily along to church, it may be a funeral train, the parson or country surgeon, a set of ladies or gentlemen caracoling forth for pleasure - or a set of dull patient carrier wagons heaving slowly on their laborious mission. No matter who it may be or how or whence it came - this atrocious tollman was sure to present his harsh visage and demand payment!’

It was a dangerous job but Mrs Page, keeper of the Papermills turnpike gate on Newmarket Road Cambridge was praised after fighting off three robbers who struck just after the early-morning mail coach had passed through. The heroism with which she and her daughters saw off the attackers, with the aid of a small pistol, was much praised

It was not just road users who were changed. Tolls were also levied on cattle drovers and bargees using the high banks of fenland rivers as route ways. And on the road between Somersham and Chatteris a toll was taken for crossing a river that had dried up over a century before!

Most of the turnpike trusts were wound up after the coming of the railways reduced the amount of traffic wearing down the roads. Those on the main road from Cambridge to Ely were taken down during 1874 when a notice was issued that the material of tollhouses and their outbuildings were to be sold and removed before the end of the year. Responsibility was transferred to Highway Boards, forerunners of the County Councils

But one survived until 1905. The road between Fordham and Burwell had been constructed following the Inclosure of the two parishes. But right in the middle was a stretch of private land owned by Sir Vincent Cotton. He erected a tollgate and demanded payment from anybody passing through. This was the subject of constant complaint until finally on 1st December 1905 speeches were made and photographs taken of the payment of the last toll. Then the gate was lifted off its hinges and the road was open forever. But Charles Rose M.P. decided he wanted his involvement recorded and manoeuvred his motor car into place with the post stuck back in the hole temporarily just for the photographer.

The Victorians had wanted to remove all reminders of the time that travellers were charged to use a road. But a number of turnpike houses still remain if you know where to look.

Now Patrick Taylor has produced a pictorial gazetteer of those that survive in Cambridgeshire with photographs showing them as they are now and a brief account of what was once just history, but may now be coming back.

Memories 5th December 2011 by Mike Petty

This week I treated myself to an early Christmas present. It will last all year, is one I will never tire of and will actually increase in its usefulness as time passes.

I bought a file of old Cambridge newspapers including all the issues of the Cambridge Chronicle published between 1813 and 1831. It came out each week and carried stories, advertisements and notices relating to the issues of the day.

I know that the file is incomplete - the Chronicle commenced in 1762 and continued until the 1930s - for when I started in Cambridge Central Library at the back of the Guildhall in the 1960s there were bound files of the paper – shelf after shelf of large volumes - stacked up to the ceiling. I also know something of what it reported for in 1970 fellow members of a Haddenham WEA class started to plod through them, page by page, looking for information about our local communities.

This initiative continued until the news stories reported in the Cambridge Chronicle had been indexed for every week from 1770 to 1899 – not just for Haddenham but for all villages in Cambridgeshire and the Isle of Ely. In the following decades several villages arranged for these stories to be copied out and published in a series of ‘Chronicles’.

Many other indexes followed. But trying to locate information on velocipedes, stage coaches, incendiarism or murders still involves many hours of plodding through page after page. Until now.

For my new file of papers is fully indexed. I can ask for a mention of a place or family name and it will take me to a page of any issue containing it. There is a typed copy of the text and although there are various spelling mistakes I can correct these so they’re right next time. And then there is a copy of the actual paper as it was issued all those decades ago. It can be read page by page, made larger and even copied.

And it takes up no space at all.

No, I’ve not started on the Christmas sherry early. For this file of the Cambridge Chronicle has been digitised by the British Newspaper Library and is published online. You can search it for free, then pay to view the actual item.

And I did not just get the Cambridge Chronicle. I also got files of the Huntingdon, Bedford and Peterborough Gazette – better known as the Cambridge Independent Press – from 1818-1867 and the Bury Post 1801-1900. This often reprinted Cambridgeshire stories, as did the Norfolk, Chelmsford and Morning Chronicles, the Ipswich Journal, Louth and North Lincs Advertiser and many other local and regional titles from across the country that come as part of the package.

Then there's the Illustrated Police News from 30th October 1869 which has a report on a modern highwayman near Cambridge: a 23-year-old who dressed up like Dick Turpin and pulled a pistol on a carriage near Thriplow.

The British Newspaper Library project is just one of a series of databases that have been available to scholars for some time. Similar initiatives have been undertaken in America, Australia and New Zealand which can be searched for free on the Internet – type in the name of a transported ancestor and see if he committed further crimes out there.

And of course one must not forget the Cambridge News itself. Each morning today's paper is waiting when I log on. I can read it in full colour, then when I want to look back at a Memories article of three-or-four years ago I can just type in some words, click the mouse and there it is.

None of this is as good as handling an original issue or browsing through a file of cuttings – and for this it is back to the Cambridgeshire Collection now housed on the third floor of Lion Yard Library.

It holds the most complete file of Cambridgeshire newspapers anywhere in the world and has microfilmed them to reduce the need to handle 200-year old pieces of paper.

Although the British Newspaper Library will be continually adding to those on its website, it will be many years before they can hope to match it for local titles.

But their digital technology is infinitely easier to use than microfilm readers. So for now I'll sit in the summerhouse in the winter sunshine reading old newspaper stories on my laptop.

Memories 12th December 2011 by Mike Petty

The Cambridge Corn Exchange celebrated the 25th anniversary of its revamp as a Concert Hall and Conference facility with a fanfare played by members of the Cambridge Youth Orchestra. But its history has not always been harmonious as the music played that night.

Its opening in November 1875 sparked what became known as the “Death Riots”.

John Death, then Mayor of Cambridge, was also owner of a livery stable. As he drove in his robes and chain to open the new Corn Exchange various undergraduates called out “Whoa Mayor” – but he carried on to do his civic duty. Two days later an inaugural concert was held, arranged by the Cambridge Musical Society. The Corn Exchange was packed and the Mayor and Corporation were jostled as they attempted to reach their reserved seats.

During the singing of the National Anthem some undergraduates began to yell and stamp and before long the concert was interrupted. Twice the Mayor appealed to the students to keep order, but to no avail. Women fainted, children screamed and the police were called. Seven arrests were made which led the undergraduates to attempt to “rescue” their colleagues. Under such circumstances the concert had to be abandoned.

The next day the arrested men were heavily fined. Incensed undergraduates burnt effigies of the Mayor, crying “Death! ... Death!” and marched on his house, which stood on the site of the present Wesley church. Here police were unable to prevent them smashing the windows and the situation seemed out of control.

Then onto the scene strode “Black Morgan”, tutor of Jesus College, a popular figure in the University. He climbed on a wall and said that he would be quite blind for five minutes, but no longer. During that period the crowd dispersed with three cheers for the Tutor of Jesus. No further action was taken by proctor or police.

In May 1909 undergraduates played havoc at a meeting of the Cambridge Association for Women’s Suffrage. The Corn Exchange had a seating capacity of about 1,500 but by utilising the farmers’ desks and standing in every available space, an audience of 2,000 packed in. Quite 80 per cent were women, of whom Newnham and Girton contributed a considerable quota. But it was the minority whose increasingly violent disruptions caused the meeting to break up in a disorderly manner.

Even the farmers and corn merchants who conducted their business in the Exchange traditionally ended the year with a fight, as the News reported in December 1934: The signal for the commencement of the battle was the explosion of a cracker near the door. The ‘firer’ was immediately bombarded and soon covered with flour, wheat and artificial manure. Crackers banged merrily, bags burst with marked effect and very soon all the dignified corn-merchants were life-like imitations of snowmen. After 30 minutes the ammunition ran out and combat ceased, though the debris-covered floor was witness of the fight that had been in progress. Even the rather grim-looking statue of Jonas Webb looked comical with the flour-bag headgear that was placed on it.

During the run-up to more serious conflicts Winston Churchill addressed a meeting of undergraduates there in 1939 and it was the venue for a War Weapons Week exhibition with a downed German plane as star exhibit

Since then the Corn Exchange has resounded to the thud and thump of boxing and wrestling bouts, the ping-pong of table tennis competition and the rumble of roller-skating wheels. The News for May 1970 reported as many as 200 young people regularly crowded in to take advantage of evening skating sessions. At two shillings, (10p), skating was cheaper than the cinema.

There have been dog shows, motor shows, book shows, children's entertainment and old people's teas, twist and bingo sessions.

In April 1974 came more disturbances. The hall was packed with 1,000 pop fans who'd paid £1.10p for a ticket for a concert by The Drifters. They waited for 90 minutes for the group to turn up before frustration turned to anger, windows were smashed and police with dogs took an hour to restore order.

Throughout the 1970s the search had been on for a source of funding to allow the transformation of the old building. Mayor Jack Warren started negotiations with millionaire recluse David Robinson. But he found the Corn Exchange too ugly and the cost too high. Mecca became involved for a while, but things move at a leisurely pace in Cambridge and it was December 1986 before the Concert Hall actually opened and the building itself started a new phase in its most varied – and more peaceful - career.

In 1918, at the end of the Great War, a returned army chaplain, Eric Milner-White, started a new sort of carol service at King's College. He adapted an idea that had been begun at Truro Cathedral in 1880 with nine carols and nine lessons read by various officers of the church beginning with a chorister and ending with a bishop. It would, he said, symbolise the link between King's and Eton, the goodwill between University and Town and peace within the whole Church at Christmas time.

Ten years later the BBC broadcast it for the first time; they continued even during the Second War when the Chapel glass was removed for safe keeping, there was no heating and for security reasons the name of the Chapel had to be kept secret. Now it has become a traditional part of Christmas celebrations shared around the world through the magic of television cameras that will illuminate parts of the building invisible to human eye.

Those wishing to attend the Christmas Eve service in person will queue overnight for admission. Other overnight visitors have been less welcome. In 1800 William Grimshaw and Richard Kidman picked the lock to the outer door and for several nights let themselves in. They steadily worked their way picking the other locks that stood between themselves and a valuable collection of college coins and medals. Grimshaw, however, became scared – "the place looked so awful, that he trembled every time as if he had the ague" and he left Kidman to it. Both were caught and transported to Australia.

Others have climbed to the roof. In March 1627 the Duke of Buckingham, favourite of King Charles I and Chancellor of the University, refused to take part in what was then the custom of having the shape of his foot, together with his name and arms cut in the lead of the roof. – it was, he said, too high for him. However later that year an Antiquarian visitor escorted his new bride to the same height where she left her dainty footprint. It was one of the smallest in England, but then she was only 13 years old!

In 1660 the Cambridge town band played music from the top of the Chapel and soldiers fired a volley of shots to mark the Restoration of King Charles II. Although Cromwell's men had used the chapel as a drill hall the famous stained glass had been spared the widespread destruction that was ordered elsewhere by William Dowsing.

The chapel bells were also intact at the time, hanging in a wooden building to the west of the chapel which by 1728 was in such a poor condition that the bellringer, Henry West, was crushed to death when one fell on him. The building was demolished in 1739 and the bell sold for scrap 15 years later.

The interior of the Chapel has been remodelled over the centuries but just 50 years ago In March 1961 the College announced that they had been offered the gift of a work of art of the very first rank – the painting of the Adoration of the Magi by the Flemish painter Peter Paul Rubens. It had been recently purchased for a world record price of £250,000 by Major Alfred Allnatt who had been searching for an appropriate ecclesiastical building in which to display it.

In November the heavy wooden panel, measuring 12ft by 9ft, arrived in a 30ft lorry and trailer, escorted by two security guards and an Alsatian dog. They were concerned less about robbery than a student rag. Ten men took two hours to get the picture to the chapel doors and the 13 hundredweight masterpiece was winched on to a giant easel beside the chapel screen where it was to stay whilst they worked out quite how to display it as an altarpiece.

In April 1964 the painting was moved to the East end, and four years later, confirmed in its position following a major restoration. Not all agree that the Adoration and the setting complement each other. As one man wrote to the Cambridge News in December 1968; “The restored Chapel at King's College is magnificent but I feel that if the Rubens was moved to the right, say as far as the Fitzwilliam Museum, it would look even better”.

Amongst the pictures housed at Ely Museum is a magnificent view of St Mary's Street painted by Henry Baines in 1857. Henry was born in 1823 in King's Lynn, the son of a master mariner. After serving two years of an apprenticeship at sea, he went to study art in London where he formed a friendship with Edwin Landseer. After several years of art training in Europe, Baines returned to Lynn and set up his own Art Academy in Union Street. His pictures consist mainly of landscapes, topographical views and coastal scenes, often with ships or fishing in or around King's Lynn. He was a prolific draughtsman. Following his death in 1894, a large scale exhibition of his paintings was held at Blackfriars Hall, King's Lynn, including 195 oil paintings and 196 watercolours. Some of these pictures, and others from subsequent sales in 1895 and 1914 were later acquired by King's Lynn Museum.

In Cambridge Mary C. Greene was another artist recording the local scene. Mary was deaf; she was also blind in one eye but with the other she could see more than most with two. She was passionate about painting, studying art in Paris. But it was after she settled at Harston with her brother, Sir Graham Greene (uncle of the novelist), that she turned to landscape painting. Often she would walk to Cambridge to potter around, finding charm in over-looked back streets or inn yards. She was no fine-weather artist as her view of Peas Hill on a wet day testifies, Rose Crescent before the rebuilding of 1934 provided her with a glimpse of the market hill, whilst in the courtyard of Ye Olde Castle hotel in St Andrews Street (later redeveloped as the Regal Cinema) she found a peaceful escape from the war-time fervour of 1917. Mary exhibited at the Royal Academy and was President of the Cambridge Drawing Society. She enjoyed her art to the end, the paint on some of the works being still wet when she died in December 1951

Huntingdonshire attracted a number of artists. In 1898 St Ives was described as "an ancient time-dimmed town and a drowsy old-fashioned town, delightfully unprogressive and little given to so-called modern improvement ... a place where the feverish rush of life seems stayed". By then the commercial traffic on the river, once so busy, had virtually ceased and the towing path with its bridges, locks and fords was somewhat neglected, decayed and overgrown. It formed a perfect sketching ground for artists and soon groups of friends came for a week or two. Some stayed a summer and quite a number made the area their home. Their paintings were exhibited in London galleries which spread word of the town's charm. Tourists were attracted to the area which soon developed into a riverside holiday venue, stimulating the growth of leisure boating and fishing. And such visitors increased the market for pictures, which in turn encouraged more artists to produce them. Well over a hundred artists are known to have worked in the area around the turn of the century but by the 1930s almost all had gone, driven out by the harsh economic effects of the Depression and changing tastes in the art market. Several of their paintings are housed in the town's Norris Museum.

Whilst galleries make strenuous efforts to display their collections, many paintings are held in storage, usually because there are insufficient funds and space to show them. Nor do many depositories have a complete photographic record of their artwork, let alone a comprehensive illustrated catalogue of their collections. So what is publicly owned is not publicly accessible. But now a remarkable project has been seeking out such oil paintings held in public collections throughout the country.

Over the last few years the Public Catalogue Foundation has been recording the pictures and collating information about them. It is now well over halfway through this project, having photographed nearly 110,000 paintings from over 1,600 collections. Until recently, their main focus was publishing a series of hard copy catalogues. Now it has published its work online allowing users to search for paintings of individual places or themes. To achieve this aim, the PCF has entered into a partnership with the BBC to build the Your Paintings website. It expects to complete the digitisation programme by late 2012, funding permitting.

But they need your help in identifying locations or adding to their captions of the pictures. If you have an hour or two to spare then log in to www.bbc.co.uk/arts/yourpaintings and prepare to be captivated by pictures you may never have seen before about whatever part of the country you know best

Sherlock Holmes' adventures are once more attracting wide attention with a new series of television programmes.

Such interest is nothing new. In August 1904 the Cambridge Daily News reported: "The current issue of the 'Strand Magazine' possesses a special interest for Cambridge people since the town has furnished Sir Arthur Conan Doyle with material for his latest Sherlock Holmes story, The Missing Three-Quarter. It concerns the disappearance of a member of the Cambridge University rugger team on the eve of the annual match against Oxford. Holmes is supposed to visit Cambridge, residing in an inn next to a bicycle shop; he explores Histon, Oakington and Waterbeach and the final scene of the story is set in a lonely cottage in a field near Trumpington".

But how accurate was Dr Watson's account of his visit? When in April 1989 the Sherlock Holmes Society of London made an expedition Cambridge to examine the great detective's connections with the University and town I was asked to search the files of the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library to see whether there was any contemporary pictorial record of the scenes depicted in any of the stories.

For one it was relatively straightforward. 'The Missing Three-Quarter' describes how Holmes arrives at Cambridge station where he takes a cab to the house of a doctor in the busiest thoroughfare – St Andrew's Street. When he is turned away, his questions unanswered, he takes a room in a hotel opposite. This was the Castle Inn, later destroyed by fire and replaced by the Regal Cinema. Seeing the doctor set off in his carriage Holmes decides to follow – and Howes shop just down the street is an ideal place from which to acquire a bicycle.

There are various pictures that show Holmes on his bike as he makes his way down Petty Cury, Trinity Street, Bridge Street and Chesterton Lane – remembering that he was a master of disguise and could change his appearance en route. Eventually the doctor halts in the middle of Milton Road and invites Holmes to go ahead! He hides up in Milton but the carriage never shows.

Next day Holmes decides to explore the adjacent countryside. This time his route takes him along Victoria Road, then to Histon, Oakington and Waterbeach. But here there is a problem: there is no mention of him having visited Cottenham, yet this must have been on his route. Careful perusal of Cottenham pictures does reveal someone that looks very like Holmes biking down the High Street in which he seems to be pursued by a grumpy-looking cow. Perhaps he was too embarrassed to mention this to Watson!

Once more the exploration is unsuccessful. Holmes returns to Cambridge where he sees newspaper headlines reporting the failure of his entire mission: the University has lost the Varsity match, due to the missing rugger player!

Not to be beaten Holmes tries one last time. He borrows Pompey, pride of the Cambridgeshire draghounds, who follows the aniseed-coated wheels of the doctor's carriage along Newmarket Road, down Coldham's Lane to Cherry Hinton and ultimately Trumpington where the story has its conclusion.

All this seems to show that Conan Doyle's knowledge of local topography was quite detailed.

There is another story that is more challenging to prove. 'The Three Students' involves a scandal that is so intense that Watson will not report in which University – Oxford or Cambridge – the events occur: one of three undergraduates has obtained access to his Professor's room and sneaked a look at the examination paper. He tries to disguise the particular college (though there are some clues in the description of the building that point to Trinity Hall)

The only real information was that the events took place in 1895. A careful study of 'The Granta', the student magazine, for that year actually reveals various references to cheating at exams, Conan Doyle's athletic undergraduates (it was the long-jumper what did it) and a Mr 'Homes' (obviously a misprint). There was even a Mr Watson appearing on the stage of the A.D.C. – apparently cashing-in on his fame, as celebrities do today. It is something Holmes himself was prone also to do for he topped-the-bill at the Cambridge New Theatre on a number of occasions, as playbills and newspaper reports prove!

The great detective's adventures have been screened on a number of occasions but in the 'Table Talk' column for 12 July 1930 the CDN states that "the 'Moriarty' film" showed both Holmes and Watson as undergraduates, claiming "It was here that the great friendship between them began. It was from Cambridge that Sherlock set forth to track down Moriarty and his gang". The News also adds: "Great liberties have been taken with Sherlock Holmes since the first character was created and both in stage play and film you can learn things about the detective that Sir Arthur himself never knew!"

If you have clues or theories, then do share them.

It is always exciting to discover something new. Last week I was shown an architect's drawing of Dale's Brewery in Gwydir Street, Cambridge

It was produced by the Bristol-based firm of George Adlam and Company. The firm designed a number of impressive breweries often in the Queen Anne Revival style featuring ironwork and polychromatic brickwork. Their most flamboyant works date from around the turn of the century and include a particularly ornate brewery built for Green's of Luton in 1900, the more delicate Westlake's Brewery at Cwmavon (1900) and another at Benskin's Watford Brewery (1901).

More typical contracts in the early years of the new century were for smaller breweries of which Dale's seems to have been one.

Frederick Dale established the brewery in Gwydir Street in 1903. Writing in his 1987 history, Bob Flood describes it as a fine example of a small brewery of the period. It had a three-storey block fronting the street with offices and an archway to the yard with other buildings behind it. The name appeared in large wrought iron lettering around the roof and on a large clock projecting over the street.

All this ties in with the Architect's view and many of the buildings shown in the print are still standing. But when was it drawn and was it ever actually built as depicted?

It cannot have been the original design from 1903 for it shows a large tower above the vehicular entrance to the brewery. On the top of the tower is shown a large ornate cup.

Dale's Brewery did indeed have such a trophy. At the Brewers' International Exhibition held in London in 1911 they were awarded the world's championship and a 50-guinea gold cup for the best bottled beer. The championship beer had been selected from those entries winning first prizes in the various bottled beer classes – Dale's winning in the best pale ale and draught beer categories

The firm were proud of this award, which was featured on their bottles and advertisements with the slogan "World's Highest Award" and "Champion Beers". A seven-foot high copper representation of the Gold Cup was placed on the front of the building and remained a landmark for many years. Tony Challis from Great Shelford recalled in February 2003 how he was apprenticed to George Lister and Sons of Abbey Road. "Besides working in the blacksmith and machine shops we would work at many firms around the city. One of our jobs was to refurbish the name ‘Dales Brewery’ on the tower at the top of the building, steel letters some 12-inches high which were bolted on all four sides around the gold cup”. The cup was taken down in February 1961

But it was not there in 1903. My suspicion is that the drawing was produced when the works were expanded in 1912. Several houses were bought to accommodate employees and to allow the brewery to build a bottle store on their gardens, while an orchard was used as stabling for their delivery horses and drays. The Brewery made their vehicles available to undergraduates on Rag Day, reflecting the connection between the firm and the university

Then just when I thought I’d got it sussed, another mystery arises!

For the picture is framed. It has an original label on the back which reads “E. Clarke, picture frame maker ... 3 Free School Lane, Cambridge”. Yet Sue Slack from the Cambridgeshire Collection has checked through street directories to discover that until 1925 the firm was known as Clarke and Warwick. So is the print later than I thought. Perhaps it’s been reframed - but an auctioneer says it has never been tampered with.

It’s enough to drive one to drink – perhaps to the fine brew that provided part of the staple training regime for generations of University rowers. Except that Dale’s was taken over by Whitbread and by 1955 draught beer was no longer being brewed. Instead the premises were used as a bottling store until sold to Cambridge City Council in the 1960s.

In January 1973 the old building had a new lease of life when it became home to the International Centre. But it was not licensed. Instead, the cavernous rooms of the old brewery, which once echoed to the clatter of horses’ hooves and the rattle of casks resounded only to the merry pop of Coca Cola cans and the chatter of many tongues as foreign students found themselves somewhere to gather. Now part of it houses an antiques centre.

But did you work there – and do you have a picture of the large cup itself: which seems to be something that has eluded photographers.

Recently I have been shown a remarkable picture the Pye Radio works at Chesterton, an industry that has now disappeared.

The Pye Group started life in a back garden in Humberstone Road, Cambridge, where in 1896 William George Pye decided to put experience gained at the Cambridge Instrument Company and Cavendish Laboratory to good use by making apparatus for school laboratories or elementary university classes.

After a few years he leased premises in Mill Lane before in 1913 moving to a larger factory in Haig Road, Chesterton, now Elizabeth Way. During the Great War the firm produced gun-sights and other military instruments but when that market collapsed with the peace Pye diversified into wireless. As the radio side of the business grew so more and more space was needed and the site expanded.

In 1932 Pye Radio invited people to inspect their works and queues five or six deep stretched halfway up Haig Road. The News commented: "It is amazing that a non-industrial town should have such fine works and few realised that we in Cambridge had such an important and highly organised industry in our midst. In these times of depression it is a novelty to find a works which is really flourishing". Despite making 4,000 wireless sets a week, demand was greater than supply and they were planning to increase the size of the factory by 50 percent. That November H.R.H. Prince George toured the works; it was the first time a factory engaged in Britain's newest and most progressive industry had been honoured by a Royal visit.

Pye were also experimenting with television and had sets in production by 1936. But when war again came the company turned its attention to military two-way radios and radar, erecting a large mast for the purpose. The Government urged factories engaged on vital war work to move some of their production elsewhere. In Pye's case they suggested Swansea as a good site. But the firm had no wish to be lumbered with a split workforce should the war be won and claimed that Cambridgeshire people would be reluctant to move. Despite the bombs that fell around town, the Pye factory survived. But looking at the new discovery, one is tempted to wonder how. For the rows and rows of buildings stretching to the gravestones of Chesterton churchyard make it a conspicuous target.

Once peace returned Pye resumed their experimenting work, demonstrating colour television in 1949. They developed studio equipment that was used in the new Anglia TV studios in 1959 and was bought by countries around the world. Their technicians worked on special cameras to enable engineers at Calder Hall to inspect the inside of a nuclear reactor and closed-circuit television to monitor traffic in Leeds. Other engineers developed a portable short-range guided missile for use against armoured vehicles and equipment that could be sent into space on a Blue Streak rocket to improve world-wide telecommunication.

By 1966 Pye was an international enterprise employing 30,000 people in Britain and abroad. And then it collapsed. Government indecision over the introduction of colour television hit production and contributed to a drop in profits. In 1967 the company became part of Philips but continued in its old works until 1986. Today one has to search hard to find anything to recall that it existed.

The picture shows part of the Pye empire in its prime. It looks across from Haig Road – now itself disappeared under Elizabeth Way – towards Chesterton church, Scotland Farm and St Andrew's Road. Today the site that supplied employment for generations provides homes for others with Longworth Avenue running through the middle of the previous factory.

The photograph, taken by the Cambridge Daily News, was rescued from a tip when the company itself moved from being in the forefront of technology to just a memory

There are still many folk who can recall their own contribution to that story, with an active Pye Pensioners group that still brings ex-employees together. Photographs record a glimpse of some of the work undertaken there. But what happened in what building? If you can help then please mark up a cutting and send it through to me at the News

Dear Mike

I am replying to your request for information on the Pye Radio factory in Haig Road featured in your Memories article (CN 23rd January). I attach a marked up photo showing the main departments within the complex. I myself was an apprentice toolmaker at Pye Radio from April 1959 till April 1964. My wages on starting in 1959 were 1 shilling 7 pence per hour raising to 3 shillings 8 pence per hour in 1964.

You do not give a date for the main photo but it looks to be taken at around the time I worked there. The new office block on the opposite side of St Andrews Road at the top of pic was not built then & the Pye mast (seen at top of pic) a Cambridge land mark, was still in situ, it was demolished during my time there around 1963/4 I think.

At the time I was there it was mainly television sets (black & white) that were manufactured although some audio products, portable radios & the Black Box record player were made there.

Best regards

Memories 30 January 2012 by Mike Petty

Last week's aerial photograph of the Pye works in Haig Road has brought numerous responses from people who worked there.

Chris Goadby from Newmarket can identify the assembly areas, machine shops, design labs, model shop, drawing office and canteen. He recalls that the general movement of TV sets manufactured was from left to right, the chassis bits coming out of the machine shop across to final assembly where they met pre-assembled printed circuit boards before the completed sets were finally boxed-up and despatched from the right-hand end nearest Haig Road.

Tony Cowley from Cottenham was particularly struck with the view of St Andrew's Church. When he started work at the company he would look out of the workshop window to the graves of his grand parents just outside. He also has memories of the firm's Christmas celebrations, when it would not have been safe for a young male employee to get too near the massed and exuberant women assembly workers! But the staff got together after work was done. I have photos of an outing to Southend in 1936 and a Pye ladies darts team from the mid 1950s – do you recognise anybody.

Clive Cooper and John Wakefield from Gt Shelford have emailed me marked-up copies of the picture. John was an apprentice toolmaker at Pye Radio from April 1959 till April 1964. At that time it they manufactured mainly black and white television sets although some audio products, portable radios & the Black Box record player were also made there.

John's starting wage was one shilling and seven pence (08p) per hour rising to three and eight pence in 1964. At that rate it would have taken him some time to purchase some of the Pye products. An advertisement from 1955 shows that a luxury 21-inch, 13 channel tv cost 140 guineas – over £2,560 at today's prices

Like others John has tried to work out just when the picture was actually taken. It was probably around the time he worked there. The Pye mast, a Cambridge land mark, was still in situ.

The picture does not show the plush 'wavy-roofed' office block built on the river side of St Andrew's Road which was visited by Princess Margaret in 1963. Nor a large cinder-surfaced coach park beyond the church where the coaches that brought in workers from the fens used to park all day. In 1974 more than 1,000 employees – almost a third of the workforce - travelled daily to work by Pye buses. The first of the 40 buses set out from Wisbech in time to make the Cambridge works by 8am. The firm also had a special crèche catering for some 40 children so that their mothers could return to work.

The whole area from the transmitter tower to the car park later became the Pye Telecom works, a four storey white building which opened in May 1978, one week after floods had swamped the area.

But only a part of the Pye empire was based at Chesterton. The studio business manufacturing tv cameras and multi-channel audio mixing desks was in York Street and many of the television cabinets were made either in Coldham's Lane or at a factory in North London. There was a satellite factory at Haverhill and over 60 other Pye 'B' companies throughout East Anglia.

The Pye Telecom works, making telecommunications radios and various complex systems were based at their Ditton Works on Newmarket Road until it closed in 1983. This factory sported the Pye armorial bearings – the first company to be granted such distinction in 1973. .

By 1985 a number of televisions and radios were being marketed under the Pye name, though they were no longer made in Cambridge and featured components produced by Philips. They had acquired a stake in the company in 1967 and completed the take over in 1979.

In 1986 the Pye management team moved to Croydon, leaving the site of the original radio works from which the other Pye companies had grown. Two years later Pye Unicam became Philips Scientific and a famous name passed into history

Tony Cowley recalls that when the last of the employees finally moved out of the site they organised a 'mock-funeral' procession similar to that traditionally held for undergraduates sent down from Cambridge for some misdemeanour. Were you part of that event, do you have photographs or memories to share.

Memories 6th Feb 2012 by Mike Petty

Once more cycle safety is in the news with fears for both the rider and those with whom he might collide.

Such concerns have been part of the Cambridge scene for nearly 200 years. In May 1819 the Cambridge Improvement Commissioners issued a notice "that any person riding a Machine entitled a Velocipede upon the foot-pavement is liable to the penalty of twenty shillings". Despite this there were complaints of two undergraduates on a double velocipede running down a child watching a Punch and Judy show in Barnwell in August 1857

It is not just students who have found themselves on the wrong side of the law in this regard. The eminent University Geologist, Professor Thomas McKenny Hughes, was caught riding a bicycle on the footpath at Cherry Hinton in 1902. When stopped he complained that police would be doing better if they were moving the horses and carts on the road as they were a greater nuisance. When in 1923 Lady Darwin, of Newnham Grange, was caught cycling on the footway at West Road she pleaded not guilty: "I was riding very slowly; I don't think I was doing any harm to anyone. Some of the friends I see before me on the bench have admitted doing the same thing" she told magistrates to their amusement. Nevertheless she was fined five shillings.

Others have admitted the offence. In 1903 The Rev Charles Crump, of Sawston, was spotted riding a bicycle on the footpath. When the policeman stopped him he admitted "You have fairly caught me". Had he been a young lady not a word would have been said, but he supposed the policeman was glad to have caught a parson he told magistrates.

At the annual dinner of the Cambridge Wanderers Cycle club in December 1897 Mr G. Edwards, the Captain, admitted that not all cyclists were angels. There were men who went tearing about, whistling down the street, ringing their bells and expecting to have the whole street cleared for them. But people began to get used to it: "A few years ago the bicycle was looked upon by pedestrians as a real terror and accidents were frequent. Those that grew up with the machine now simply regard it as one of the ordinary dangers but still watch out for the 'wheeler' who comes scorching by at the phenomenal speed of 20mph", the paper commented in 1904

Perhaps such cyclists were just trying to get home before dark! The problem of riding without lights has long been a major concern. In December 1922 P.C. Cudworth was on duty in Victoria Road when he saw a man riding a bicycle without a front light. When stopped the cyclist said it had just gone out and he was going to light it. He then dismounted from the bicycle took a box of matches from his coat pocket and attempted to strike one. The constable then noticed that the lamp on the machine was an electric one which aroused his suspicions that the rider may have been drinking! When in December 1949 Vera Lloyd of Cambridge was stopped for riding a bicycle with a white light on the back she said: "I would have put some lipstick on the glass, but I have not got any!"

Once the cyclist arrives at his destination there is the problem of where to park. "The pavements are full of parked machines whilst college courts are empty, a News editorial of 5th March 1910 observed, adding "it will be 20 or 30 years before the problem is solved". Perhaps they were a trifle optimistic! In 1949 Cambridge was unique for the way people parked their countless bicycles – with a careless flick of the foot, they balanced their machines on the edge of the pavement, suspended on one pedal - and not much of that. But the bikes often toppled over and the council was promising to provide all possible facilities for cycle parking clear off the highways. When Dame Rosemary Murray was University Vice-Chancellor in 1976 she found that the quickest way to travel on official business around the city was on two wheels but found herself squeezed out of the few cycle racks provided at the Old Schools. So she was given a "V-C-Only" cycle stand.

Cambridge cyclists petitioned for their own cycleways as early as 1913 and when the first one way restrictions were introduced in Market Street and Petty Cury in 1925 bikes were one category of traffic that could go against the flow - as they have done legally or illegally ever since.

In March 1971 the Mayor of Cambridge, Coun Alec Molt, faced 300 chanting cyclists outside the Guildhall and signed their petition demanding better provision for cyclists. Led by a Panda car the bikers took a 15-minute tour of the city centre streets before returning to Peas Hill to hear councillors' views. It was 1976 before Cambridge's first bus and bicycle lane came into operation along Victoria Avenue and since then a network of cycle lanes have been established with a bridge over the railway near the station, the longest of its type in Western Europe, which was opened in 1989.

In 1993 the City Council conceived the idea of refurbishing the large numbers of abandoned bicycles, painting them green, and parking them in various parts of the city. The idea was simple. You could merely borrow a bike from one rack and return it to another when finished. Like most ideas it half worked. People did borrow them ... Within a few weeks however the sight of a green bike in Cambridge streets was as rare as sightings of Nessie!

But the dangers still remain and now cyclists are turning to helmets for protection though one undergraduate at a Cambridge Rag Day in 1976 seems to have forgotten that other parts of the anatomy can suffer in the event of an accident!

Memories 13th February 2012 revised by Mike Petty

Bus passengers using the Park and Ride service from Milton last Monday were surprised to be put down, not in the city centre, but at the Four Lamps Roundabout at the end of Victoria Avenue. They faced a hazardous journey over footpaths covered in a mixture of ice and slush.

One elderly gentleman reflected that in the olden days paths used to be kept clear of snow – as indeed was they were across Christs Pieces, a tribute to those who kept them so.

In 1906 the News reported that Cambridge byelaws compelled householders to remove the snow from the path in front of their habitation. This provided an opportunity for the out-of-works to earn an honest copper. One man rang the bell of a corner house and informed the occupier that he had swept the snow from his path. Obviously the only thing for the owner to do was to pay the man for his labour. But when he rang the bell of the adjoining house with many feet of frontage there was no answer and his labour went unremunerated

In March 1947 a labour force in the region of 400 men was engaged in clearing Cambridge streets of snow and there was a generally held view in the town that they were doing a hard job very well. There was an almost cheerful acceptance of the inconveniences with most of Cambridge walking to work - a strange sight in the normally bicycle-crowded streets

When heavy snow fell in January 1962 supplies of salt rapidly ran out at Cambridge grocery shops as people adopted a ‘do-in-yourself’ policy towards clearing away the snow from their doorsteps. In two of the largest stores stocks of block or crushed cooking salt were negligible although there was still plenty at the Corporation store yard in Mill Road despite a considerable amount being used on the streets. Hundreds of building workers who had been laid off because of the severe freeze-up took temporary jobs with the City Council as snow cleaners. Some 250 extra men were put on to help the 50 regular council workmen and 46 extra lorries hired together with 10 bulldozers and two crawler shovels. Gangs were working 24 hours a day gritting and sanding the roads. The cost of all the extra work would, it was conceded, be ‘pretty heavy’ but was considered worth the expense to ensure the safety of pedestrians.

The final days of December 1962 also saw heavy snowstorms and by early January 1963 400 workmen were fighting to keep traffic moving through snowdrifts. Temperatures were so low that buses ground to a halt as their diesel pipes froze, as did the city’s water mains. The quadrangle at the Leys School and Parker’s Piece became natural skating rinks.

In February 1979 when Britain again faced icy chaos the Army laid plans to move in and clear snowbound roads. In Cambridgeshire workmen together with 179 snowploughs and diggers battled to clear some of the worst snowfalls and weather-hit coach passengers took refuge in Parkside police station where they were given mattresses and bedded down in the gym.

More adventurous folk have realised that frozen roads also mean frozen rivers. In February 1929 quite a number of people took advantage of the opportunity to skate to Ely. A News correspondent, signing himself 'Septuagenarian' recalled that it had been February 1895 that the river last had admitted skating to Ely when he and two friends undertook the journey.

Jean Abraham has sent me a photograph of skating on the Cam in 1963. Such scenes are relatively unusual. But skating on the footpath seems to be something that must now be regarded as commonplace

Anglia Ruskin University is currently hosting an exhibition showcasing products designed by Cambridge companies. It features items such as magic mops, Sinclair calculators and cat flaps.

But just 75 years ago, on 5th March 1937, the Cambridge Daily News was also highlighting local traders. Over four closely-packed pages profiled 70 traders who were then household names, from Arnold Brothers the dairy farmers to Whitmore wine and spirit merchants.

Arnold's new model dairy in Abbey Street was one of the finest in the area. They were pioneers of 'Accredited Milk' supplied by their large herds of cows based in local farms and also did a large trade in eggs, butter and other high-quality dairy produce

Mr A.H. Careless's scrap business in Broad Street had been responsible for clearing much valuable ground in the area. In the past when machinery had become worthless it was simply allowed to rot; now he could utilise old iron, copper, rags or rabbit skins, paying the highest price. Rags were sorted and made into paper while old clothes were gleaned of cotton threads that went to make new ones.

W. Delph, high-class florists designed tributes for funerals, weddings and special functions. They were members of the Florists' Telegraph Delivery Association who telegraphed orders to florists around the country at no extra charge

Sennitt's were game, poultry and fish dealers who had been based at Peas Hill for many years. They boasted the slogan 'From Trawler to Table' claiming that they knew when and how to buy, were always first with the new catch and supplied fresh fish at Billingsgate prices.

Hallen's motor cycle specialists of Chesterton always had B.S.A, Rudge, A.J.S. and Levis machines ready for immediate delivery while their car department now stocked Chevrolets and the famous B.S.A. Scout, a small car with a big performance. Mr L.W. Hallen had gained 15 years experience in the trade and everything was under his highly practical control.

The Leys Laundry in Union Lane was proud to be trusted with the laundering of all those things that previously women considered too precious to be handled by anyone outside their own home. Coloured and plain linen, silk goods, table cloths or bedding, each were cleansed and finished in a way that reflected the good taste of the women who sent them there. They also specialised in gentlemen's shirts and collars.

George Stace was the most complete and exclusive merchandiser of ladies' wear and their showrooms in Petty Cury were brilliantly awake in atmosphere to the modernistic trend of the day. All coats, costumes, gowns, fur or lingerie came from designers of the latest fashions; they had a style of their own, yet the prices were most reasonable

Winton Smith's pork pies, made daily in their large factory on East Road, had attained wide-flung success having won over 20 gold medals in national and international competitions. Their sausages too were gaining a reputation for the uniformity of flavour and value for money.

The Cambridge Brush Company in Britannia Place, East Road, had for over 30 years manufactured the 'Don' sweeping and swilling brooms in many different styles and beautiful enamel finishes for hotels, houses, institutions, offices and factories. Every day large quantities were despatched to all parts of the country.

From their chemist's shop in Rose Crescent the two principals, Mr B. Sidney and Mr F. Sidney Campkin maintained personal control over every medicinal item, be it a doctor's prescription or one of their own preparations. Their 'Brewster' specialities, made from the original formulae of the late Mr Brewster, the well-known Cambridge apothecary were recommended by the medical profession.

Whether your requirement was a massive radiogram to a cycle or pram, no one could serve you better than Messrs J. Ward of East Road and Chesterton Road. Under the personal supervision of Mr W.A. Cairns trade was busier than ever. The cycle department had enjoyed renewed popularity with the firm's own 'Crown' machines selling alongside B.S.A. and Sunbeam bikes. Bona-fide customers needed only a few shillings initial payment with the balance paid either weekly or monthly

And if cycling was not for you, then Captain Cooper's Riding School in King Street was one of the largest private indoor schools in the country with well-drained and ventilated stables, commodious loose boxes and training grounds. The Captain was an instructor of the old school who insisted on his pupils sitting on their horses in the correct manner and offered sound tuition to the horseman and horsewoman who wished to ride really well. There was an enclosed field with a good variety of jumps just ten minutes away.

And if all that jumping left ladies sore then there was the Cambridge Health Spa in Regent Street which included Zotofoam mineral salt baths for weight reduction, skin purifying and beautifying – in fact every thing to put within the reach of modern women not merely the possibility but rather the actuality of infinite loveliness.

The pen-portraits of these Cambridgeshire companies had been written by Kenneth R. Redfern of the Guyer Press Association. But what became of them?

Memories 27th February 2012 by Mike Petty

Recent Memories articles have brought responses from two most interesting ladies, and both have a Haslingfield connection.

Kath Skin from Arbury has a bicycle tale. She writes: "My first bike was forced upon me because my family had just moved to Orwell, a village with no education for children over nine years of age. The school for older pupils was at Haslingfield, miles away; there was no transport and one had to cycle. But I had no bicycle and we could not afford to buy one.

However the County Council would provide one, we were told, and we had to go to Lords Bridge Railway Station to collect it. So I walked with my mother, who pushed her own battered old steed, to fetch my bike. We looked at it in some disbelief! It could have come in the Ark, I thought. Upright, dirty, the saddle too high, a bright red painted front central post, and it had solid rubber tyres! 'Must have been a post lady's bike', said mum, 'but God knows when'

But then I could not ride a bike at all. So forthwith I mounted with the help of the Station Master who also lowered the saddle. I fell off. So I did a good many times. Then I wobbled all over the road into a ditch and into a dung heap. But eventually I made it home.

I had the next day to practice and the following day to my new school at Haslingfield I wobbled my way. When it rained, the tyres fell off, so I rode on the rims with the tyres hung over the handle bars. You could hear me coming for miles. My trusty bike took me everywhere but was always a source of interest to everyone. I eventually went to school in Cambridge by bus from the Wheatsheaf Public House on the Eversden/Harlton corner, and gave up my County Council bicycle. I wonder what happened to it?"

Ivy Kirkup of Histon had a much more interesting mode of transport. But her tale starts when she worked at Homerton College during the Second World War, part of the team who kept the essential functions running. She made friends with the other girls, some of whom had come from Beccles. It was good fun until a night in May 1941 when their sleep was disturbed

Heinkel bombers dropped firebombs over a wide area of south Cambridge which smashed through tiles and slates and penetrated ceilings before bursting in upstairs rooms. Often they landed on an eiderdown with a thump and burst into life, showering brilliant sparks, spewing masses of greyish smoke and creating a foul smell. This is what Ivy experienced.

She and the other girls escaped miraculously unhurt and dashed to the air raid shelters. That is where her father found her after he'd biked over from Haslingfield next morning. This was no place for his daughter to be and together they walked back to the village. A day or so later Ivy received a photograph through the post; it showed her and her sister together with the other girls.

But there was a war on, and Ivy had to play her part. She got a job at Pye's in St Andrew's Road becoming one of a vast number of rows and rows of girls producing equipment for aeroplanes one week, jeeps or tanks the next. She soldered her pieces of wires and resistors, then moved them along the line to the next operative. But all that the soldering gave her a chest infection and the doctor said she must change her job. Her boss found her something else to do.

The Government wanted the firm to relocate to somewhere safer from air raids – Swansea. But the Pye's boss was totally opposed. Instead he decided to increase production by making use of people working from their homes where they devoted any spare time to make components. However to keep this army working, they needed supplies – and that was where Ivy came in. Her new role was to ensure the production lines kept running

She was introduced to an odd-type of vehicle based on a motorbike that pulled a truck capable of delivering large loads of components to where they were needed. There was no training – she was given a driving licence and told to get on with it!

She soon got to know her way round to outworkers in Chesterton streets, down to Mitcham's Corner and to a garage in Humberstone Road. The first time she went there was nearly the last: struggling to master the controls of her little Lister truck she managed to back into the wall – 'Don't send her no more, we won't have a garage', the owner told her boss, jokingly.

Similar deliveries were being made elsewhere: out at Sawston there was a person with a proper van. But Ivy's machine was special. She had just put her gloves on ready for another trip to Humberstone Road in 1944 when two men came across and took her picture.

Ivy treasures it as a record of her role in wartime. But were any of your family amongst that forgotten army of workers that she supplied?

Richard Housden from Aspley Guide has been researching the story of the Housden family who have been spread throughout Cambridgeshire. He can claim ancestors back to the 16th century in Great Chesterford, Hinxton and Ickleton.

But his more immediate roots were based in the black fens around Wicken where the Housdens were part of a close, lively community centred around the little Wesleyan Methodist Chapel at River Bank near Upware. His father and his brother and sister were all baptised in the chapel which each year opens its doors for harvest services.

Life in the fen was hard in the post-war days. Drainage rates and taxes were high, yields were declining, the market for agricultural produce was depressed and poverty was no stranger to farmers. Nature began to take back land which had been drained and cultivated in the previous hundred years. Horace, Richard's grandfather, eventually lost his farm after several years of flooding and became a labourer at The Willows, a farm on the edge of the Fordham Fen.

His father and mother met on a blind date in Burwell. They had been courting for sometime, going out together on an old motorcycle, when late one evening, miles from home, their machine broke down. It was impossible to repair before morning so the night was spent under the shelter of a straw stack. The next day when they finally arrived home in Fordham, they were greeted with: Where have you been all night? You'll have to marry her now! Their protests of innocence fell on deaf ears but the lovers were happy to oblige. They wed in Burwell Church on Christmas Day 1930.

Richard was born the following November at the Willows where his parents lived in one of the farm cottages. They soon moved to Martin Road in Burwell, where council houses had been built for agricultural workers. Everyone in Martin Road was poor but families were self-sufficient and when necessary they helped each other. "We had large gardens which were well cultivated - it was rare to have to buy vegetables. Most families kept chickens and a few kept a pig at the bottom of the garden. Nothing was wasted", Richard recalls.

"There was no piped water until 1936; our water was pumped from a well in the street. In very dry summers when the well ran dry, we had to fetch water in buckets from another well half a mile away, and one summer when even that well was dry we went further to fetch water from Hythe Lane on the very edge of the fen. In the winter evenings oil lamps lit our homes and when we went to bed we took a candle upstairs with us. Electricity came to our part of Burwell in the early 1940s but many of our neighbours did not want it; they could not afford another six pence per week in rent to pay for it. But my mother missed the conveniences of town life and ours was one of the first houses in Martin Road to have the luxury of electricity".

In the early days Richard's father had a job at the Ness Farm. However, this was not to last. By the time a baby sister was born in January 1936, his dad was a sick man. He spent the next two years first in Addenbrooke's hospital and then at the Papworth Settlement before dying of tuberculosis in 1939 leaving his 25-year-old widow with three young children.

His mum worked on a milk round and took in sewing to supplement her income. Often she stitched into the early hours of the morning making clothes for them and their neighbours' children. But eighteen shillings a week was not enough to pay the rent and feed the family. When War broke out later that same year it made the situation easier. With the men away at war, work became available in the local brick factory. But it involved eight-hour shifts, 6 'til 2 and 2 'til 10, Richard remembers: "We became 'home alone' children - there was no choice. I was eight years old and in charge - at least, I thought I was in charge! There were friendly neighbours who kept a watchful eye over us".

Richard went to Soham Grammar School where he won a prize for general proficiency. This proved a problem: "I did not have shoes good enough to go onto the stage for the presentation. After I had gone to bed on the eve of the school Speech Day, one of the neighbours repaired my old shoes, so that I could receive the prize the next day", he recalls.

From there he gained a place at Selwyn College, Cambridge where he graduated in mathematics and later he went back to Soham, this time as a mathematics teacher – perhaps you remember him. Later he taught computing at the Open University and was awarded the title of Emeritus Professor at a ceremony in Ely Cathedral in 1998. This time he did have some shoes to wear!

Now he has published his researches into the Housden family history in a 200-page book supplemented by a Compact Disc of extra material. But there is still more to discover. If you can help then email Richard – rjwjmh@yahoo.co.uk - or drop me a line and I'll put you in touch

College porters have been an essential feature of Cambridge life for centuries.

In the 1950s John Saltmarsh traced back some of the individuals who had performed that role in King's College. The oldest he discovered in college archives was 'Andrew the Porter' in 1482. Others who feature are Arthur Lache who was porter for 17 years until he died in 1545 and was succeeded by his widow for a year. Records also show that John Priest started work in 1586 and finished in 1648 – but it is likely that one man really did serve for 62 years, more likely a son succeeded his father. Rice Atkins was Head Porter in 1695 as his name appears on a silver crowned mace still carried on official duties. By the 19th century the position was one of some dignity: one porter was asked to count the number of mourners attending a funeral but deliberately gave an incorrect figure, feeling the task was beneath him.

Other college's porters have featured in the news throughout the years. In December 1898 Judge Hawkins recalled how when he came to Cambridge on one occasion he had tried to bring his dog with him into his lodgings at Trinity College. However the head porter had refused to allow the animal to be brought within the precincts even though it was the pet of one of her Majesty's judges. Hawkins was angry at the time but then sent for the head porter and admitted he was right

It was part of a porter's role to ensure that college rules were kept and that undergraduates were tucked up in bed before the great gates closed for the night. Inevitably this has not always been popular with students. In November 1905 the night porter of Sidney Sussex found the door of his lodge refused to open: it had been securely screwed up and he was a prisoner. After a troubled night he was aroused by the bedmakers' loud ringing at the gate when there was no option but to smash the window and escape through the jagged aperture to admit the waiting and wrathful ladies.

On various occasions the porters have saved their college from damaged by fire. In 1933 the head porter of Peterhouse, Mr Barnes, tackled a blaze in the Junior Combination Room. He brought it under control so quickly that many of the undergraduates did not know there had been a blaze until breakfast time. These days colleges have smoke detectors and the arrival of fire engines is more likely to be in response to an alarm triggered by an undergraduate burning toast.

Many porters have been respected by the colleges they served. In 1908 the funeral of Mr Fordham, head porter of Queens', was conducted in the college chapel where there were a large number of beautiful floral tributes, including one from the President and Fellows. A Cambridge man, he had been connected with the college for 35 years, having also served as the master's butler. Twenty years later in 1928 Mr James 'Jessie' Collins' body was laid in state at St John's College where he had been employed for 40 years, rising from the position of shoe black to deputy head porter.

When Arthur Prior joined the staff of Trinity in 1935 he was the youngest porter ever employed by a Cambridge college. He retired in 1980 after being Head Porter for 14 years having served five different Masters. He was philosophical about the admission of women to previously all-male colleges, a contentious issue of the day. "These youngsters think they invented sex, but we had women here when I first came. They used to stay all night even then, and we knew all about it", he told the News.

Bob Fuller, known as 'The Beast of St John's', a former army sergeant-major, was the last of the old-style head porters. He believed strongly in maintaining discipline and fined students £5 for playing loud music or having parties without permission. But his fierce-looking aspect did not daunt female students after they were admitted to the college in 1982, despite his dislike of the idea. His funeral service was held at the college chapel in 1986

Another of Cambridge's greatest characters was Albert Jaggard of Corpus Christi College who died in February 1982. He was extremely knowledgeable about the college and had a phenomenal knowledge about its old members. Undergraduates believed he was the model for the irascible head porter 'Scullion' in Tom Sharpe's 'Porterhouse Blue'.

Hard Porters have a dedicated team to assist them. Now one of this army of gate guardians has revealed what like is really like for Dons, undergraduates, film stars and innumerable visitors to come face-to-face with the most important of university employees: a college porter. He tells how they dealt with bomb alerts, pranks and alarms, not to mention the mysterious explosions heard coming from beneath the floor of the college chapel as long-dead dons literally 'popped off' when the central heating was turned on.

In "A view from the Lodge" 'Alan James' reminisces about his time as a porter at 'Godesone Hall'. But, as with 'Porterhouse', there is no such College. His earlier career had seen him as a history teacher in a village college about seven miles from Cambridge when life it appears was equally hilarious – or should that be chaotic?

Last week, over coffee, conversation in one of Cambridge's newer colleges turned to the subject of Grunty Fen and rhubarb. An academic had been amongst a group of antiquaries who'd made a journey to inspect the wonder of Ely Cathedral. En route they'd seen the sign for 'Grunty Fen'. Next time, he'd vowed, they would explore. But one thing he did know was Grunty Fen was famous for its rhubarb.

For the uninitiated Grunty Fen is that low-lying area in the centre of the former Island of Ely, separating Wilburton and Stretham from Wentworth and Witchford. For centuries it was waterlogged though in the centre there was a patch of higher land.

Writing in 1908 Albert Pell recalled “I've heard father and grandfather say they used to tie mud-boards on their feet and go out and gather basketfuls of eggs – coots, terns, moorhens and such. There were paths through the reeds to Wilburton and Haddenham from Wentworth. One evening I went with father to cross the fen to see grandmother but in the afternoon a thunderstorm had beaten the reeds down over the path; we missed it and got lost. It was getting dark and father took me in his arms and laid down to sleep till it got light. Dear heart what a night that was. Owls and things came and screeched at us. I thought they were ghosts, and some of these buttleeumps kept on saying ‘Bump, bump, bump’ all the time.”

For centuries locals could turn one to a thousand sheep out to pasture on the fen, to fish, hunt game or cut turf for fuel. These were privileged jealously guarded and in June 1794 a mob of two hundred Grunty Fen men armed with bludgeons and forks made their way to Ely in protest at a dispute over turf cutting. Later another peat digger discovered a valuable gold torq, now displayed in the University Museum of Archaeology and Anthropology.

It was one of the last areas of the old fenland to be drained with a Catchwater dug in 1838. This was a tremendous operation involving the cutting of many bridges and culverts as Wilburton historian Iliffe Norfolk recorded in 1971. At first it seemed to work but within twenty years things had started to go wrong. Continuing peat digging had created large areas of water known as ‘The Pools’ which remained until they were evaporated by the summer sun. Landowners launched a new drainage scheme but met opposition from the Littleport and Downham Commissioners and had to fight in a lengthy court battle before they could complete the work.

Once dry an Act of Parliament was obtained to Enclose it. Surrounding parishes were awarded 'Spade Husbandry Allotments' which were to be cultivated by the poor and the remainder was taken up by the freeholders. But the thin layer of peaty soil quickly vanished and farming became increasingly difficult. Many of the small allotments became neglected and by 1939 much of the land was uncultivated. The War Agricultural Committee pressed for improvement but this would cost £40,000 & the land was worth only £15 per acre.

The railway arrived with a line from Ely to Stretham, Wilburton, Haddenham and Sutton opening in 1866. Although later extended as far as St Ives it never proved a profitable venture. Regular passenger traffic ceased in 1931 although goods trains continue to run along the track until it closed completely in July 1964.

The area made national headlines in June 1980 when the Isle of Ely Member of Parliament, Clement Freud, asked Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher whether she had plans to visit Grunty Fen where people were worried about the level of wage settlements. She replied that the 97 residents were a very happy agricultural community with a low rate of unemployment and content under a Conservative Government. Dorothy Barker of Station Road, Grunty Fen, said: "It is nice of her to think of us"

Later it attracted further fame through the exploits of 'Dennis of Grunty Fen', that tale-telling yokel alter-ego of the late Pete Sayers. One of his revelations was the alleged presence of a great rhubarb plantation – the location of which has now been forgotten. But the Grunty Fen Rhubarb Festival was featured in a guide to Eccentric Britain published in 2011 when there were rhubarb combats, rhubarb semaphore and rhubarb tart competitions at Burwell.

I have searched the literature for accounts of the rhubarb industry. The Professor of Botany at Cambridge published a scholarly paper in the 'Annals of Agriculture' for 1801 in which he gave detailed advice on its cultivation. In 1839 the Farmer's Magazine praised the virtues of a giant Goliath rhubarb being grown in the London market gardens. It was easy to cultivate and excellent for cooking with stalks so large that just one would make a pudding. The leaves were enormous: many four feet long and six inches wide while a single root would grow so large that it filled a wheelbarrow. By 1895 rhubarb was being farmed commercially in the neighbourhood of Spalding in Lincolnshire alongside horse-radish, turnips, mangold and mustard while in 1939 Arthur Mee's guide to Cambridgeshire records that rhubarb and cabbages were growing around the church at Prickwillow.

But I have yet to find a published account of the Grunty Fen rhubarb industry. So how it became known to my donnish acquaintance?

Memories 26 March 2012, by Mike Petty

Cambridge's Stourbridge Common is an area of open ground away from the hustle and bustle of the traffic thundering along Newmarket Road. But for centuries it was the site of one of the greatest trading fairs in Europe. It attracted merchants from Venice and Genoa with silks and velvets, Flemish weavers with their linen, Spaniards with their iron, Norwegians with tar and pitch and wines from France, Spain and Greece.

They were not alone, from all over England tradesmen with their packhorses and wagons negotiated the atrocious roads; from Halifax, Leeds and Rochdale came cloth, Birmingham sent iron and brass, Sheffield cutlery, Nottingham and Leicester glass and stockings. Lancashire wool would probably be bought by Norfolk manufactures, hops grown in Surrey and Kent were destined for northern breweries.

As Honor Ridout has recorded, it had been part of the life of Cambridge since well before the University had come on to the scene. Certainly it was there in 1211 when King John granted the income from the tolls, rents and other payments to support the Leper's Hospital established near by. This was swept away at the Reformation, along with the neighbouring priory of Barnwell, and then the town council and the university had squabbled about who was to have the money and administer the various activities. They reached a compromise which would cause disagreement and friction – and thus one year the Mayor would proclaim the fair first, next year it was the University's turn.

In 1789 the University Vice-Chancellor together with his entourage assembled at the Senate House where they consumed a plentiful supply of mulled wine and sherry together with great variety of cakes. Then they set off in their carriages to the Common, where they proclaimed the fair three times. Duty done the dons proceeded to their refreshment in a substantial brick building called the Oyster House.

The officials pushed their way through an upper room, crowded with people, to reach a roughly partitioned-off section known as 'The University Dining Room'. This had none of the grandeur of their usual eating places: the table was formed from rough planks supported on casks on which were placed several barrels of oysters with bottles of ale and porter in great profusion. All were devoured by the dignitaries who'd been joined by a number of lesser members of the University who had come just for the feast.

Once replete the Academics pushed their way out to enjoy a stroll around the fair and inspect the goods on offer at the various stalls. These included books that might be available for less than the price charged by John Nicholson, known as 'Maps', who supplied students with essential texts. Then it was back to that upstairs room. This was no easy task. In vain did the landlord shout out 'Make way for the Vice Chancellor and the University'. Not a man made an attempt to stir, for the University was very unpopular with the 'peasantry' who enjoyed seeing them have to fight their way through.

At length they reached the dining room where the dinner had been served up for some time. The joints would have been cold, if anything could have been cold in a climate intolerable even to a native of the tropics. There was a large dish of herrings followed by 'a neck of pork roasted, an enormous plum-pudding, a leg of pork boiled, a pease-pudding, a goose, a huge apple pie and a round of beef in the centre'. And although the wine was execrable, a number of toasts were given and mirth and good humour prevailed until half-past six when the party adjourned to the theatre.

The eye-witness account was recorded by Henry Gunning of Christ's College. He also recorded the activities of some of the folk who may well have mingled with the fair crowds. They include Richard Kidman who masterminded a series of robberies of plate from various colleges and was only arrested after his accomplice's house had been literally pulled down to reveal the hidden store of silver and Jemmy Gordon, a notorious drunkard who so scared magistrates that they tolerated his outbursts for fear of what he should declare publicly about their own failings. Nor did Gunning neglect to record the faults and foibles of his academic colleagues including the Master of Christ's whose management of the college and its estates at Bourn led to scandal.

Memories 2nd April 2012 by Mike Petty

March 2012 was warm and dry. But in the countryside there are problems. The lack of rain has meant that many farmers have chosen not to plant their crops since there is no hope of irrigating them.

How different from the March of 1937, 75 years ago.

Then high spring tides had coincided with heavy rain. More and more water drained into the fenland river system but the great sluice at Denver could not be opened to allow it to empty into the sea.

The high river banks became full to the brim and began crumbling and dissolving in the water just as sugar dissolves in tea. Splits occur; the bank slips a bit, but as it threatened to break men rushed to bolster it up with clay.

The banks themselves were already two feet higher than usual because of lines of sandbags. Still strong winds blew sheets of water out from the river and down into the adjoining fen - fen that was itself a sea of mud comparable with the mud of Flanders. "The way your feet sink in with a dull sucking noise reminds me of Passchendale during the war", one fenman remarked.

The sodden fen meant that lorries could not get near to bring bags - potato bags, sandbags - any sort of bag - to shore up the bank even more. And the sodden land itself was unsuitable for filling them. 10,000 bags had been laid since the previous morning and the water was already seeping through once more.

Across the fens, along the top of each river and drain, every available man - hundreds of wet and weary men - watched the water in the river while yet more rain penetrated their clothing and the incessant cold wind chilled them even more. The men were willing but almost at the end of their tether. Most were now so tired that if some really terrible disaster came along they would hardly be any use at all.

At Ely a bugler was standing by to sound a "fall-in" for volunteers in the event of a major burst. The town criers at Haddenham and Swavesey were appealing for extra men to go to the aid of Willingham, just one of the danger points. At Barway and Lt Thetford the banks were breached and the main A10 was cut by flooding near Stretham. Car loads of undergraduates flocking to help in the battle for the fens had to find another way on to the Isle of Ely. They were not enough so 100 men from RAF Mildenhall were drafted in. They found the conditions so bad that the Medical Officer authorised the distribution of rum to keep them warm.

The BBC broadcast flood warnings urging people to listen for the church bells which would announce the time had come for evacuation. For many families it was already too later. Their land was under water, their homes flooded.

The flood conditions in the fens were raised in the House of Commons at the end of March. A heroic struggle was being fought with men and women labouring by day and night with the aid of flickering oil lamps, under conditions of the last Great War, in mud and slime, with water up to their knees in order to defend their own homes. People were trapped in isolated cottages surrounded by water, children were not able to go to school for six months and households marooned, unable to provide themselves even with food and the necessities of life.

The issue was one of urgent and definite national importance. Half a million acres of the richest soil in the country were in daily peril, crops had been destroyed bringing ruin to farmers and unemployment to farm workers.

The blame, as always, lay on the Government cuts in grants for land drainage, be it Tory Government, Liberal Government or a combination of both....

On and on the parliamentary men talked until it was time to turn to other topics - the National Health Insurance Act (amendment) Bill, the Electricity (Supply) Act and then, at just before 10pm the most important debate of all - that the House should adjourn.

The floods of March 1937 are now largely forgotten. They were only a minor dampness compared to the devastation that was to follow ten years later.

Memories 9th April 2012 by Mike Petty

The residents of Hemingford Road, off Mill Road in the Romsey area of Cambridge are planning a street party in July. They are looking for memories or photographs of how people lived in the past and have enlisted the help of local historian Allan Brigham.

His researches reveal that area was developed in the early 1870s when Francis Thoday, one of the largest builders in Cambridge, bought many plots of land when the 'Romsey Farm Estate' was put up for sale. Then when Hemingford Road itself was developed in 1878 Thomas Kingston, another builder, purchased at least twelve of the plots. Tom Hayward, the famous cricketer, also bought a row of the houses that he rented out to tenants

Alan has worked through Corporation Building Plans in the County Archives at Shire Hall – it was magic taking the tracings out of their brown envelopes where they had lain since being approved 100 years ago, he says. But not all the properties were built as proposed. A photograph of no.66 shows that the projecting bay does not extend up to the first floor bedroom as originally intended.

Early residents included builders, carpenters, stonemasons, grocers, insurance agents and railway men. Amongst them was Alfred Strang, a retired forester who'd been born in Scotland. But some came from much further afield.

The 1911 census lists two people born in the Falklands! How did the Bound family end up in a street on the edge of Cambridge? It seems that William Bound was born near Bristol, and was a crew member on a ship that called at the Falklands on the way to South America. Somehow he met Fanny Goss, daughter of the local hotel owner/storekeeper. Fanny's father was one of the first settlers in 1842 and there are still Goss names in the Falklands. William and Fanny married in 1873 had a son Earl Stanley Bound in 1884. They went to South Australia after that but by 1901 William Bound was a publican in Luton and in 1911 he had retired to Hemingford Road. Maybe he came here because his son Stanley had a job as a chauffeur, but for whom?

Alan would like memories of the Wesleyan/Methodist Church (now Romsey Mill). The first stage was erected in Hemingford Road in 1891 with the foundation stone of a new chapel in the Queen Anne style laid in June 1906. The building with its cathedral-like windows and seats for 420 worshippers was a considerable addition to the notable buildings of that end of Mill Road.

Another major amenity was Romsey Recreation Ground now approaching its centenary. And do you remember Goodrum's dairy that was based in Hemingford Road until the 1970s?

My own files include a cutting of a fire in November 1904 which paints a picture of the area. It reads:

Up to last night there was a cluster of buildings, workshops, tool-sheds and fowl houses at the apex of a triangle formed by property facing Mill Road, Hemingford Road and Belgrave Road, Cambridge. Today nothing remains but a heap of charred timber and twisted iron. The fowls had been fed as usual but just after 6.30pm flames were spotted. Neighbours tackled the blaze with buckets of water until the Brigade arrived with their horse-drawn engines. They connected their hoses to the hydrant in Hemingford Road and eventually extinguished the flames.

Amongst those who suffered were Mr Holder, 17, and Mr Curtis, 20, of Hemingford Road whose hen houses were destroyed.

The residents played their part in the Great War. By November 1915 Mr & Mrs Collis of 74 Hemingford Road had five sons in the Army together with two brothers, three brothers-in-law, one son-in-law, two grandsons and 14 nephews, making a total of 27 relatives serving

King and Country. Mr Collis himself was a retired warrant officer having spent 33 years in the army of which 30 were in India.

Another cutting tells how the postman brought a surprise to Mrs M.B. Hills of Hemingford Road in January 1948. It was a parcel from Buckingham Palace containing some of the gifts of foodstuffs sent from overseas to Princess Elizabeth – the present Queen – on the occasion of her wedding and which she distributed to elderly people and widows. Inside was a simple, informal letter in which the Princess said "I want to share my good fortune with others. I therefore ask you to accept this parcel with my best wishes". A number of tins of food inside included chicken soup, 'Prem', beans, coffee, cocoa, milk and chocolate pudding

But does this letter still survive today. And do you have other such mementoes of Hemingford Road. If so Email Allan Brigham - townnotgown@btinternet.com - or drop me a line and I'll put you in touch.

Memories 16th April 2012, by Mike Petty

As news of the sinking of the Titanic was received in Cambridgeshire in April 1912 a number of communities were especially concerned.

For amongst those on board was Arthur William Barringer, son of Mr. William Barringer of Thoday Street off Mill Road in the Barnwell area of Cambridge. Bill was an ex-constable, who'd served for twenty-five years in the Borough Police, then found a job with Chivers at Histon

His son Arthur had been at sea for 15 years first with the Union Castle and then the American lines before switching to the White Star line. He'd served as Steward on the Briton, the Norman, the Guscho, the St. Paul, the New York, the St. Louis, and the Olympic Olympic had been the largest ocean liner in the world until the Titanic had been launched. She'd left on her maiden voyage en route for New York on 14th June 1911 but a few months later had been involved in a collision with a British warship, H.M.S. Hawke, off the Isle of Wight. The incident resulted in a twisted propeller and the flooding of two of the Olympic's compartments. She had returned to Southampton under her own power and gone for repair.

In order to get Olympic back into service as speedily as possible the propeller shaft intended for Titanic was requisitioned. But then in February 1912 Olympic lost a propeller blade and once more the company were forced to pull resources from the Titanic, thus delaying that ship's maiden voyage.

Perhaps feeling the Olympic was jinxed, Arthur had transferred to the new even larger liner, where he rejoined the Captain and other former crew mates.

They included another steward, Herbert Cave, the brother of Mrs Alfred Scales of King Street; Cambridge. Herbert had only married the previous June. Now that wife was a widow. But at least she could be sure; for Alfred's body was amongst those that was recovered and buried at Fairview Lawn Cemetery, Halifax, Nova Scotia

Jonathan Coy of Prickwillow Road Ely was less certain about the fate of his nephew, Francis Ernest Coy. Twenty-six-year-old Francis was an engineer on the Titanic and there was no mention of him among the lists of those rescued. Francis had been born at Thetford, Norfolk, and spent his apprenticeship days in Portsmouth Dockyard after which he joined the White Star line as sixth engineer in the Oceanic. He'd soon been promoted and transferred to the Olympic. Then he too had switched to Titanic as junior assistant third engineer. Francis had married the previous June, now his wife too was widowed.

Also working in the bowels of the ship was 32-year-old fireman George Pond, son of Joseph Pond of High Street Wilburton. He'd served in the navy for many years – and like the others had moved across from the Olympic. Now his father and two older brothers were having to become reconciled to the fact that he was probably dead, even though no body had been recovered.

They had been joined on the voyage by a Wicken lad intent on seeking a new life for himself in America. David Barton, third son of Shaw and Mary Barton of Belle Vue Cottage had decided to emigrate with two other friends, Arthur Taylor and Sidney Day. They'd bid farewell to family and friends and made their way off to the departure point. But a day or two later David was home. For on arrival at Southampton he had been rejected as unfit to travel because of a possibly contagious blemish on his face. He tried again, and again was forced to delay his journey. Finally, while his mates waited for him on the other side of the Atlantic David had finally been accepted on Titanic, paying eight pounds one shilling for a third-class ticket to New York. His body was never identified.

Back in Mill Road the community joined in the concern for their local lad. On Wednesday there came a telegraph from Arthur Barringer's wife in Southampton, who had two children, to say that there was no news as to whether he was alive or not. His favourite hymn 'Lead Kindly Light' was sung at the evening service at St Philip's Church. But there was to be no positive answer to their prayers. Arthur had returned home to Cambridge two years earlier. He was never to be seen there again.

Memories 23rd April 2012 by Mike Petty

Caroline Goldstein has recently sent me an adverting leaflet that she discovered tucked away in an old Bible

It was issued by the Cambridge Express newspaper in October 1892

The Express claimed that it was the best local newspaper and enjoyed the largest circulation of those journals published in Cambridgeshire. At the time these included the Cambridge Chronicle, Cambridge Independent Press and the then new four-year-old Cambridge Daily News which also issued a Cambridgeshire Weekly News. It did not add that it was also the cheapest, selling for just one penny.

Not all its pages were filled with local news. The Cambridge Express always contained a number of special features on agriculture, London gossip, interviews and Friendly Society notes. It also carried a serial story – at that time 'Beatrice and Benedict', a romance of the Crimea by Captain Hawley Smart which was based on his own experiences as a soldier in that campaign.

But the new headline-grabbing attraction was to be a series of local sketches entitled that would feature architectural beauties, curious customs and old-world traditions. The first picture selected to entice new subscribers was of Madingley Hall and church.

However there was one omission – the name of the artist was not given. Perhaps everybody already knew him

John Sebert Clarke was probably the most prolific local artist of the age. Those people who took the 'Ely Diocesan Remembrancer' encountered his work in every issue whilst he also produced pictures in each edition of Spalding's 'Handbook, diary & almanack' between 1900 and 1917 and much more

Clarke's sketches, mostly of churches, were published in the Cambridge Express most weeks from 1892 to 1896. Most villages were covered, from Melbourn to Sutton, Dullingham to Colne. His view of Quy, published in the issue of 7th April 1894, is slightly different as it shows the picture of the church on his artist's easel. They proved so popular that they were republished in two volumes entitled 'An Artist's Rambles in Cambridgeshire' in 1894.

Clarke could also turn his skills to other subjects. He produced advertisements including one for Kidman's builders and contractors of Sturton Street which showed their yard together with details of individual aspects of their work.

But in the days before photographs the paper's artist was required to illustrate news stories as well. Thus when in 1895 great sewage works were in progress a series of detailed articles were produced to explain the technical difficulties being experienced, not least the placing of iron pipes across the bed of the Mill Pool - a scene captured by Clarke from the landing stage of the Anchor inn and showing the Kings & Bishops' mills in the background.

One of the most dramatic stories he covered had been in October 1890 when the largest fire for 30 years caused £2,000 worth of damage to rooms at Clare College, destroying the roof, bringing down the ceiling of the Combination Room and cracking the college's 270-year-old bell. Were it not for the strenuous efforts of the fire fighters the flames may have spread to neighbouring buildings and Clarke's view depicted their fight to control the blaze.

An insight into the care he took can be gleaned from two items preserved in the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library. One is a pencil sketch of the Cambridge University and Town Fire Insurance Company building in Sidney Street, the other an original photograph which he copied. Careful comparison shows that the two are remarkably similar. But the photographer failed to capture the chimney pots so Clarke had gone out into the street and pencilled them in, then added a wisp of smoke for good measure

Although his name and artwork survives little has yet been discovered about the man himself. Both he and his wife described themselves as "artists" and lived in several houses in Cambridge.' In 1881 he was in Earl Street while the final entry in the street directory seems to be in 1907 when he appears as a builder and decorator with a workshop in Blinco Grove. But he continued to exercise his art for in October 1913 he produced an illustrated scroll that was presented to W.H. Smith at Trinity Place Mission Hall.

John died of influenza and pneumonia on 31st October 1918. He had two sons and his last-known descendant in the UK is believed to be Alan Clarke in Llanelli, Carmarthenshire. Alan has been researching the family tree for many years and would be delighted to learn of any branches that still survive – email thelivinggarden@hotmail.co.uk

However there is a thriving clan of Clarkes in New Zealand who would be equally interested in anything more you can tell them

As for the Cambridge Express, it continued until 1909 when it merged with its old rival, the Cambridgeshire Weekly News. John Clarke had switched papers several years before; having started his journalistic career with the 'Cambridgeshire Weekly News' at the beginning of the decade he'd returned to them in January 1897.

Christine Shephard emailed me to say ‘Your Looking Back snippet in the Cambridge News interested me as one of the cottages lost in the fire disaster in Lode was lived in by my Great, Great Grandmother. Mrs Abbott’. I sent her a copy of the actual article which revealed another family connection: her great grandfather’s pigs and fowls had been rescued!

The report in the Cambridge Weekly News of 12th April 1912 described how a disastrous fire resulting in the complete destruction of two cottages had occurred at Lode. The building, which was very old, was of stud and plaster with a thatched roof, one room was used by the Lode Institute. It was home to Mrs Abbott, the widow of a former schoolmaster who lived with her daughter

The fire had been first noticed about one o’clock in the afternoon by William Benstead, who was standing by the Cow and Hare when he saw smoke rising through the roof between the chimneys. He raised the alarm and the police at Bottisham were informed by wire. But it was half-an-hour before Inspector Dean received the message and summoned the village fire engine.

Meanwhile a strong wind was spreading the fire rapidly. Many eager neighbours were helping to remove much of Mrs Abbott’s furniture from the burning cottages and had started to fight the fire. But it was too late: the roof fell in and the walls collapsed.

The danger was spreading as flames, fanned by a strong wind, were threatening neighbouring thatched buildings. In the adjoining premises Mr R. Hatley (Christine’s great-grandfather) had a number of pigs and fowls. These were happily rescued and he helped fight the conflagration alongside Mr R. Cornwell, Mr G. Cornwell, Herbert Hiner and several women. ‘Seldom have unorganised firemen done more effective work in fighting the flames than on this occasion’, the News commented.

But there was criticism: although Mr Fred Newman and Mr Fletcher had rushed for the Bottisham fire engine it did not actually arrive on the scene until the fire had been raging for an hour. First they’d had to get the horse, described as a slow-going agricultural animal, then plod along the road to Lode. After the battle had been one and the engine was drawn back to Bottisham about five o’clock it left several of its buckets behind. Lode men stood by the smouldering remains all night in case of further outbreaks and continued to pour water on those parts of the ruin which still showed signs of fire.

The engine was a Hadley and Simpkins machine that had seen over a century’s service. It had been presented to the parish by Miss Jenyns of Bottisham Hall in 1796 following the destruction of six thatched cottages near Parsonage Farm, Bottisham the previous July. A similar machine had been given to the neighbouring parish of Swaffham Prior by Squire Allix in 1791.

Over the years the engine had played its part in various fires. In 1846 a labourer with a grudge had set fire to a farm belonging to Mr Free. High winds had fanned the flames to cottages on the opposite side of Bottisham and instantly 15 homes were in one blazing mass. “It was truly heart-rending to see the poor creatures, with merely their night clothes on, running with their families they knew not wither, to gain a place of refuge”, the Norfolk ... reported. A man known as ‘Squirrel’ was arrested on suspicion of arson

Then in October 1904 a devastating blaze had broken out on Charles Parker’s farm near Bottisham church. It was the most thickly populated part of the village with 20 cottages close at hand. Once more the old manual engine, stored at the Police Station, was requisitioned and under the direction of Fred Newman proved useful, despite its age. Thanks to a good supply of water from wells and the parish pump and the hard work of village fire-fighters it was stopped from spreading to adjoining premises.

It was still considered to be in fairly good condition, having been repaired by the Parish Council in 1897. But it was in need of more use to keep it in better order. It was called out again in the following February to tackle a fire started by a tramp smoking a pipe whilst passing the night in a stack at Spring Hall Farm, near Bottisham.

Bottisham's manual fire engine featured in the columns of the News again in March 1930 when a reader, Mr W.F. Turner, came across it in an old lumberyard at Cambridge. The original pump had disappeared but the solid wooden wheels with their iron rims were still intact.

Other parishes had their own fire engines. In 1816 Bassingbourn parishioners purchased one of the pumps that had been used at the Napoleonic Prisoner of War camp at Norman Cross near Peterborough. It is now preserved in Peterborough Museum. But do you know what happened to the machine that played such an important part in ensuring the safety of Lode and its inhabitants?

Memories 7th May 2012 by Mike Petty

Last week I have enjoyed the privilege of meeting two groups of senior citizens in different parts of the city.

One was a final visit to a venue I have popped in to for more than 30 years. The Hill Top Centre proudly displays a framed certificate recording that it can trace its history back to a day in May 1952 when the Foreign Secretary, Mr Anthony Eden journeyed to Cambridge to open an Anglo-American and Allied services Club on Castle Hill.

The initiative had come from the Women's Voluntary Service who were keen to provide a club for American Servicemen. It would open each evening during the week with the intention of luring them away from the attractions of their camps so they could learn – in Eden's words - "what extraordinary animals the English are".

By January 1958 it had become the Hill Top Club, a place where the local elderly could gather, find companionship and enjoy hot lunches at moderate prices. It sported a sitting and a games room with a full-sized billiard table. This was a role it fulfilled for nearly 20 years though the building became increasingly dilapidated over time. Then in 1976 it moved to a new site in Primrose Street off Victoria Road.

Last week the staff, helpers and those who appreciate the kindness and care that they have been shown celebrated the 60th anniversary of the Hill Top Club by cutting a cake and recalling past times as they prepare to start a new chapter in another venue off Brooks Road

The previous day I had journeyed to meet other people with memories to share, this time in a new centre in Wulfstan Way. Here I was joined by Sarah Payne whose series of 'Down Your Street' articles published in the Cambridge Weekly News 30 years ago are still treasured in many local homes.

The area was developed in the early 1950s - some present could remember playing in the fields before the bulldozers moved in, fields where Kitchener's army had encamped during the Great War and from which Alan Cobham's Flying Circus had offered people an aerial glimpse of the village of Cherry Hinton

Sarah chatted once more to Eve Rowland who she had featured in her article on Wulfstan Way in March 1982. With her late husband and son Eve had run the award-winning 'Maid Marion Stores', a spic and span grocer's beloved by its customers which offered a welcome and a chat together with a delivery service three times a week. It was one of a line of local shops including a butcher and a post office which doubled as a greengrocer. There was also a pub, the Queen Edith, which had opened in December 1961 but has itself now passed into history, while the Queen Edith Chapel opened by the Christian Brethren in May 1956 continues to thrive.

The spiritual needs of the new community were met by a new St James' parish church dedicated by the Bishop of Ely in June 1954. Within a year the congregation had outnumbered the amount of seats provided with a Sunday School averaging 145 each week since the majority of the families in the parish had very young children. The small church was extended and its rooms now provide a base for a number of groups from young to not so-young. I have memories of visiting the lunch club that until recently provided a most welcome gathering place where more companionship could be found.

Back in 1982 Sarah had chatted to Horace and Beatrice Gowler who were amongst the first to move in: "When we first came it was very empty and bare here, with no birds", they'd recalled, while Desmond and Daphne Summers spoke of a stream that ran between the allotments and the houses on the east side of Mowbray Road. "We used to lay two planks across the brook to enable me to wheel the pram to the shops in Cherry Hinton Road", Daphne recalled. Others

Last week memories were being probed once more, this time by youngsters from Queen Edith's Primary School as part of a project which is bringing together the generations to investigate and appreciate the story of this part of Cambridge and its residents.

Memories 14th May 2012 by Mike Petty

The incessant wet weather last week caused the cancellation of the Badminton Horse Trials, forcing Cotswold hoteliers to seek desperately for folk who could be encouraged to fill rooms emptied by the loss of competitors or spectators.

And if we were journeying all that way, it would have been bad form to completely ignore the attractions of the tourist spots en route. Thus it was that I broke the journey at Lower Slaughter joining other visitors admiring a group of horses pausing in the stream to slake their thirst and enjoy a splash in the water

It was a typical part of 'Old England', a sight once commonplace in Cambridgeshire. Here, as pictures depict, farmers would often drive their carts into the pond to water the horse and swell the cart wheels. But newspaper accounts show things could be far from ideal.

Thus it was that in September 1911 the man in charge of a horse and cart belonging to Prime Godfrey drove it into the school pond at Swavesey. The pond was nearly empty but the horse got stuck in the mud; in its struggles it became embedded deeper and deeper in the thick mire, the cart seeming to hold it down. Eventually it took eight or nine men hauling for all they were worth to pull it out. A similar misfortune had befallen a travelling fishmonger from Cambridge, the previous August when watering his horse in a pond near Conington church; then it had taken the labour of men and a tumbrel cart before they could be extricated.

Quite often it was people who used the water for drinking. In 1898 an inquest at Cardinal's Green, Shudy Camps, heard how a child of seven years had complained of sickness. For dinner she'd had beef, pudding and potatoes and drank water fetched from a pond. Doctor Jones said that the water was most dangerous. It was full of injurious microbes, and ought never to be used, even for washing domestic utensils, without being first boiled. But it was the only water supply for drinking purposes in that part of the parish

Traction engines would also top up their water supplies at roadside ponds. At Ashley in 1925 a battle broke out after farmer Octavia Bocock spotted an driver taking on water from his pond and threatened to stand in front of the engine until he'd been paid five shillings. The situation turned ugly and the matter ended up in court

Time after time water from the village pond was used to fight fires. In June 1906 Barton rectory was completely gutted. The vicar's wife, who was an invalid, had been in bed and it was with difficulty that she was aroused in time to make a hasty escape in her sleeping apparel. Although there was a plentiful water supply from the village pond it was obvious the building would be gutted. It was left to burn itself out, though the church books and plate were rescued

Ponds have even been used for baptisms. In September 1910 painful scenes were witnessed at Little Downham during an open-air baptism in the Pit pond in Cannon Street, a shallow pond chiefly used for watering horses and washing carts. The Minister, wearing a pair of waders reaching over his knees, was immersing a woman when her husband suddenly arrived. He walked into the water and tried to disrupt the service, causing great consternation to the members of the Baptist community present until he was restrained by the village policeman.

Afterwards there was an angry scene as he upbraided his wife for acting so, against his wishes.

They have also even been landing places. In 1924 a Belgian balloonist came down in a pond ten feet deep at Norney Farm, Ely. He was pulled out by Mr Herbert Cross, an Ely farmer. The aeronaut had been taking part in a big race from Brussels for a £2,000 prize, had crossed the Channel during the night and experienced a very rough journey. His balloon was said to be the smallest in existence and the pilot had to stand all the time he was in the air.

But pond maintenance was a problem as Isleham parish council discovered in June 1908. The pond where the water in East Road drained from off the highway had always been cleaned out by men who had sold the mud as reimbursement. Now however they could not find anyone to purchase it. A number offered to do the job for £3 but the mud would belong to the council and the clerk, Mr F. Fyson did not know what he'd do with it.

Some thought the best thing was for ponds to be used as dumping grounds. In 1928 Cottenham pond was filled in by the Rural District Council at a cost of £42. The figure was quite staggering but an excellent job had been made and the village beautified. An insanitary place had been cleared away – there had been talk of typhoid two years ago – and it was more economic than cleansing the pond in the long run. However nearly every village had a pond and they would all want them filled. Certainly the Clerk of Milton Parish Council drew attention to what he called 'the cess-pool known as the pond' which was a menace to the health of the village. It was on a bend in the road and was a danger to traffic on dark or foggy nights.

Some ponds have survived as an attractive feature of the village scene. There was despair when in 1972 the one at Comberton dried up for three months. Fortunately help came in the shape of the Royal Engineers based at Waterbeach who deepened it, removing several tons of slime and silt to restore its beauty. Even the ducks returned and the world became right again.

Dear Mike,

I was interested in your article, Memories, on ponds. You mentioned a Prime Godfrey horse and cart getting stuck in School Pond, and depicted a pond, the Swan Pond, in Swavesey.

It is possible that you are aware of the action taken by the Parish Council to fill the Swan Pond in order to create a car park in the 1970s! Details, for your information are as follows.

Over the years the Swan Pond situated in Church End, Swavesey has experienced a chequered history. Prior to a piped water supply in the village the pond served a useful purpose for providing drinking water for the people living in that end of the village. Its source of water was also essential for the fire brigade during the Swavesey Fire in March, 1913, and cattle and carters' horses were 'watered' in the pond.

In the 1970s the pond became a neglected morass of reed covered thick black sludge and the Parish Council decided and began to fill it in with hardcore and make it into a "grassed emenity and car park" (CEN: 2 April 1973). A section of the local community objected who wished that the pond be maintained as a "visual emenity" and continue to serve as a "useful drainage function". Subsequently the Cambridgeshire County Planners intervened and the pond was cleaned, landscaped and stocked with water plants, including beautiful water lillies, and goldfish; and for many years was maintained by a nearby lady resident in Frere Cottages.

Note: Photographs and articles appeared in the CEN at that time. one was captioned "Planners say stop as a village pond disappears".

With best wishes,

Stephen Bull

Joan Jackson has emailed me after she spotted a picture of a line-up of delivery vehicles outside the former Cambridge Daily News works in St Andrew's Street.

She writes:

"My dad, Mr Bert Holmes, worked at the News during the 1930s and was the driver of the third van from the right. I have clear memories of his time there as during school holidays he would occasionally take me with him on his rounds as a special treat. He delivered papers out as far as Saffron Walden and all the villages in between. Not only did I enjoy the ride in the van - cars were unheard of luxuries in those days - but I remember the other drivers made quite a fuss of me and I usually received several bars of chocolate and packets of sweets.

"One of the drivers who was a close friend of my dad was killed during the war in an attempted raid in Europe but I can no longer remember his name. I do remember a Mr Male who was the manager involved in the delivery department as well as meeting Captain Archie Taylor who I believe was the Managing Director of the News in those days"

Bert drove one of a new fleet of vehicles that was introduced in 1933 to ensure that copies of the paper were received at newsagents around the region, whatever the weather.

But in December 1934 one of the vans made front-page headlines.

The vehicle was being driven along the road between Soham and Stuntney when it collided with what was described as 'a mechanical horse railway wagon'. Captain Taylor immediately made his way to the scene: "The van could not have been more badly smashed up had it been dropped from an aeroplane on to a concrete road. It was reduced to a heap of twisted metal and matchwood", he reported. About the only thing worth salvaging were the tyres and the radiator.

The driver, Tom Watson of French's Road, was trapped by his legs in the wreckage; he was taken to Addenbrooke's Hospital where an x-ray showed that he'd broken his pelvis. The driver of the mechanical horse was another Cambridge man, W.C. Hammond of St Peter's Street, who was only slightly hurt. By a strange coincidence the two men knew each other Joan's father left the News in either 1938 or 1939 when he took a job as caretaker of St Andrew's Street Baptist Church across the road. The family moved in to No.41 St Andrew's Street almost opposite the News where they stayed until 1948.

Joan points out that to the left of the entrance to the New Theatre there is a blind which covered a little sweet shop's window. This shop, which of course also sold tobacco and cigarettes, was owned by a Mr and Mrs Flyman and was very popular with people visiting the theatre.

She got to know them very well as within the chapel premises there was a specially reinforced and protected room where the family used to go when the air raid siren sounded and Mrs Flyman used to come over to join them with her cat. "I don't remember Mr Flyman being there, but I seem to recall he was an air raid warden, so he would have been on duty", she adds

"The air raid siren was sited on the Borough Police Station which was next door to the chapel in those days, and the sound of it was deafening. We were there at the time bombs fell in the Hills Road area and not far from the Round Church, nothing like people had to endure in other cities and parts of the country, but scary nevertheless.

"Another interesting thing I remember about our time there was that during the war when the American troops began to arrive in large numbers, some of the premises belonging to the chapel, though not the Chapel itself, were converted into a canteen and social area for them.

"I seem to recall that there was some temporary accommodation made for them there as well. I do remember clearly the huge divide between white and coloured soldiers from the States which seemed quite shocking to us, even though we weren't used to seeing many coloured people in Cambridge, apart from those at the university. Only white men were allowed to come into the facilities at the Chapel - not very Christian - but the rules were made by the US Army and not by the folk at the Chapel"

I have been approached by a number of readers hoping that you can help them.

Sally Hedges Greenwood has emailed (salgreen85@mac.com) to say she has a photograph in her family archives that has been bothering her since she inherited it in the late 80s.

It shows a stagecoach outside the Rose and Crown Hotel at Wisbech which was in its day the town's major coaching inn. Writing in 1898 Robert Gardiner records that it was refronted probably at the beginning of the nineteenth-century but inside could be seen the roomy old stairs and panelled work dating back to the 1700s. It was then one of some 100 licensed establishments in the town but closed in February 2011 and – its website suggests – might not reopen.

In the 1800s a mail coach used to leave daily for London and there were connections to other large towns in East Anglia and the Midlands. Sally's photograph shows a London to Brighton stagecoach but was taken in the mid 1930s by E L Witcombe of 7 New Quay, Wisbech.

As stagecoach travel had long-since ceased this was obviously a specially-staged event. However this is not the most puzzling aspect of the picture: it features a number of oriental children with very elongated necks adorned with a series of rings. So what is it all about?

Tim Cockerill from Weston Colville needs help in another quest. He is urgently seeking a photograph of the Revd. James George Clark who was Rector successively of Conington, Cambs 1881-89, Radwell, Herts 1912/13 and Hockwold-cum- Wilton between 1913-26. Rev Clark owned and lived at Anglesey Abbey 1888-1912 and died in Cambridge in 1929 leaving eight children. Somebody, somewhere must have a picture with him on it – perhaps at the dedication of Hockwold war memorial, perhaps at a church garden fete. If you have one in your files please email Tim - tjcockerill@btinternet.com - or drop me a line and I'll put you in touch.

Other readers have kindly contacted me following other articles.

Stephen Bull, a former resident of Swavesey, now living in Bar Hill writes: "I was interested in your article on ponds. You showed a picture of the Swan Pond, in Church End Swavesey. Over the years this has experienced a chequered history.

For many years it was maintained by a nearby lady resident in Frere Cottages. Sheila Proctor (nee Crisp) found her memories sparked by my article on Wulfstan Way. She writes:

“I lived there at No. 2 with my parents from 1953 until I got married in 1963. I remember the shops - I had to walk down to the grocers to get the shopping on a Saturday morning before I could go to the pictures! Mary and Ken Hall had the hairdressers and Mr. Cruickshank was the butcher. My best friend Joyce Mansfield lived at No. 15 and her brother Ken and his wife

“We had a large side garden which he had to dig over when we first moved in. There had been another family there before us but they were unable to cope with the garden because it flooded, we were told. When Dad got digging he found the flooding was caused by so much brick rubble left there by the developers when the estate was built. The council were reluctant to remove it but did in the end and then he had to have a load of top soil delivered to make the ground level again. Mr. Kingdom (Headmaster at Coleridge School) came past and congratulated him on his determination to sort the garden out. It then became a productive vegetable and fruit plot. Mum was very proud of her apple trees until someone came in one night and took the last ones!

“Dad was offered the house to buy for £2,200 but refused, thinking it was not worth it! It could be quite cold in the winter because it was built with just thermal blocks. They then moved over to Holywell Rd. off Histon Rd. but missed Cherry Hinton, so came back and bought a new house in Malvern Rd. where they lived for many years.

“Your picture shows one car and that was more or less how it was. Dad had a car because he was a taxi driver, first for Camtax and then his own private car. The house did not have a garage, so he used an old shed arrangement at Coe's Farm on Cherry Hinton Road. and had to walk backwards and forwards each day. Happy memories once again.”

With the country in the midst of celebrations for the Diamond Jubilee of Queen Elizabeth II it seems appropriate to recall that it is an occasion that has happened once before.

Back in June 1897 it was another Queen, Victoria, who had been on the throne for 60 years and Cambridge prepared to mark the occasion. Carefully preserved in the Cambridgeshire Collection at Cambridge Central Library are admission tickets to some of the events organised, photographs and files of newspaper accounts that show some parallels with what is happening today, although the language has changed something over the years

Then the decorations were lavish: “In the daytime, the town came out as gay as an Admiral Butterfly; at night it was a perfect Fairyland and feast to the eye. From the railway station to Castle Hill ran an unbroken array of flags, bunting, pictures and triumphal arches”. All of the colleges in the centre of town were illuminated with Caius in particular standing out, its new Waterhouse building being described as a “perfect precipice of glowing prismatic lamps”

The celebrations started on Monday evening with a lantern parade of over a hundred cyclists many in costume. The first prize for the best decorated bicycle was awarded to Mr Dunn who had made his machine represent the Indian jungle. There was a deer's head in the middle of grasses and evergreen, with a monkey among the ferns and vegetation. Mr Dunn himself was dressed as a hunter

The main festivities on Tuesday 22 June went without a hitch. "The sun was outpouring all the general brightness of his mid-summer effulgence from a cloudless azure sky". At midday a sixty-gun salute was fired and 1,000 pigeons swept up into the heavens in circular swirls.

Some 20,000 people gathered to watch a procession of decorated carriages. One conveyed old people from the workhouse with one or two of the old dames behaving most frivolously, winking and giggling like any little schoolgirl. There was a fete on Midsummer Common where shooting galleries, stalls, coconut shies and one of Thurston's steam roundabouts kept matters lively. It was followed by a fancy dress bicycle carnival; the first prize for the ladies, a diamond and ruby crescent brooch, was awarded to Miss L. Unwin of Newnham who, with helmet, breastplate, shield and trident made a dignified Britannia. She also received a silver "King of the Road" lamp and baby bell given by the Humber Cycle Supply Company

Sadly the much-anticipated water carnival was less successful. A News reader had suggested that a grand naval engagement should be fought on the river Cam with the explosion of mines, the firing of guns from ironclads and torpedo boats. Sadly this was not to be though crowds lined the bank between Jesus Lock and Victoria Bridge to witness an obstacle race and a water derby. The highlight was a competition to walk a greasy pole. It all left no time for the canoe race so it had to be postponed till next day.

Later nearly 40,000 turned out for a firework display. "It seemed as though for many acres one could have walked upon the heads of the people without fear of falling. The devices were numerous and uniformly good, the most popular, of course, being a fire portrait of the Queen"

Later came special treats for the young and old. A "monster public dinner" was given to 1,000 over-sixties in two large marquees on Parker's Piece. The old people began to arrive very early, with beaming faces and expectant eyes. "Gowns of antique stuff, redolent of sweet lavender, that had lain by for years protected against the ravages of moths, were brought out in honour of the occasion while one old gentleman had hunted up a pair of white jean trousers that he went courting in 50 years before". As a band played they tucked in to cold roast beef, hams, veal and ham, salad, cheese, cake and strawberries washed down with ale, lemonade, ginger beer and tea. Each diner was presented with a commemorative tankard. Next afternoon it was time for 4,000 schoolchildren between the ages of seven and twelve. A mug and plate was provided for each child and they fed on bread and butter and two lumps of cake. Far more came than had been expected, many of them obviously either over or under the specified age. At the end of the feast they romped and danced to the music of the band

There were celebrations around the county; West Watting gave dinner to the tradesmen, labourers, old and young; while at Cheveley Park villagers dined in a large marquee. There were sports at Dullingham, fairy lights at Linton, a parade at Swaffham Bulbeck and a tea at Haddenham. Even little Barway organised a cricket match and rural sports that included sack races and a grinning through a collar competition. However Chippenham was quiet. Owing to the spoor state of Mr Tharp's health at the Park the celebrations were abandoned and on one of the large farms the men worked as normal.

But at Cambridge there was no hitch from noontide till midnight. One paper commented: "The recollection of that day's rejoicings will survive for life in the memories of those who took part in them. We have never seen Cambridge look better than it did for this unique event, and the orderly behaviour of the crowd added materially to the enjoyment" Indeed, so well behaved had the inhabitants been that no one appeared before the magistrates on the following morning.

History will tell whether the same will be said of today's celebrations. And the Cambridgeshire Collection would welcome modern programmes and souvenirs of only the second Diamond Jubilee

Memories 11th June 2012 by Mike Petty

A few short weeks ago I had a phone call from a wonderful old gentleman, Alec Sadler, who told me his memories of looking out from the window of the isolated farm near Wilbraham to see something strange in the sky.

He'd been drawn to his window by a loud and foreign noise; engines were not commonplace as the farm was operated manually with horses. On peering out he was filled with both fear and excitement. Flying low and engulfing his vision was the R101 airship coming straight towards him. Shouting to his mum and dad he ran downstairs and out of the back door to watch the colossal airship pass over the house and away towards Fleam Dyke. The impact of such a sight can be hard to imagine.

And of course it did not escape the vigilance of News reporters: On 1st November 1929 the R101 had left the mooring towers at Cardington at 9.41 am and under the power of three engines had cruised over Bedford for about ten minutes before heading off to the East towards Sandringham. The King was in the grounds with the Queen and acknowledged the wavings of those on board by raising his hat. The young Princess Elizabeth, who was staying with her grandparents, waved her tiny hands in high delight and smiled with glee.

It caused a sensation as it passed over Newmarket racecourse where all betting stopped as binoculars were turned to the sky; even jockeys on their way to the starting post paused to stare, though by the time the race had finished the apparition had vanished. The airship passed over Cambridge on its way back to Cardington. It glittered in the low November sun as though made of silver and hundreds of people came running into the streets when they heard the noise of the engines.

One of those was Michael Bowyer who lived in Walnut Tree Avenue, a line of Victorian houses that stretched from Newmarket Road down to the river. He still remembers seeing the giant machine; while its nose was over his house, the stern was over Abbey Road and it kept coming. On its tail was the letter 'G'. The young Bowyer wrote it down, so he should not forget it. It was the start of a lifetime passion for noting things down about aircraft. Another was Peggy Brutnell, writing back in April 1999 she recalled how she was eight years: "I lived in New Street and was playing 'houses' with fallen leaves with a few friends on the New Street Rec and we all started running home when the airship appeared". As it receded into the distance it appeared like some strange monster floating on the misty horizon.

Out at Foxton Roy Chamberlain recalled in April 2004: “I heard an unusual noise, looked out of my bedroom window and there was the R101, going slowly, when it suddenly dived or hit an air pocket at about 30 degrees and went out of sight behind a small hill. I quickly dressed, got my bicycle out and went up the hill. It was still flying, very low and I watched it while it was in view, then came home, relieved.”

The R101 was the largest in the world at that time and the latest in airship design. It could carry 60 passengers who travelled in luxurious accommodation rivalling the grandest Ocean liners and had a crew of 45. Thousands of folk had travelled down to Cardington to watch its construction including a group of Cambridge Rotarians. They were amazed at its lightness – parts that looked as if they would take two or three men to lift could be raised quite simply by one hand.

In October 1930 the R101 left on her maiden voyage to Karachi but ran into bad weather over northern France during the night, became unstable and crashed to the ground near Beauvais. Fire then consumed the airship killing 48 of the 54 people onboard. Amongst the crew to perish was Coxswain Leonard Oughton. Speaking from his Cambridge home in February 2001 his son Roy told the News “I was five years old and remember my mother and I waving my father off. When he went he left behind a silver cigarette case and his watch, because he realised the airship was dodgy”.

Alec Sadler had been prompted to phone me since he'd been excited that his childhood memories had formed the inspiration for his son, Patrick, to paint a reconstruction of the scene for entry into the Summer exhibition of the Guild of Aviation Artists. The picture has been accepted and will join other works of art at the Mall Galleries in London between 16 and 22nd July. Very sadly Alec has now passed away but Patrick Sadler, who lives at Barnardiston near Haverhill, has sent a copy which captures something of the amazing scene that his dad glimpsed all those years ago.

If it sparks any memories for you, then let me know.

Memories 18th June 2012 by Mike Petty

An interest in the past is something that can span generations.

I have recently received an email from Barbara Todd who lives in Teignmouth, Devon.

She asks: “I wonder where you were 60 years ago, when it was announced that King George VIth had passed away? I was a teacher at The Fawcett School, Trumpington. I was in the hall with a class of children (7-8 year olds) joining in the 'Musical Movement' programme on the radio. The programme was interrupted to tell us the news and I rushed out to tell the Headmaster, Mr. Norman Walker! I recall no more!”

She has sent me a picture of her pupils and wonders where they might be now? Would they remember such an event or be too young for it to mean very much? Barbara continues: “I taught at the school for 4 years - I was Miss Jones and I left to get married in 1954. The staff I remember were a Mr. McKay, Mr. Jennings, Miss Cross and Mr. Walker. Other names I have forgotten. All very formal then - no Christian names were used for the staff!"

She would be delighted to hear from any who remember her – email gandb@thetoddhouse.org.uk or drop me a line and I'll put you in touch.

One wonderful source of memories of Fawcett are a series of films taken by former head of the Junior School, Mr C. R. Duckering, copies of which are held by the Cambridgeshire Collection in Cambridge Central Library. He'd previously taught at St George's School on East Road where he also took numerous photographs of groups of children before it closed in 1936

Back in February 2004 George 'Cherry' Palmer, from Cherry Hinton recalled this was in his time one of the roughest areas of Cambridge but bullying was never heard of and St George's under Headmaster F. Dawson and the teachers had a policy of stimulating and encouraging pupils. Sport was part of that ethos and its footballers achieved remarkable success, forming the backbone of a Cambridge Schoolboys team that Cherry captained during a remarkable run in the All England Schools Shield competition before bowing out to the lads of West Ham in front of a crowd of 8,000 at Grange Road in 1934.

Another old boy was the late Fred Unwin, who wrote a number of "Pimbo" books recalling his memories of the area. In one of his verses, "East Road Ballad" he wrote

East Road 'College', past Loker's School-House Lane,
Had Kingdom, Baldry, Coleman and Mallett,
To teach emphatically on, how to 'spell it'.
May be a future errand boys' domain;
But, worthy lads emerged from such a place,
Going there, was certainly no disgrace!

Now St Georges has been succeeded by St Matthew's Primary School in Norfolk Street and such is the demand for places that it is currently undergoing a huge regeneration programme to cater the young people wanting to attend. But the current scholars are looking back to past times.

They are seeking stories and memories that go beyond the school itself and have been contacting former pupils, staff and the local community to produce a fantastic resource for the whole area. They have enlisted the help of a local performing arts company, 30 Bird Productions together with architecture company Public Works and Dr Luke Skinner from the University Department for Earth Sciences in a project they've called Mud. Next Saturday they will be participating in the annual Summer Event on Norfolk Street, which will see the road closed for a whole-day celebration including music, food and the finals of a local talent competition.

If you have memories of the area, this would be a good day to revive them. Back in 1936 the St George's School old pupils included lads who had gone on to become successful business men in the USA and New Zealand as well as government officials in India. On Saturday Sarah Haythornthwaite, organiser of the Mud team will, be in St Matthew's School car park hoping to meet a similar mix of former pupils or your can email her at MUD@30birdproductions.org

Memories 25 June 2012 by Mike Petty

Pubs have been an important part of life for centuries; a place where people could meet, where meetings and inquests were held and where folk could have a wholesome drink at a time when the water supply was distinctly dodgy. Most communities had several pubs, but who now remembers them?

One man who does is John Shepperson, the local historian for Swavesey and its hinterland. John was born in one of the village pubs and was inspired to take an interest in their past when he was a lad. During the Second World War paper was in short supply and people were encouraged to turn out old books for recycling. John was helping in the salvage drive when he noticed a copy of a Kelly's Directory for Cambridgeshire. He would have dearly loved to have taken it home, but this was not allowed. However he did tear out the page listing the publicans, traders and residents of Swavesey.

Since then John has collected material on the village which he has shared in talks that attract large numbers of both old residents and newcomers, anxious to learn or to remember the past. Now he has allowed one of his most popular presentations, that on Swavesey pubs, to be recorded for posterity and issued on a DVD with old photographs and modern film footage identifying the once-public houses that are now private homes.

There have been at least 24 pubs in the village. One of the oldest pubs in the village was The Swan with Two Nicks which was licensed in 1820. In 1911 it was well-known to fishermen and skaters, being the nearest inn to the river and the railway station. For many years it was the headquarters of the parish church bellringers and many a lively night was spent within its walls on the occasion of their annual suppers. At Feast times the spacious upper room was utilised for dancing.

In July 1910 the wife of the landlord of the Red Lion Inn at Boxworth End was busy at her housework when she thought she heard the entrance of a crowd of customers into the taproom. On hurrying through she found the room full of sheep which had found their way in through the open door. A few weeks later the landlady of the Black Horse hung her best dress in front of the taproom fire to air and went about her household duties. On her return she found the gown in flames – fortunately a customer managed to put it out before it burnt the pub down.

However several other village pubs have been destroyed by fire including the Bottle House which fell victim to a blaze which ravaged much of the village in 1913. It was rebuilt by John's grandfather incorporating nine bottles in one wall in the shape of a diamond. The centre bottle contains a note saying it was filled by ale brewed by King George Edward VII in 1892 at Lord Burton's brewery, Burton-on-Trent. It is said that the note can still be seen if the sun shines on the bottle at the right angle

Elsewhere the number of drinking establishments had increased in the 1830s following the passing of a Beer Act which allowed householders to sell beer and cider without a licence. At that time the water supply was poor and often contaminated. The brewing process killed the germs and the weak beer they produced was much safer, being consumed by children and adults alike. One of the new drinking houses was the Six Days Only which was owned by a member of the Strict Baptist congregation and did not serve beer on Sundays

By 1902 there was concern about the excessive drinking nationwide and campaigners urged public house to concentrate on the sale of food and non-intoxicants. In 1904 the landlord of the Swan public house at Bottisham was criticised by magistrates for failing to supply a traveller with some tea and bread-and-butter. This was a very undesirable state of things in a public house which existed for the accommodation and refreshment of the public. The provision of food was equally as important as the provision of drink. When a man asked for such simple things as tea and bread and butter or cheese, certainly it ought to be within his reach, they ruled.

At Knapwell the Three Horseshoes was closed down by its Temperance owner in 1903 which caused a petition seeking a replacement. Residents needed some means of obtaining drink in the village: many lives had been saved by the prompt administration of brandy during an illness, now people would need to go to Elsworth for such a stimulant. And should a man walk the two miles to get his supper beer he would be tempted to have more before he left.

The absence of a pub was something also felt at Haddon in Huntingdonshire in 1907. It had long been the custom for a small committee to order barrels of beer which was served to the villagers and visitors in feast week in a tent where dancing and merrymaking took place. The brewer's account was made out to 'Haddon & Co' and collections were made to pay for the beer. But the Inland Revenue fined the two labourers who stored the beer and took around the hat for selling it without a licence. Two men, aged 75 and 64, said the custom had existed all their lives, those who ordered the beer being recompensed by all the villagers.

Following an Act of Parliament in 1902 Cambridgeshire magistrates started the task of extinguishing licences of public houses thought to be superfluous by offering brewers compensation to those that were closed.

Back at Swavesey one pub that survived to the 1960s was the Rising Sun whose customers included two notorious London brothers, the Kray Twins. Now a private house, the living room still retains a small private bar with seats set around the outside wall and a table in the middle as a reminder of an important village institution. John has filmed much of his commentary in its hospitable room.

Today there is just one pub left in the village, the White Hart next to the medieval market place. Its entrance step is believed to be an old stone coffin lid found during the restoration church in 1867. All who visit it should raise a glass to John Shepperson and his life-long interest in the village that has been his home, an enthusiasm now recognised with the award of a British Empire Medal in the Queen's Jubilee Honours List.

Memories 2nd July 2012 by Mike Petty

Looking Back through the files of the Cambridge Weekly News for June 1912 I chanced upon an article by one of the country's top economists, Professor Alfred Marshall of St John's College. In it he reflected on the state of the University over the previous 20 years. It had been a productive period: many colleges had added to their accommodation and practically a whole new street of splendidly-equipped University buildings had come into being.

But there was another side to Cambridge: dependent on the University were thousands of people whose homes were very different from the ivy-clad academic courts. The old-established colleges in the University of Cambridge were in some degree land-owners and the gross income of Trinity College from leases, rack rents, copyholds and tithe rent charges was over £50,000 a year (about £4.6 million in today's money). So what were they doing towards solving the great question of housing reform, he wondered?

College Bursars insisted they were doing as much as they could. Marshall visited what used to be the worst places of the town. He found that many of the wretched buildings had been cleared away but that there was a difficulty. Given modern regulations there was not space to rebuild even one new cottage where there may perhaps have been half a dozen. Once dispossessed the families herded in with other already overcrowded families, adding to the housing shortage.

The problem lay with private landowners. Marshall reported how a small tradesman, who had saved a little money, acquired a cottage or a row of cottages at a ridiculously low figure. In one instance a row of four was bought for £70, patched up by the purchaser in his spare time, and let at rents which gave him a return of something like 30 per cent. "In one cottage were two rooms, one upstairs one down and nothing else in the way of accommodation. A woman was patching up the wretched loft, all open to the ladder staircase, with paper. Paper is a good deal used by the poor to keep out the weather and give some semblance of cleanliness. The floor was dangerously rotten, but she explained it did not much matter, because the children we had seen downstairs were her grandchildren and did not live with her. The three beds, which took up nearly all the floor space of this low, leaky loft, were occupied by her three sons, who were old enough to know how to escape the holes and the rotten places in the boards. She and her husband slept in the downstairs living-room"

Now a century later another economist, Prof Robert Neild of Trinity, has turned his attention to a detailed study of Cambridge University finances. In Victorian time although colleges were wealthy, the University itself was impoverished with much of its income coming from matriculation fees. These varied greatly – a 'nobleman' who dined with Fellows on the top table and could obtain his degree without taking an examination, paid three times more than the average student while 'sizers' who waited on tables and ate what was left over, were charged much less. Today student fees are again a matter of contention.

Until the Second World War the educational aspect of University life was less important than the opportunity it gave rich young men to establish friendships with others. The poor man would get very little out of a Cambridge education: he was unlikely to make many friends and would be much better going to one of the new universities, it was claimed in 1950 Prof Neild glimpsed the last of those days when he himself was at Trinity in 1957; one undergraduate rode his horse along the passageway from Neville's Court to the Great Court, another woke him by sounding a hunting horn in the early morning to summon his friends to come down for another drink..

Postwar reforms such as the Education Act of 1944 pioneered by R.A. Butler (later Master of Trinity) and backed by Labour Chancellor Hugh Dalton (a King's man) presaged a golden age for university expansion including a Marshall Library of Economics on the new Sidgwick Avenue Site. There were grants and gifts from big business to support research into aeronautical engineering, physics and – perhaps surprisingly - agriculture. Here Cambridge courses were designed to appeal to rich undergraduates destined to own and manage their own large estates. This required land so in 1949 the University purchased many acres of college fields lying between Madingley and Huntingdon Roads paying an average of £54 an acre (about £1,500 in today's values). It proved a good investment: recently agricultural land near Addenbrooke's Hospital was sold to a medical research organisation for nearly £2 million an acre.

The School of Agriculture closed in 1972 and some of the fields used for farming are now home to new research facilities sponsored by companies such as Microsoft. Other land may be developed to meet the continual need for houses identified by Marshall 100 years ago. But now half would be rented to University staff, with the rest be sold on the open market, together with a hotel and land for commercial firms.

Such development is dependent on planning permission. As snippets in Looking Back show just 50 years ago the University was proposing its solutions to the issues of the day. Their suggestions that major shopping development should be in the Fitzroy Street area, rather than Petty Cury, were mocked as impossible, but have since happened. Later it was Trinity College who challenged planning policy to develop land off Milton Road as a Science Park – a forerunner of the present West Cambridge development.

Memories 9th July 2012, by Mike Petty

A picture in last week's Memories article prompted an immediate response from Martyn Northfield, even though it had been printed the wrong way round! It showed Cambridge Place, Hills Road and was one of a batch of glass negatives recently discovered amongst the News photographic archives

For Martyn has a cutting of the picture when it originally appeared in the Cambridge Daily News on 30th December 1936. His great grandparents James and Lucy Northfield (nee Cornwell) had been married at St Paul's Church, just round the corner in April 1863 and made their home at 32 Cambridge Place.

Cambridge Place was a long, narrow cul-de-sac with an entrance from Hills Road. It housed a Mission Room, stables, slaughterhouse, furniture store rooms and the Three Pigeons pub, one-time meeting place of the Anchor Cricket Club. It was never the most grand of addresses being home in 1891 to James Leach (a sawyer), Alfred Hobbs (a railway servant), and Mrs Lydia Prime (a mangle woman) amongst others.

Cambridge Place hit the news twice in 1936. On Christmas day 1935 one of the residents, Dick Morgan, had filled in his football pool while his wife visited a friend's house for a glass of port. "This coupon'll win us a thousand pounds" he'd prophesied when she returned. When the time came to check he found that he'd forecast fourteen results correctly and sent in a claim. Confirmation of the amount of his winnings was due to be broadcast on the wireless but at the critical time the accumulator, which powered the set, had run out and the sound faded away. It was not until a CDN reporter contacted him at his work that the full impact hit home. He had indeed won his thousand pound – but with another £717 on top! That equates to over £95,000 in today's terms. With such a fortune Dick could consider moving house. But if he had the means to do so voluntarily a number of his neighbours were facing the prospect of eviction. Over 150 people would be relocated to new houses off Newmarket Road if the council's plans for slum clearance went ahead.

It was these plans which led to a public inquiry at the Guildhall. The Medical Officer, Dr A.J. Laird, described the Cambridge Place properties. The front and back doors opened directly from the road and as many of the floors were below street level the rooms were draughty and cold in winter or in rainy weather. Nearly all the roofs were sunken or broken. The houses were damp, the plaster of walls and ceilings was decayed, the stairs were dark, steep, difficult and in some cases even dangerous. The floors were weak and in some houses worn out. The woodwork generally was more or less perished.

Only two houses had sinks and only one had a water tap over the sink. Thirty-three properties shared a water tap with another house. None had a water closet inside. There was little natural light or ventilation. Half the houses had broken cooking stoves and the rest were in poor condition. All in all he considered the houses had outlived their period of usefulness. They were unfit for human habitation and could not be brought up to standard. Ernest Hard, a builder employed by the firm of Hard and Dickerson had made a detailed inspection of the houses. "I don't think, as a practical man, you could ever convert them to decent houses", he testified. Even if a landlord spent money on repairs this would not enlarge the rooms or raise the height of the ceilings which looked as if they could collapse at any time.

But some of the owners challenged the experts' findings. They had bought property as an investment and depended on them for income. Most of the tenants were old and the rents charged were about as much as they could afford. The properties were convenient for people working in Cambridge who left early and returned late. If they had to move out to near the Borough Cemetery on Newmarket Road they would have to pay bus fares to get to work

The clearance was agreed but demolition was delayed because of the Second World War during which the Germans decided to lend a hand, bombing the Hills Road area killing three people and setting fire to the Perse School, then opposite the Catholic Church.

Across Hills Road, residents of similar properties in Gothic Street and Saxon Street off Lensfield Road had been agitating for their homes to be cleared before the war. As bombs fell around them Jack Overhill, described how he thought the explosions would be enough to tumble them down. He describes one such incident on 26th August 1940 ... "there was a tearing sound and a violent explosion that shook the house and almost sent the windows in; there was the loud patter of falling debris on the roof". The bomb had hit Pemberton Terrace, just a few yards away. Next morning Jack went to see what damage had been done. "The bomb had fallen on a tree, knocking it down and also part of a garden wall. All the windows and some of the doors were blown out in the immediate vicinity but there were no casualties ..."

It was only a minor incident compared to what was happening elsewhere and, given the censorship of the day, attracted little attention. However the Cambridge Daily News sent a photographer to record the scene. His unprinted glass negatives are amongst those now discovered in the News archive. So do you recognise anybody, can you add to the story?

More previously unseen Cambridge wartime pictures will be featured in forthcoming Memories articles.

The present inclement weather has proved difficult for gardeners. Even when the vegetable patch is just outside the back door one is never sure whether rain will stop work. It is more difficult if the plot is some way off. For generations allotments have been somewhere where men could grow food or just escape for some peace and quiet and where an old tin shed could provide a relatively dry place in which to snooze the afternoon away.

But allotments have not always been peaceful places. As Saffron Walden local historian Jacqueline Cooper has been discovering, many can date their existence back to the turbulent years of the 1830s when widespread disturbances saw stacks and farms set alight across the county

At that time many parishes had been 'Inclosed' with the old open-fields where a man held a strip of land in this field, another strip in that, replaced by an allotted plot of land. But this had to be enclosed by a hedge, adding to the costs. So when money was tight there was incentive to sell your plot to somebody else and pocket some cash. However once this was gone there was no land you could call your own, and the common where you used to keep a cow had also disappeared.

Farmers with plenty of land needed farmworkers. But when prices collapsed they had little incentive to farm, and little need for labourers. The resulting hardship led to the 'Swing Riots', named after a supposedly 'Captain Swing' who was alleged to tour the countryside on a white horse urging peasants to revolt.

John Denson of Waterbeach was convinced there was a better way than have land laying fallow while unemployed farmworkers' families starved or sought parish relief. Instead why could not some of that land be made available to parishioners? It would give men something to do and enable them to feed the family. And the income the landowners would get from numerous small allotments would be higher than renting entire fields to a farmer in the usual way.

One of the first to appreciate the potential was Lord Braybrooke of Audley End. He owned land on a hill behind the church at Littlebury which he laid out in 34 allotments varying in size. Having so many tenants dependant on him for their livelihood it took little persuasion to ensure the allotments were soon taken and that the rents came in regularly. The scheme was copied at nearby Saffron Walden where a Spade Husbandry Committee was established. They were overwhelmed with applicants so decided to limit the maximum size of plot each man could have and to give those poor men with large families first refusal – after all they cost more to keep on the parish.

Allotments were an important part of local life and various rules were put in place to ensure the tenants kept to the rules. At Stretham men were only to dig the land by hand – not plough it - and they could be thrown off the allotment should they leave their wife, desert their child or commit any other offence against the laws of the country!

But as the News has reported the problems did not stop in the 1800s. In 1904 villagers at Hardwick protested after the Rector gave notice that allotment holders on the glebe land would be turned off since they refused to attend church on Sunday. The Parish Council then rented the land sub-letting it to the allotment holders. But in 1925 the rector claimed the land back saying he was having to buy vegetables that should be grown on the rectory garden

When an Allotment Association was established at Chesterton in the early 1920s three hundred people applied for plots. But men needed to be sure their hard work would be worthwhile. At Vinery road in 1923 there were about 50 people working a five-pole plot each. That was hardly satisfactory: a man who had got four or five children wanted 20 poles. He did not want to grow simply potatoes, he wanted a little fruit. If he knew he had a plot for 20 years or as long as he lived, he could put in his fruit trees.

Weeding, hoeing or digging kept a man – or woman - healthy. In June 1956 Mr Giddens of Gwydir Street was one of the oldest active local gardeners. At the age of 92 he had potatoes ready for digging and peas for picking, with broad beans in flower and runners, onions and carrots coming along nicely. On top of this he looked after a few chickens.

It was particularly galling when all the hard work was to no avail. At Hildersham in 1982 gardeners kept a nightly vigil at their allotments after some of their prize vegetables went missing. While one villager hid among his runner beans another peered from his shed seeking a thief who had pilfered choice onions, potatoes, cauliflowers and carrots. Earlier, in 1925, allotment holders in Barton Fields, Ely, believed peas & broad beans were being robbed. Then they discovered much 'stolen' produce stored between a rhubarb bed & a rubbish heap, where a big rat was acting as sentry. In the evening an army of rats of all sizes was seen to emerge from an adjacent ditch & begin to remove their plunder.

During the Second World War, when food was at a premium, grow-you own was even more important and various other pieces of land were dug up for vegetables. Gardeners at Stretham formed a produce association to pool their resources and keep down costs by bulk-buying seeds and fertiliser. This attracted wide attention and in 1948 the BBC travelled to the village to broadcast an interview with its members.

Often allotment land has come under pressure. In 1955 Cambridge Preservation Society applied to have allotment land it owned beside the Coton footpath earmarked for housing. This was opposed by County Planners and Coton Parish Council who had a waiting list for allotments. But in June that year former allotment land off Cromwell Road gained a new use with the opening of Esso Petroleum's new distribution depot. It housed eighteen large cylindrical storage tanks with a total capacity of 216,000 gallons brought from the Purfleet terminals. The neat lay-out and appearance of the depot were admired – but not by gardeners.

Memories 23rd July 2012 by Mike Petty

In July 1962 – can that be 50 years ago! – the News' women's page editor, Gillian Maltby, turned her attention to country living.

"A large proportion of the strawberries you eat will have been picked by Cambridgeshire women who have spent most of their lives working on the land", she wrote.

Gillian interviewed Mr P.F. Franklin, one of the main fruit growers of Cottenham, who told her he liked to employ only professionals on picking strawberries for the dessert trade. The modern housewife liked to buy ½ lb [HALF-POUND] punnets and the women picked straight into these. He preferred women pickers – the men could work at the same speed, but the ladies arranged the fruit more artistically to make the punnets more attractive. And once the season was at its peak and the fruit fully ripened, twelve women could pick up to half-a-ton a day.

Gillian visited the Cottenham strawberry fields – known as 'gardens' to local people – where she found Mr Franklin's wife and married daughter, Mrs Daphne Goldsworthy with a group of ladies searching the rows for ripe fruit. Mrs Franklin's ancestors had been the first to grow the fruit in the area and she always enjoyed working on the land. There was a terrific satisfaction in picking something you had grown.

The women started work in the Spring picking daffodils and followed through the season with flowers, soft fruit and finally apples which in winter they graded and packed. During the summer season their children joined them. There was plenty of space where the younger ones could play and then when grew older they often liked to take a turn at picking.

Certainly when I was a lad I biked off with my mum and nan to the orchards just along the road. There I built castles with the wooden fruit boxes whilst they picked the apples and plums until it was time for dockey. It had long been the practice; Laurie Arnold, born 1925, recalled: "I started work in the orchards as soon as I could walk. The younger children would pick the bottom branches, my mother and father would do the ladder work. The baskets would have a hook attached that you'd hook on to the branch".

And this is how most of the Cottenham women had been introduced to fruit picking themselves. There was no age limit and the most efficient ladies were over 60 years of age. Few worried about holidays, sometimes having occasional weekends in the summer and taking the rest at Christmas. "It's not so necessary when you are out in the open most of the year", said one.

Working with fruit all day, many cut it out of their menu completely though admitting that when they came across a particular fine strawberry, they ate it. But, almost without exception, the women had no preference for any particular type of picking. Mrs E. Worland, who'd spent 25 years on the land, spoke for most of them when she said she liked it all. "Its wonderful healthy being out all day. We take all weathers as they come but it's essential to wrap up warm and to be prepared for rain", she said.

The short season for the different fruit and flowers prevented the work becoming monotonous. Casual workers were used for gathering fruit for factory use – such as the mighty Chivers works at nearby Histon – and whether working on a permanent wage or at piece rate – so much per punnet – there was good money to be made.

But whether the country ladies would spend their wages on the same things as their urban sisters is another thing. In an adjoining paragraph Gillian reports on the results of a recent survey. "A stocking manufacturer has just completed a survey on the number of stockings bought in a year by the 15 to 30 years old. The average is 23 pairs" However any Cottenham ladies seeking to spend their hard-earned cash at Cambridge Cattle Market on Bank Holiday Monday 50 years ago might find the bargain was not what it seemed. She might come home with a pair of newly-bought stockings to discover they were of different sizes!

The decline of the Cottenham fruit industry was chronicled by the late Olwyn Peacock in 1990. In the late 1970s strawberry prices paid to commercial growers halved to just eight pence a pound as jam makers starting to use imported Polish strawberry pulp.

The decline affected gooseberries as well. One grower in 1977 got £360 a ton and paid £35 for picking. Three years later the price for fruit had dropped to £140 a ton but he'd paid out £100 for pickers. Several of the larger fruit growers reached retirement age and sold their farms. By 1990 there were only five acres of strawberries farmed in the village. Whereas once nearly all the Cottenham population of 2,400 had been engaged in fruit and flower growing, there were then only ten families left in the business.

Memories 30 July 2012 by Mike Petty

The recent success of Bradley Wiggins in the Tour de France has encouraged reflections on men who cycle speedily

Residents of Markham Close on the King's Hedges Estate may know that it commemorates Arthur Markham, a remarkable racing tricyclist. In 1907 he rode the London Fifty Mile Invitation Road Race in less than three hours – despite a strong head wind for much of the time - then biked the 30-miles back to his Cambridge home. He also held the world endurance tricycle record for covering over 300 miles in 24 hours.

Sidney Lack from Cottenham was another champion cyclist in the Edwardian era riding locally-made 'Senior Wrangler' cycles. One day in the 1901-02 season he cycled 15 miles to Ely where he won the Challenge Cup, then biked to Cambridge where he triumphed again. But his amateur licence was cancelled by the National Cycling Union after he took part in a race at Wellingborough in 1906. Sidney was approached by the British agent of the Paris Velodrome with a view to a career as a professional cyclist in France. Instead he left his job at Chiver's factory and headed for Boston USA. The climate did not suit him so he returned home, sold up his racing bikes and set sail for Australia where he hoped to continue his love of cycling.

Keith Mann from Girton remembers riding alongside a later Cambridge cycling superstar. He writes: "Back in the 1940's and 1950's cycle racing and touring was extremely popular and I myself was very keen on cycling, like many people of all ages. Cambridge at the time had two very good racing clubs, The Cambridgeshire Road Club and the Town and County Cycle Racing Club"

Two of the competitions were the Fens 50 miles Time Trial from Ely and the 100 miles Time Trial around East Anglia. These were races open to all cycling clubs. Then on Sunday mornings there'd be regular 25 mile cycle races from the top of Madingley Hill to just outside St. Neots and back.

After Keith left school in 1946 he saved his money doing odd jobs and in two years managed to buy his first racing cycle for £18.00 from Skeels cycle shop in Bridge Street. He then joined the Cambridge Association of the Cyclist Touring Club, run by Peter Hunt, which organised long-distance rides as well as speed events.

Keith has lent me a photograph of the Cambridgeshire Road Club on a training run to Kersey, Suffolk in winter 1949. He is second from the left with Jim Pauley and Brian Curtis on either side of him. Brian Pettit and Vic Ayres are on the right whilst in the centre is Fred Krebs.

The Krebs family had fled Vienna following Hitler's attacks on the Jews and came to live in Mill Road when Fred was aged 8. He attended the Grammar School at Parkside and studied engineering at the Tech. Fred was keen on badminton, rowing and squash but achieved most fame as a racing cyclist. He went on to turn professional, winning the Tour of the Chilterns in 1953 and competing in the Tour de France in 1955 riding for the Hercules Team. He came home from France unsuccessful, older and wiser but showing off “le tan” (unavailable on British beaches).

Fred’s fame prompted one of the Cambridge cycle shops to stock a replica of the winning bike and this attracted the attention of a young Richard Bailey. He too has shared his early cycling days, seeming to follow in Keith’s tyre-tracks.

Like him in 1956, aged 12, Richard joined the Cyclist’s Touring Club, taking part in their social excursions into the country lanes before graduating to a full-on racing club. He recognises some of the faces from Keith’s photo - Brian “Muscles” Curtis and Brian Pettit - and thinks he may have met Fred Krebs one Thursday night in the mid 1950s. : “a rider from an RAF base nearby appeared with a chrome road bike - most races were ridden on track bikes with a single front brake in those days so this guy was special - he did a very fast time. There was talk that he had ridden the Tour of Britain but I never saw him again. I’ve met old riders who used to race with Krebs and there is no doubt the guy was a real champion”

Richard continued cycling with the Town & County, then Welwyn Wheelers and finally with a club he founded called the Barnwell Cycle Racing School. In 1966 he became the youngest qualified coach in the British Cycling Federation before following Sidney Lack out to Australia in 1968 where he opened a bike shop in Melbourne. He has continued his love of speed cycling qualifying as a State Level Commissaire with what is now Cycling Victoria. He contributes a regular column to the newsletter of Echuca-Moama Cycle Club in Victoria in which he often recalls his early days in the old country.

Richard Bailey wrote his first cycling articles for the Cambridge Daily News in 1963. Keith Mann would have read them at the time. For more than 30 years Keith has been taking copies of the News each evening and has kept stories that interest him. But as well as taking cuttings Keith takes whole pages. He keeps them flat and he keeps them dark. And when he has accumulated enough he binds them into volumes covering the local stories, the headlines and bylines since 1966.

Meanwhile out in Oz Richard still keeps up to date with his home town, being regularly updated by his brother who lives in Long Reach Road and, of course, able to read the News online.

Now the two have been united in its pages – all thanks to Fred Krebbs and the Tour de France

Memories 6 August 2012 by Mike Petty

A few weeks ago I featured an email from Sally Hedges Greenwood about a photograph she’d found in her family archives.

It showed a stagecoach at Wisbech and was taken apparently in the mid 1930s. As stagecoach travel had long-since ceased it was obviously a specially-staged event. However this was not the only puzzling aspect of the picture: it featured a number of oriental ladies with very elongated necks adorned with a series of rings. So what was it all about?

Last week I travelled to Wisbech to talk to members of the Fenland Family History Group and was quite confident that they would have the answer. They are expert at assisting people from around the country or across the globe to track down their local roots using the resources available in Wisbech library or the nearby Fenland Museum. This is an Archive centre for many church and other records and boasts a Library whose shelves are packed with ancient bound volumes including a large collection of fenland material. It also holds a magnificent series of photographs taken by Samuel Smith in the 1860s and postcard publisher Herbert Coates.

But they had drawn a blank

The most likely source was the magnificent collection of photographs taken by Lilian Ream whose firm covered numerous events in the area from the 1920s. The negatives were rescued from destruction in the 1970s and became the subject of various cataloguing and sorting exercises, some carried out by youngsters otherwise unemployed. With assistance from the Royal Air Force, the National Museum of Photography and others the images have been preserved. They have recently been transferred to the County Archives at Shire Hall, Cambridge to the disappointment of the local historians: it is a very long way from Wisbech with little public transport. The catalogue is online. But again this has no mention of the event depicted.

With no obvious Wisbech clues it was time to turn to those strange ladies. Internet sources show that the 'Giraffe-necked women' came from the Padung tribe of south-east Burma and were exhibited as part of Bertram Mills Circus which visited Wisbech from 17th-19th May 1937. A copy of the programme preserved in the Cambridgeshire Collection shows they appeared alongside Fritz Barton the trapeze artist, Dratsa the clowns and Zeboy the comedy zebra. There were lions that sat up and begged, pigeons that fell 'dead' after being shot at with blank cartridges and dancing horses. It was at the time seen as great entertainment.

And the Wisbech Deputy Mayor, A.W. Collett managed to make time in a busy schedule for a visit to the circus big top, riding in Bertram Mills' stagecoach drawn by four lovely black horses – the vehicle shown in Sally's photo.

The picture was taken outside the Rose and Crown Hotel on the Market Place. This ancient inn, dating back to the 1400s, had once been quite used to stagecoaches. In 1792 Royal Mail Coaches had left daily for London, passing through March, Chatteris, St Ives and Cambridge to arrive at the Golden Cross in the Strand. They'd been joined in 1828 by the 'Hero' which took over 12 hours to get to Piccadilly, while other coaches ran to Norwich, Stamford and Boston.

In its day the Rose and Crown had been noted for its lavish hospitality. A dinner to the Mayor in 1858 started with a choice of mock turtle or swan gilet soup, moved on through a selection of fish including red mullet and stewed eels, then mutton, veal, turkey and Guinea fowl. The next course included partridges, leverets, cheese cake and syllabubs with grapes, oranges or preserved fruit amongst the dessert course.

Like much of Wisbech the hotel has fallen on hard time in recent years but – like much of Wisbech – it has recently undergone an extensive programme of renovation and revitalisation and is once more fully open for business.

Wisbech has a past to be proud of which the town will be celebrating with a Heritage Weekend from 6-9th September.

Many buildings including the Council Chamber, Grammar School and Masonic Lodge will be open alongside the better-known attractions such as the Brinks, Peckover House, the Castle, the Octavia Hill Birthplace House and the Wisbech and Fenland Museum where children can dress up in Victorian costume.

The Fenland Family History Society will be at Wisbech Library from the Thursday to Saturday with a team of experts to help you in your research. But should they not be able to answer your particular enquiry then contact me at the News and I'll enlist the services of our readers.

Memories 13th August 2012 by Mike Petty

One wet evening a few weeks ago I drove out into the fens beyond Chatteris. Instead of following the Isle of Ely Way towards March, Guyhirn and Wisbech, I turned along the Forty Foot with its straight expanse of water on one side, scattered houses low beside the road on the other.

After some miles I turned right and headed out along bumpy fen road through fields towards a small community that must be one of the most isolated in the county.

Benwick lies along the route of what was once a major river, the West Water. Houses were built half on the dried-up river bed, half on the land beyond. But they began to tilt backwards as the peat land shrank. The Old Rectory in High Street moved so much that the roof actually slid off in 1948.

It was not an evening to explore but I drove round trying to find the church mentioned in guidebooks as standing in a picturesque position by the river. I failed. The pub was open but they were not doing food: "The chef's probably drunk by now", I was told (at 6.15 pm). It appears that he, the staff and some of the locals had gone off to the brewery – a reward for the excellence of the service they offer to their customers. Fortunately there were still plenty of other Benwickians to give me a most warm welcome in the village hall at the back of the school.

In 1946 Mary Bell had made the same journey and recorded her impressions in The Sunday Express for January 13th that year:

"A soaking rain was driving in from The Wash as I motored over miles of flat fen roads. Mounds of sugar beet flanked the roadside awaiting transport. Acre after acre of black soil stretched out before me; rich soil that becomes purple where it meets the horizon, the soil that gives wealth to Benwick, the richest village I know"

The richest village?

Then quite half the houses were unfit to live in, some only kept standing because of the wallpaper. There was no water; in drought people used the polluted river. There was no sewage, gas, coal merchant, village hall, street lighting, playing field, resident doctor, nurse, policeman, fire-engine or ambulance. They did have a bus shelter (with three buses a week) and a railway station, though no passenger trains stopped there.

But the 680 residents couldn't help making money. An acre of rich fen soil would produce 15 tons of sugar beet (the average for the country was 9.5 tons), 14 tons of potatoes (double the average), and great crops of carrots and celery. Nearly every woman in the village helped on the family farm, and also worked on the bigger farms in the season. Sometimes they earned 36s (£61 in today's money) for a seven-hour day "carroting" and 25s. a day for beet and potato lifting. When the roots were being harvested, and sugar-beet cheques were being paid in, the bank (attendance once a week) had been known to send to March for more clerks while the people of Benwick queued to do business!

No wonder they didn't want new houses – 'They'd have to be built on land that brings us in good money', locals told her

In those days Benwick had nine public houses and they did have a church together with Methodist and Baptist Chapels. But the church tower was taken down in 1966 with the rest of the building following in 1985. Its stained glass windows went to Doddington and one of the bells to Orwell. The old Baptist chapel of 1818 had been replaced by a new one 40 years later; it served its congregation until 1963; the Methodist chapel closed in June 2005.

Since then many of the old cottages have been replaced by modern homes with amenities that the residents of 1942 would not have dreamed of Benwick remains a close-knit community where families stay for generations. They take care to remember their past, passing stories down the years. And now two of those residents, from different generations, have recorded much of their village's past in over 260 pages of information, photographs and recollection,

Janet Fountain was born and brought up in The Five Alls and married a farmer whose ancestors had arrived with the drainers of the 1600s. She has enlisted the enthusiasm and computer skills of a Benwick-born lad of a more modern era. Adam Keppel-Garner attended the village school and is planning to go to University. He has set up a village website – www.lilyholtroad.co.uk - and would welcome any more records and memories of a community that might be isolated but is far from unwelcoming

As News broke of the massive Lottery win at Haverhill so rumours spread as to who might be the beneficiary.

It was reminiscent of what happened in October 1817. Then the Cambridge Chronicle reported how 'one of the most extraordinary instances of good fortune that perhaps ever occurred to any human being had fallen to the lot of a young gentleman'. Andrew Cawston had been travelling by coach to his school in Shrewsbury when he'd got into conversation with an elderly gentleman. Impressed with his honesty the old man told the lad that he had been 'long looking for a person to whom he might leave his fortune, and that he was the object of his election.'

His benefactor died shortly after and although not willing to publicise his new wealth Andrew had been anxious to have his father - a malster living at Chippenham - made more comfortable. So he sought the advice of Mr Weatherby, an eminent Newmarket solicitor. Soon it was known that his fortune amounted to more than £500,000 and that he had an account at Hammond & Eaden's bank at Newmarket with over £1,100 in it.

With such wealth Andrew bought his brother a place at Emmanuel College as a Fellow-Commoner with an income of £600 a year. Soon it became common knowledge that the Empress of Russia was paying ten times that amount annually as interest on a loan of over £100,000 he'd made her. Then there were the diamonds, the ships, the estates in South America - all to be his on 1st January 1818

No wonder relatives, shops, wine-sellers, Newmarket traders and others were anxious to advance him credit and cash, safe in the knowledge that all would be amply repaid at the turn of the year. But before the year was out the papers were once more trumpeting the name of the Fortunate Youth - this time as an impostor. 'In the present dearth of news the editors of the several papers have served up everything to the Public, not only every thing that has been said but every thing that has been conjectured', the Chronicle confessed. There was not a scrap of truth in any of it

There was no doubt however about the fortune of Ernest Terah Hooley. Born in 1859, the son of a Nottinghamshire lacemaker, by 1888 he'd become a financier and developer of the Trafford Park industrial estate in the outskirts of Manchester. His original plan had been to convert the park into a high-class residential area containing 500 grand villas, a racecourse, and an industrial fringe along the banks of the Manchester Ship Canal. But instead he developed the site as an industrial estate, the first in the world. He also set up many of today's most familiar companies including Boots, Bovril, Dunlop, Schweppes and Singer sewing machines.

The rise in his fortune coincided with the boom in bicycles and the invention of pneumatic tyres. Hooley added to his wealth by buying up the Humber and Raleigh cycle companies and then selling the shares on the stock market. Using the profits he bought the Dunlop Tyre Company for £3 million and then sold it for £5m.

Hooley became a close friend of the Prince of Wales, kept luxury yachts in the Solent and, a string of racehorses at Newmarket. He also acquired grand country homes including Papworth Hall where he entertained the great and the good to extravagant parties. He was appointed High Sheriff of Cambridgeshire and Huntingdonshire for 1897 and prepared for a baronetcy.

His fortune helped fund the school at Papworth Everard but in 1899 the News reported that the children who used to attend it were enjoying a prolonged holiday. The school had closed because there was no money wherewith to keep it open. Hooley had hit financial problems. The man who had made a million had gone bankrupt for a million-and-a-half.

However Papworth Hall had been transferred to his wife and in 1901 Hooley was still living there in the same state & affluence as he had before paying wages of more than £6,000 a year to his servants, gardeners and grooms. He set about improving his mansion, which brought him into conflict with Godmanchester Town Council. They claimed the roads were being badly damaged by a traction engine hauling building materials from the railway station. Hooley even had plans to buy the Caxton Gibbet public house and rebuilt it on the other side of the road.

By 1911 he had farms at Elsworth and Caxton together with a ploughing and threshing tackle business at Dry Drayton. But he was again in serious legal and financial difficulties. He received a twelve-month sentence for obtaining money on false pretences and in the following year he was judged bankrupt for a second time. This time he lost Papworth.

He re-entered business as an estate agent, but by 1921 was again bankrupt, and the following year sentenced to three years imprisonment for fraud. Following his release, Hooley returned to the business of property sales, continuing to work until his eighties. He was made bankrupt for a fourth time in 1939 and died in a rented flat in Long Eaton in 1947. It was not the end of the story for in 2002 his surviving heirlooms were sold by auction at Newmarket

Now the new winners can decide for themselves how they wish to spend their wealth. Perhaps they will consider the example of another self-made Newmarket millionaire, David Robinson who after leaving Cambridge and County School joined his father in the family cycle shop and in 1954 set up the Robinson Rentals television business. He made and gave away a fortune including a contribution towards the Rosie Maternity Hospital which was named after his mother and a bequest to found Robinson College which will live on as a permanent reminder of his munificence.

Memories 27 August 2012 by Mike Petty

Weston Colville is a buried deep in the countryside between Linton and Newmarket. But it was home to a poet once mentioned in the same breath as Burns, Wordsworth and Byron. His books were endorsed by Cambridgeshire's nobility, by Charles Dickens and even Martin Tupper. Martin who? Now dismissed as a third-rate Victorian poet, Tupper was in the 1860s a favourite writer of Queen Victoria and tipped as a future Poet Laureate.

James Withers was born in the village in 1812. His dad was a shoemaker who'd fallen on hard times and he was a less than welcome addition to the family's precarious budget. There was no money for schooling so the lad was sent out at an early age to pick stones, weed corn and scare crows. As he watched he absorbed something of the natural life around him, the flowers of the fields and the birds he was supposed to keep in the air.

When aged 12 he went to work for a market gardener at Fordham, finding reading matter in the tattered pages from Shakespeare amongst the waste paper from which he made seed bags. Good fortune came his way in the form of a legacy from his deceased grandmother with which he entered into his father's old trade. It was not a success so he went back to Fordham, took a wife, started a family and failed to earn enough to support them.

In 1846 in desperation he turned to Newmarket workhouse for relief, where at least they were fed:

Two days in the week we've puddings for dinner,
And two we have broth, so like water, but thinner

All the while he was composing rhymes, though his lack of writing made it difficult for him to set them down. Eventually a local farmer's wife took notice of him and funded his first volume of poetry, published in 1854.

A reporter in the 'Era' newspaper for May 1855 visited Withers at Fordham and described how: "He delights in the cultivation of his garden and his wife may be seen each day with a cart loaded with its produce, which she is unpoetical enough to offer for sale in the town of Newmarket and the different villages within her route".

But Withers did not want to be 'a useless dungheap weed' that 'rot just where they grow'. He went to Lynn and undertook a four-day voyage on the stormy deep till he docked in North Shields, sick of the sea and virtually broke. He had to walk home but he saw coal mines at Durham, Whitby cliffs, Scarborough & Bridlington; he had crossed the Tyne and Tees, climbed steep hills and descended deep dells, seen Lincoln Cathedral and Boston stump and left his tobacco box at Fosdyke Bridge in lieu of twopence, the usual charge for crossing. By the time he returned to his family he was footsore and destitute

His first volume of poetry was followed by a second. It brought him a grant of £50 (about £4,200 today) from the Queens Bounty with another £10 from a Literary Fund. Most importantly it attracted the attention of a reviewer in Macmillan's Magazine for April 1860 who dubbed him the Cambridgeshire hedge-side poet and praised his verse.

His story had great appeal. The Stamford Mercury commented: As a poor farm labourer and occasional cobbler Withers has hitherto enjoyed very little of the smiles of fortune; his path has been a rough and stormy one; the tempests of poverty and misfortune have clouded the greater portion of his life ... but he has found a few good trusty friends and it may be that his future will prove far more happy than his past career. In his adopted village of Fordham he still pursues his humble avocations but it is to be hoped that before long some means will be found to place him in a less toilsome and more remunerative position

More volumes followed, though sometimes inspiration faltered:

I sat by the fire, t'was late in the night

And I wanted a subject on which I could write.
Not one could I find that had not been used,
And my mind was a chaos, confusion confused.

He wrote the problems of the time, about cholera and incendiarism, about haunted houses and cows eating his flowers –

“And when I try and frighten her, and stamp and loudly bawl,
She licks her nose and coughs and stares, and does not mind at all”

But most of all he wrote about his native village, his happy childhood’s home, the ancient dame whose pastry through the village spread her fame, the Three Horseshoes where old folks talked of times when they were young, the blacksmith’s shop where the heavy anvil rung and ‘Every stile and tree and hedge-row wild
So dear to me when I was but a child’

His fame did not last. His literary friends passed away and he lost his capital in a disastrous investment. But Fordham villagers rallied round to ensure he could continue to live a thrifty life in his cottage until his death in February 1892

The Bury Post of December 1856 had included a poem to Withers:
‘Nor let it be said to our country’s disgrace
Such a Bard in obscurity finished his race’

But that is what happened.

However at two o’clock on Sunday afternoon 2nd September his words will once more be heard at Weston Colville Church alongside those of another rural poet, John Clare to whom he was compared

Memories 3rd September 2012 by Mike Petty

When military historians reflect on the battles that have shaped our future they will doubtless remember the battle of Hastings of 1066 when King Harold’s men were defeated. But who now recalls the fierce fighting at Horseheath in September 1912 when King George V watched his own soldiers struggle with an invading force.

A Cambridge reporter who was on the scene described the event. The British army were endeavouring to check the advance of an enemy force that was moving inland from the coast between Wells and Hunstanton. The invading cavalry had fought their way to high ground near Newmarket and consolidated their position with patrols along the narrow winding lanes of that part of the countryside. Through Ashley, Dullingham and Brinkley they’d pushed on, their attack spearheaded by fast-moving cycling soldiers

Owing to the swiftness of their advance they’d managed to capture two of the British aircraft on the ground at Newmarket while a third had come down with a fractured engine and a fourth had been smashed when attempting to take off from a ploughed field. It was a terrible blow to the Royal Flying Corps based at Hardwick who were already mourning the death of four of their number killed in accidents.

But the remainder were continuing in their vital role of scouting the invaders’ advance before flying back to their base to drop messages to the men waiting below who rushed them to

Army Headquarters at Royston for evaluation. It was soon apparent that a plane was less effective than the airship. From its base at Kneesworth it could stay up far longer and sent messages by wireless. The enemy was less fortunate, its own airship had been delayed with engine trouble though when it did arrive it rendered valuable service before being tethered to a concealed anchorage for the night

Having been pushed back, the British were massing along the line of the Roman Road where the Household Cavalry, Royal Scots Greys and Mounted Infantry along with units of the Wiltshire, Dorset and Hampshire Yeomanry supported by a dozen Horse Artillery guns were ready to check the enemy advance.

Cambridge itself was vital and had to be held at all costs. Members of the Territorials dug miles of trenches with gun emplacements guarding each approach and trees that needed to be cut down were marked for the axe. At the same time buses were commandeered to carry engineers to destroy all the bridges across the Ouse.

As the crisis deepened the King himself moved to rally his forces. From the sentry-guarded safety of Trinity College he set off in a cavalcade of motor vehicles before taking to his horse from which he watched for some five hours. There was no time for fancy food; he took his sandwiches in the shelter of a hayrick surrounded by his officers.

Throughout the region battles raged and every church tower became a look-out post. At Horseheath the church and churchyard provided our army with fortress-like defences and it was here that the King made his way to view the fight, first from the high ground at Horseheath Lodge where he could see the hostile howitzers and 18-pounders that were raining fire on the Northampton, Notts and Derby Regiments defending the village. No-one could stand such an onslaught and the enemy fought their way step by step through cottage gardens. Strengthened by reinforcements, the British fought back but could not resist the enemy counterattack

And now the eyewitness reporter chronicled how the King, seeing them coming, rode quickly through a farmyard among ploughs, harrows and other implements, pigs and chickens scattering before him and out into a rickyard where from a stack he watched the attack. The farm hands stood in groups about the King, their interest and excitement being divided between their Sovereign and the battle.

At Ashdon the British battalions of Grenadiers and Coldstreams charged down slopes of newly-ploughed fields but were checked by the arrival of fifteen hundred enemy cyclists racing behind their General's motor car. Throwing down their bikes they opened rapid fire, being almost buried from view in fields of clover. At Steeple Bumpstead the enemy cavalry captured the British transport – fodder, ammunition and – most significantly - the travelling kitchens whose savoury stews were most appetising. But the enemy General only narrowly avoided capture when his own headquarters were attacked.

Soon his troops had captured Radwinter, giving them a clear road into Saffron Walden or Cambridge. It was then that Territorials who had been tasked to hold Cambridge were called into the fighting. All afternoon the battle raged until the military leaders called a truce.

Then it was time for all to go back to Trinity College for dinner and for a proper evaluation of the lessons that had been learned from this great military manoeuvre. It had been an exercise been planned from Trinity four years earlier and which was to be echoed for real just a few years later. Only that time the enemy never made it to our shores and the General who had led the make-believe attackers, Sir Douglas Haig, was to learn new lessons

After a year of rain, things have cleared enough to allow farmers to harvest their crops. They were not so fortunate 100 years ago

Throughout the whole of August 1912 there had been only five rainless days in Cambridgeshire. But things seemed to have changed on the last Sunday morning of the month when the sun shone, giving farmers hope that the cut and shocked corn might be carted off the fields.

They were to be disappointed; all day Monday it rained incessantly. At Swavesey and elsewhere the water rushed across the land in a torrent, pouring into drainage ditches with a noise like a waterfall. And in its path it swept up the crops waiting to be carted. The shocks floated and drifted with the wind until they rested against a hedge or a clump of trees where they piled up. Then the wind changed and the huge and lengthy heaps were swept the other way to become stranded on the opposite side of the field, looking like seaweed washed up on a beach after a gale.

Throughout the fens and farms men waded in Wellingtons trying to rescue what they could. Some used makeshift rafts constructed from a door nailed across two railway sleepers from which reapers armed with a pitchfork collected a few sheaves before punting them across the watery waste towards the nearest dry spot. Inevitably there were upsets and men slipped into water above their waists. Some gave up any attempt at keeping dry as both men and horses worked up to their bellies to try and salvage something from the flood

Either side of the main road from Soham to Ely the fields were vast lakes with ears of wheat or barley showing above the rippling water. The road from Chettisham to Gilgal near Littleport was under water, Grunty Fen looked like a sea with waves to the tops of the hedgerows and the lower rooms of The Tiger pub were submerged.

But it was not just the fields that flooded. In the centre of Histon the Brook overflowed, only the handrail denoting where the footbridge crossed. At Stretham the bottom of Red Lion Street near the allotments was under water. In St Ives, West Street was amongst several streets flooded with residents of Victoria Terrace digging up their potatoes and moving their pigs to higher land. Boats and carts ferried pedestrians to their homes through water an inch higher than it had been in the previous great flood of 1875.

At Soham Sand Street homes had several feet of water in them and people in Town's End and Brook Street waded up to their knees, while at Littleport rushing water from the Hemp field flooded the main street between the Granby Hotel and Hitches Street, running into the shops of Mr Fitch and Mr Secker. The steam fire engine made some attempt to pump the water away, but was not very successful

Cambridge escaped lightly, certainly compared to Norwich where the overflowing of the Wensum left 10,000 people homeless, disabled the electric and gas works and led to fears that even the water supply would have to be shut down. Canary breeders reported the loss of £100 worth of birds, Colman's had 600 tons of starch destroyed and a baby drowned when it slipped from its mother's arms. Yet one of the local papers, the Norwich Mercury, carried few reports – their offices were seriously damaged when a two-storey building collapsed and the boiler and part of the machinery was swamped by the deluge

But it was the farmers that suffered most – 'the crop will not be as good this year as the rakings were last' one prophesied. The big farmers would survive the loss of one harvest, it was the little man who'd suffer most. How, people asked, could such flooding have devastated the rich fen land, forcing the town crier at Haddenham to call out every man to go down to the Cut Bank or the fen would be 'drowned'

For the most part the fenland pumping engines worked well, but even though newly-installed pumps in Mere Fen Soham discharged 1,000 gallons from the land into the river, they could not keep pace.

At Ten Mile Bank the giant pumping engine stood motionless; work was underway to update the entire machinery – a task always carried out in the summer when its services were not required. It was a slice of bad luck that it was out of action just when it was needed most. The Commissioners strove to find a replacement to clear water from thousands of acres

But even when the water was confined within the high river banks the danger was not past. Until it could get out to sea through Denver Sluice there was always the danger that the banks could collapse under the pressure. This happened near Hilgay and Lakenheath, adding to the devastation in these areas

The men thrown out of work found time hanging heavily; at Fen Drayton a dozen amused themselves by playing a game of marbles on the dry spot at the side of the main street. Sheffield fishermen made their usual rail trip to Ely to enjoy their sport, only to find that they could not get near enough to the river to cast their hooks.

It did not deter cyclists who made excursions to see the sights nor members of the Belmont Cycle Club who took a river trip to Upware on board the motor-launch Victory. All went well until the boat ran aground on the submerged bank of the river, the water being across the washes for some distance making it impossible to see where river ended and land began. Luckily a local land, Howard Swift, saw the party were in difficulty and that swollen stream was running with great power. He at once launched a boat and rowed over a mile to the stranded vessel to convey a dozen passengers to land. The members were so appreciative of his pluck that they presented him with a handsome silver medal.

Does this still survive, or do you have pictures or memories of the great harvest flood of 100 years ago

Memories 17th September 2012, by Mike Petty

Last week when speaking at Ramsey University of the Third Age I recalled how I used to ask audiences just how many of them had been in the condemned cell in the County Gaol on Castle Hill, Cambridge. Almost inevitably one or two hands would go up. But that was over 40 years ago and now very few people even remember that Cambridge used to have a County Gaol – well it had been closed in 1916 and demolished in 1930 to make way for Shire Hall.

One man who once had first-hand knowledge was Mr C. Corby of 5, Beaconsfield Terrace, Victoria Road, Cambridge. He was a warder of H.M. Prison at Cambridge for 30 years and on his retirement in September 1912 had shared some of his memories with a reporter from the Cambridge Weekly News

Warder Corby had started his prison career in Wakefield gaol before being promoted to Cambridge in August 1882 when Barnabas Gibson was Governor. At that time structural alterations were being made and Corby took charge of 10 or 12 prisoners who were levelling the ground and filling in the old moat. The old prison gateway, only large enough to allow a barrow to pass through, was replaced while inside new hospitals were constructed for both male and female prisoners and the Debtors Wing altered to accommodate women prisoners from Huntingdon Gaol, which was being closed.

During his time at the gaol there had been just one escape. A prisoner had been employed scraping limewash off the walls and managed to hide his scraper amongst his clothes. During the night he made a hole in the roof of the cell, placing his blankets on the floor to deaden the sound of any falling material. Corby had been on duty but did not hear or see anything suspicious. Yet early in the morning it was found that the ‘bird had flown’. He had got over the boundary wall with a ladder, let himself down the other side on a rope and escaped by way of Hertford Street. The gaol-breaker was caught two days later and brought back in handcuffs and leg-irons. Magistrates sentenced him to 18 strokes with the ‘cat’ which it was CORBY’S unpleasant duty to administer

Warder Corby had known some of the most notorious murderers. One was Walter Horsford a farmer charged in 1898 with poisoning Annie Holmes at St Neots. It was Corby’s job to escort him to Huntingdon Assizes for his trial and after the SENTENCE had managed to avoid the large crowd waiting outside the court by sneaking Horsford out of the back door and driving smartly away before they realised what was going on. “Horsford was a most self-contained and stoical prisoner for a man who had received the death sentence”, Corby recalled. “He never showed the slightest sign of fear. He remained calm to the last, and walked with a firm step to the condemned cell”

Samuel H. Dougal was another remarkably cool customer. He’d been living with Camille Holland in Moat Farm, an isolated building surrounded by farmland at Clavering, near Saffron Walden. But then she’d vanished to be quickly replaced by a girl Dougal called his daughter – only in reality she had been his (third) wife. Stories circulated about Dougal’s amorous affairs, of him giving lessons to naked girls in the meadows near the house and questions were asked about what had happened to Camille and her money. After four years IN MARCH 1903 Police started to search for a body. They drained the moat looking for it.

Corby was looking after the suspect. “While they were searching for Miss Holland’s body, he had the papers supplied to him every morning, and used to read the reports of the proceedings at the Moat Farm with the greatest interest. While the police were digging the moat over he was quite lively and cheerful, but on the morning that the newspaper stated that digging had commenced along the dyke it was obvious that the man was nervous and shaken and entirely changed. I thought at the time that the body would be found very quickly then, and my suspicion proved correct”

Warder Colby took Dougal from Cambridge back to the Moat Farm for the inquest and allowed him to SIT in his own house while waiting for it to commence. “It must have been rather a strange experience to sit in the house where he had lived, with the furniture almost untouchable, his own gun hanging on the wall before his eyes, waiting for such an event as that. Afterwards the inquest was adjourned to Newport and I took him there also, and brought him back to Cambridge after he was committed for murder by a coroner’s jury. Later he was removed for trial to Chelmsford, and I saw no more of him”

Nor was this his final murderer: Corby was actually present in 1910 at the execution of Henry Hancock for the murder of Alfred Doggett at Chesterton. “On the morning of the execution I said to him ‘Well, Hancock, this is the last morning. I can give you whatever you ask for this morning. He replied ‘I think I would like a pint of old ale and a bit of twist tobacco’. I obtained the tobacco and ale for him and he thoroughly enjoyed both. He gave absolutely no trouble all the time he was in prison and showed no sign of fear up to the very last.”

Things were different now, Corby reflected: “at that time a man might get five years for stealing a fowl. Now if it is his first offence, it is quite possible that he may not be imprisoned at all.” But if conditions for prisoners had improved, those of warders had not – they were complaining about pay – some things never change.

Dear Mike,

Reading your latest interesting article, it made me get out the family history again and found his wedding certificate, he came from Springfield in Essex and Mary from Broomfield, Essex, and his death certificate dated 3rd March 1929. He came to Cambridge from Chelmsford goal. Also the receipt for their new house at 37 Mawson Rd, Cambridge, dated 31st August 1906, for the sum of £186.19s. 5d. The deposit was £18.5s.0d. How times have changed!

Great-Grandmother's Will on a slip of paper in a black edged envelope is also amazing when she divides up her possessions and her children got either a desk and a case of birds (their father kept birds in his garden shed/loft and had them stuffed and in glass cages when they died), a feather bed bolster and two pillows, a ring for each of the girls (he was a generous man as I have several pieces of jewellery today), Grandmother's watch and my father got her little clock.

Hope you enjoyed this!

Memories 24th September 2012, by Mike Petty

It could be dangerous being a level crossing keeper.

One morning in 1913 Mr Exworth, the gatekeeper at the Granham's Road crossing at Shelford saw something lying under one of the gates. He thought it was an ordinary one-pound treacle tin with a bootlace protruding through the lid.

This excited his suspicions. There had been newspaper reports of a number of innocent-looking bombs being found in various places so he examined the tin carefully. Inside was a wad of cotton wool, soaked in oil, a few lumps of charcoal and a long red squib. Then he noticed that the end of the bootlace had been set alight. There was little doubt that this was a real bomb and had been intended to set fire to the crossing gate.

Exworth immediately contacted the police and Sergeant Salmon immersed the tin in a bucket of water before taking it to Shelford station where he left it in the charge of the stationmaster. The question was who had planted it. The answer was soon plain: there was a message on the outside which read 'Votes for Women'. Two strange women had been seen in the area and there had recently been a great deal of suffragist activity with rallies and meetings in Cambridge and local villages.

This one incident has been recently discovered, just too late for inclusion in a fascinating new book. Helen Harwood, daughter of a railwayman, has compiled a detailed account of Shelford and its railway from the laying of the track to the present day. She covers the buildings, signals and structures together with the corn mills, corn merchants and coalmen who established their businesses in the village to take advantage of it.

Helen also tells the stories of many of those who have worked there in various capacities, from the stationmasters convicted of fraud through to the signalmen and shunting horses. It was not always a contented workforce with a series of disputes following the Great War when wages for guards, porters and others were reduced. The General Strike saw undergraduates and others volunteering to keep the railways running, taking over the Shelford signalbox and mistakenly sending one Liverpool Street train along the branch line to Haverhill. When crossing men refused to open the railway gates the train had to stop while the Guard hopped off to do the job.

Inevitably there have been accidents and tragedies including one to Mrs Scott back in August 1859. Returning home with her children from a day's gleaning in the harvest field, her grain safely stored in her bag, she decide to take a shortcut down a farm road rather than cross by the railway bridge. But as her pony and cart started to cross the line it was struck by an oncoming train. The animal was caught by the locomotive, its forelegs cut off and 'its entrails let out'; the cart was broken into shivers and the occupants flung out. In desperation Mrs Scott clung to the engine while the driver frantically shut off the steam and the train came to a halt. She survived to tell the tale and her ordeal was depicted in the Illustrated Times.

One of the most interesting features of the book is an extended interview with former steam locomotive driver Ron Gooch who has lived in the village since the '50s. Ron started on the railways during the war when aged 14; his first job was as a call-boy in Lowestoft going around the houses of the men on duty to ensure they were awake in time for their shift. He quickly graduated to a fireman which, he explains was a complicated job

Ron writes:

In the 1940s a Whittlesford job could fill your diagram (or shift for the day). You'd start at Cambridge, and you'd first have to get the engine ready, which took an hour or an hour and a quarter. You might stop at Hills Road to collect a load of stinking bones to take to Whittlesford. There was some sort of glue or gelatine factory there. You'd drop five trucks off at Shelford, five at Sawston. That was Spicer's - big rolls of paper. Then the rest were dropped off at Whittlesford. You'd have a booked break of perhaps 40 minutes. Then you came back. You had to keep out of the way of the passenger trains, and that held you up. Then you might stop at Trumpington - there was a big yard there, Cambridge South. There the wagons were made up for trains for Whitemoor (March). And that was your day's work.

Later he became a driver: "When we used to go down the Mildenhall Branch, the signalman at Newmarket Box used to give us the nod, and we'd drop lumps of coal along the line near his house. There'd be half a dozen eggs waiting for us the following week"

Ron Gooch is still regularly to be seen at Shelford as one of the 'Station Adopters' ensuring it is kept spick and span. Thanks to them in 2011 Shelford won an award as the Best Small Station in the region.

While the future for Shelford station might be uncertain, its history has been fully documented – unless you can add even more to what Helen has recorded

Memories 1st October 2012 by Mike Petty

Whilst talking at the Ely 41 Club recently recollections were shared of childhood at the Ship Inn at Brandon Creek, north of Littleport. This ancient inn sits at the junction of the Great and Little Ouse rivers and was visited by the former curator of the Folk Museum, Miss Enid Porter, when she recorded tales from the fens related by William Barrett. He was a profoundly deaf, real old fen man, who loved to share his stories – stories that improved with the telling.

One of these was of the picturesque Baits Bite Lock on the Cam near Milton. It was not then so pleasant: “I used to be in charge of the towing horses that pulled Fison’s lighters and that lock not only stank but it hummed with millions of flies. You see, in those days all the sewage and garbage of Cambridge got dumped in the river, where it floated along till it got held up by Baitsbite Lock”, Barrett claimed.

The conditions may not have been exaggerated; writing in the News in 1897 Thomas Banyard complained: “Sir, - On Wednesday morning my attention was called to the state of the River Cam near Baitsbite Sluice. The water was covered with an oily matter and the stench arising therefrom was beastly. The whole atmosphere was apparently impregnated with some vapour. The havoc amongst the fish was appalling. Thousands upon thousands - I might say tons - of pike, eels, roach and dace were dead and dying, struggling to liberate themselves from their putrid, poisonous liquid. I never witnessed such a lamentable sight before”

But at Baitsbite the fishing was usually good, Barrett recalled: “If anyone dripped a baited hook into the water there the eels would fight one another to get caught on it. The lock-keeper used to send stones and stones of eels to Cambridge – real yellow bellies they were. There was a cook shop on the market place there and all the college lads, in their caps and gowns, would stand round it gobbling up jellied eels just like a flock of crows gobbling up worms, and cawing away between swallows. Those eels were served up in basins, and all you had to ask for was a jar of Nancy’s Stew”

Recently whilst trawling through the old copies of the News for April 1940 I discovered a similar story. People had been speculating about a possible revival of eel fishing in those days of wartime rationing and hardship. It prompted a 70-year-old reader to tell how, about a century before, the keeper of Bottisham Locks had been old William Robinson, who lived in a little cottage opposite the sluice gates with his wife and daughter. He was one of the most famous, eelers of his time, working not only on the Cam, but also along the Lodes that run into the main stream.

The old lock keeper rarely used an eel fork or spear for catching eels, preferring the “eel-set” (snare) or eel-buck (trap), a kind of wicker tunnel closed at one end. He caught more than he could comfortably dispose of alive, and this led to the making of twopenny eel pies by his wife and daughter. On certain evenings the old fellow would go into Waterbeach village and at the Sun, Rose and Crown, Dog and Duck, Travellers’ Rest, and other taverns marketed his wares. The fame of Robinson’s eel pies, reached Cambridge, but before a branch business or ‘round’ could be established in the town, the famous old eel catcher died and the business came to an end.

In the 1850s the landlord of the ‘Five Miles from Anywhere, No Hurry Inn’ at Upware, John Appleby and his wife built up a reputation for their meals of eels. They served them fried, stewed, boiled or poached. People believed that they could distinguish between male and female eels; the latter was “very tasty, very sweet” and far better than the male of the species, which was smaller and tougher. Today eels still regularly feature on the menu of the Old Fire Engine House Restaurant at Ely Eels were caught in various ways; in 1935 C.F. Tebbutt described traps made by Mr Killingworth from Earith. There was the 'grig' made of split osiers, the 'hive' which was baited with a worm threaded on a piece of wire and the 'cod' that was placed in the middle of a net stretched across the watercourse and needed no bait, as the only way the eels could avoid the net was to enter the trap.

Writing in Fenland Notes and Queries for 1906 Joseph Coles (born 1832) described catching eels in the waters of Whittlesey Mere. There men preferred an eel-spear or gleave. Large eels always had three holes to their home in the mud. One was a large one where its head peeped out and there were two small ones somewhere near where the end of the tail would be. It was no use striking near the head as the fish was too large to pass between blades of the gleave. So the gleaver aimed at a spot near the two small holes and invariably secured the eel near its tail.

In April 1931 a public inquiry was held at County Hall, Hobson Street, Cambridge into proposed changes in the Ouse and Cam Fishery Board bylaws relating and the Professional Eel Fishers of the Isle of Ely gave evidence. One of these was John Walter Barnes of Manea who told the inquiry that men had fished for eels for centuries; it was part of their rights. He used the same implements as his great-grandfather before him; they were worth £50 and of no use for other purposes. Some years he caught £10 worth of eels, other years £80. The best time was when the flood water had almost receded that that was during the close season. He had a strong objection to getting a permit for something he'd done for years. It was the thin end of the wedge.

Today there are very few eel fishers left, though Paul Carter from Outwell continues to practice the skills built up over the centuries. Do you have tales or memories? Write to Mike Petty at the News

Memories 8th October 2012 by Mike Petty

Just what is there to do at night in our local villages? And how do we stop youngsters moping around the streets or drinking themselves into oblivion

These were issues that concerned the Bishop of Ely back in 1912 when he commissioned a survey amongst the clergy in the 300 parishes in his diocese. The results may be relevant to our modern lives.

Sport was one of issues investigated. Cricket was the most popular game but only 182 parishes had teams and just 131 had football clubs. The reason was simple: the agricultural labourer had little leisure for games since he worked late into the evening and had no Saturday half-holiday.

Instead men took pride in the cultivation of gardens and allotments. Nearly 290 parishes reported they had ample allotments while 171 had flower shows and 17 gave prizes for the best cottage gardens. It was something drummed into kids at an early age as many schools included gardening amongst their lessons

There were clubs for men but they failed to attract or keep the roughest class for whom they would be most beneficial. Several villages had Institutes to which both men and boys were admitted, but neither group felt at ease in the presence of the other.

There were companies of Boy Scouts in 77 parishes while 29 had Church Lads Brigades. The difficulty was the lack of local leadership, many parishes reported they 'had a company, but it broke down for lack of officers'

But girls were neglected despite the efforts of the Girls' Friendly Society. Most of the girls were away in service and for those who remain the lanes were not safe in the evening, therefore clubs were not desirable, the clergy considered.

Just eight parishes had attempted the difficult task of arranging weekly meetings for boys and girls jointly where they could play or dance under proper supervision. This met one of the greatest social needs as wrong relations between young people were largely due to fact that normally the two sexes did not meet under wholesome conditions, the Bishop felt.

But his ministers saw the practical difficulties: the parson was often the only person capable of organising amusements and the burden fell heavily. "What can I do, I am single-handed and too poor to pay the expense of entertainment. We have no squire and the farmers do not recognise any duty in respect of recreation", one lamented. However others complained that the parson was not always quick enough to see who could help or wise enough to allow them to get on with it

Music was one of the best and cheapest sources of pleasure and culture. Every parish had a choir which could form a nucleus round which musical interest might grow. And the old 'folk-songs' which had just been rescued from oblivion by Cecil Sharpe were ideal for that purpose. Being a genuine produce of village life, they made a direct appeal to many left out in the cold by more conventional words or music. Most parishes held one or more concerts a year. Dances and whist drives were also popular while lectures were important as well. They all encouraged people out of their cottages and gave them an opportunity to mix with their neighbours.

Amateur drama had its place; a number of villages had a good deal of talent and although they could prompt small jealousies these were soon forgotten while the benefits remained. The Village Children's Historical Play Society had produced a number of simple plays and provided costumes at trifling cost. There were some small travelling dramatic companies who pitched their tents in lesser towns and attracted youths from the villages round. Their plays were wholesome high moral melodramas. But a bad season could ruin them.

Travelling cinemas were less welcome: they did nothing to cultivate the intelligence while Feasts – which were a highlight of village life - did a great deal of harm some parsons thought.

The fact was that many people just did not feel the desire to be amused.

The apathy of village life rests like a fog upon the young men. Dulled by monotony and weary with the day's toil they find the slow gossip of the public house less of a strain than even the simplest lectures or music. They liked to take their ease in the inn rather than submit to the necessary regulation of a club, the report found.

Was the problem being caused by the bicycle that was becoming a major part of village life? Bikes kept many boys and young men out of harm and brought distant places within their reach. But they also enabled young people to go in after working hours and share the amusements to be found in nearby towns. The effect was bad. Being so far from home they were little controlled by public opinion and wasted their money in foolish or vicious indulgence without their friends suspecting. At the same time their habitual absence frustrated all efforts to maintain clubs in their own villages.

Or could the bicycle be the answer?

Lads could be encouraged to bike to neighbouring churches on Sunday afternoons – perhaps there to meet local girls. It would certainly be better than lounging at corners or inventing gossip

Such cycle tours of churches are still a feature of Diocesan life. Perhaps following the resurgence in cycling now being experienced it might be something to be encouraged even more, bringing an appreciation of the architectural gems that all too often now stand locked to visitors and villagers alike.

Memories 15th October 2012 by Mike Petty

Deep in the fens, miles from anywhere except Upware, stands a small Methodist chapel. It was erected in 1884 to replace an earlier building that had fallen into a dilapidated state, its problems exacerbated by the floods of November 1875 when it stood in a pool of water

The money for the new chapel was raised by many means, ranging from donations of ten guineas by Frederick Munns, a Cambridge picture dealer, who laid one of the foundation stones, to 'a bag containing over 300 farthings collected by a little boy, who had set himself to this work long before the congregation took the matter up.'

Among the trustees of the then 'new' Wesleyan Methodist Chapel were: William Stevens of Upware, engineer; William Housden of Swaffham Fen, farmer; Charles Pratt of Swaffham

Fen, farmer; Thomas Ivatt, junior, of Cottenham, farmer; Josiah Chapman Munsey and William Munsey of Cottenham, basket-makers; Robert Norman of Cottenham, farmer; Thomas Miller of Waterbeach, farmer; James Neal of Cambridge, tailor and robe-maker; and John Shrive of Cambridge, basket-maker.

For generations fen folk made their way there each week; when asked why they'd reply 'there weren't nothing else to do of a Sunday in them days.' But for there to be a service, there had to be a minister.

One of those to make the long journey was Samuel Waddy who recorded the problems of such a visit. "The circuit is exceedingly laborious. I walked thirty-five miles the other day on the worst road I ever travelled, through the fens. I sank up to my knees twice, and walked over the ankles for miles, falling down three times into the bargain".

His daughter published her father's account of a visit to the small chapel in Swaffham Fen about 1825 where he ministered to a congregation entirely composed of farmers and their labourers.

'One sultry afternoon, in the middle of harvest he was preaching and as his audience had all been employed during the whole of the previous day and far into the night in getting in the crops, the heat and rest overcame them, till, one by one, they fell asleep. Seeing the universal drowsiness, he paused and asked "Is there anyone in this congregation awake?" Obviously they all slumbered. His first inclination was to rouse them; but, remembering their hard toil, he had pity on them, and, quietly descending from the pulpit, opened the door and walked away, leaving the entire gathering fast asleep. At some little distance, he turned and looked, but no sign of life was visible and he walked home, wondering what would be the feelings of the first person who awoke'

Sometimes the congregation waited in vain: William Coles, a lay preacher in the Cottenham circuit, recalled how he'd plodded down the drove on the Waterbeach side of the Cam till he arrived at the Jolly Anglers only to find the ferryboat – the only means of crossing - was on the far side of the river. After waiting for some time he saw a man driving cattle on the opposite bank and shouted 'Please tell the people that the preacher was unable to cross and has returned to Cottenham'

Alan Wyatt of Landbeach has memories of another minister who arrived in a model T' Ford to take a service. Knowing that the car was notoriously difficult to start he decided to leave the engine running for the duration of the service. During a period of silent prayer the motor was heard to splutter. The minister raced from the chapel to tend the ailing engine. He became so engrossed in the task that he forgot his congregation and drove away. How long they remained in silent prayer we shall never know!

However none of those difficulties confronted the congregation this year at the annual Harvest Thanksgiving Festival. 'Shall we Gather at the River' was followed by 'We Plough The Fields And Scatter,' 'Bringing In The Sheaves' and other traditional 'Sankey' hymns and this time the preacher, Cecil Nash of Swaffham Bulbeck, had no danger of a dozing congregation – the pews were far too packed for that!

Two collections were taken, one for charity, the other to ensure that the chapel remains standing.

It had prospered for many years, serving families in Swaffham Prior and Waterbeach Fens, until the 9th of July 1958, when, with a declining population and congregation, the Methodist Church decided to sell the property. It is now maintained by a dedicated group of trustees subject to a legal covenant that it 'shall not be used for the manufacture, distribution, sale or supply of intoxicating liquor, nor for use as a public dance hall, or for any purpose in connection with the organisation or practice of gambling in any of its forms.'

But in this deeply agricultural area, surrounded by the rich black peat soil it continues to provide a place where farmers and others give thanks for their harvest on the first Sunday in October each year.

Dear Mr Petty

I read with interest your columns in the Cambridge News, of particular interest to me have been the recollections of the little fen chapel. To that end I've put pen to paper recalling some of my own memories.

I hope you find them of interest and please do not hesitate to contact me if you feel you would like to have some more detail

'My brother and I used to go to Sunday school two times most Sundays followed by services. The Sunday school was run by Mrs Stamford. In the summer we had an outing always to Hunstanton with a fish and chip lunch. I don't remember how we got there. Also in the summer we had an anniversary when all the children performed. We had a tea party with large boards over the pews for the food. Out the back was a kitchen where the tea was made presumably heated by paraffin. This was made of wood and has long since gone. Before the war there were concerts probably mid-week where rousing religious songs and hymns were sung. Remember there was no electricity and few radios and so this was the only entertainment. Mrs Stamford's daughter Renee married Peter Cockerton. She is older than me so would remember more.'

Memories 22nd October 2012 by Mike Petty

The shortage of accommodation is one that has been felt by various generations, as a survey by the Ely Diocesan Social Service Committee in 1912 reveals.

Local clergy reported that all too often young couples were having to put their marriage plans on hold as there was nowhere they could afford to rent. So they continued to live with their parents in properties which were often overcrowded.

Houses should have a minimum of three bedrooms, one for the parents, one for boys and one for girls. But many had just one. This meant married couples slept in the same room as their children and crying babies disturbed everyone. This was bad enough in normal times, but worse in times of sickness, pregnancy or drunkenness. Bedrooms ought to have fireplaces, not for warmth but to allow some air into them. Many had no opening windows: the atmosphere in which some of the poor live is such as makes a strong man, accustomed to pure air, faint in a few minutes, the clergy reported.

There was no privacy: adults had to undress and relieve themselves in one another's presence. Often families had to share a water closet with their neighbours. Sometimes the privies were too close to the cottage which added to the problems caused by lack of running water, bad drainage and the presence of pigsties.

Such daily contact with filth and foul smells led to loss of self respect and liability to disease. But it also presented a moral danger; for the privies provided meeting places for the young of opposite sexes at all hours, secure from supervision.

It was the mothers who suffered worst. The fathers went out all the day to work, the children were in school but the women were anchored in the house. The combined effect of insufficient space, bad sanitation, poor water supply and air deprived of oxygen produced a kind of torpor which disinclined them to any exertion. Many women who were clean and efficient when working for others allowed their homes to remain dirty. Some were so filthy in their habits that landlords thought it a waste of time to put the cottages in order.

It was a vicious circle: dirty houses made dirty people, and dirty people made dirty homes. That was not the end of the problem: an overcrowded dirty and untidy house drove the husband to the pub where he spent the money which might have made the home more comfortable

A mother who was anaemic for want of healthy conditions was less able to control high-spirited children when they were well, or nurse them when ill. Boys and girls above school age were altogether beyond her control and sought their evening amusement away from home in the streets and lanes – and many a ruined life was the consequence, the clergy felt.

The problem was economic: a labourer whose wage averaged fifteen shillings a week (about £70 today), could not afford three shillings for rent; and that – about £14 in today's prices – was too low a rent for a cottage that cost £160 (£14,800 now) to build and keep in repair. It provided the landlord with a return of about two percent on his investment – an expensive form of charity.

The situation was exacerbated by new byelaws which added to the cost of new buildings. So the old cottages were patched up or left to decay until they became uninhabitable. The worse they became, the more unwilling good men were to own them, so they fell into the hands of small owners who made a profit by refusing all repairs.

Old-age-pensioners made matters worse: they were often willing to rent cottages which were only fit to be burned, preferring an unclean independence to a sterile workhouse.

But the problem was less now than it had been in the past because so many village people had been driven away from the fields to try and find work in towns.

Some local authorities were taking steps to remedy the situation by building new houses. But this meant increasing rates at a time when farmers – who were both Councillors and large ratepayers - were themselves facing financial problems. And such pillars of the establishment were themselves often renting out substandard properties and pressurising Council Inspectors who demanded repairs.

All that was 100 years ago but Eddie Holden has emailed to recall the situation he experienced in the 1950s when he was happy to live in a hut off Cambridge Road, Ely that had been part of a Prisoners of War camp .

Eddie recalls: “I helped to convert those huts into living quarters after the p.o.w.s had gone. They were intended for young married couples, before they got a council house. I got one at the time, no29. Some were wood huts on piers and the others were Nissen huts of galvanised steel and asbestos linings. These were 60 feet long, divided into two by brick walls into two quarters , one at each end”.

Eddie would love to find a photograph of the area at that time. So I turned to that comprehensive Book of Ely compiled by Pam Blakeman in 1990 and now reissued with a new chapter bringing it up to date. She records that the camp housed both German and Italian soldiers who were allowed into the city and its cinemas. It later housed refugees – and Eddie – before it was closed and the site cleared for the present golf course. But there is no picture amongst the wealth of illustrations which range from 16th-century views of a Bishop’s funeral to the modern Cloisters shopping area. If you have one let me know.

However the cover view shows a scene that would have been as recognisable to the clergy of 1912 and wartime prisoners as it is today. It is a painting by Henry Baines about 1857, now displayed in Ely Museum, a building that itself was once a debtor’s prison administered by the Bishop of Ely

Last week the News reported how one of 15 brightly-painted pianos that have been dotted around Cambridge streets as part of the Festival of Ideas had disappeared from its allotted position. It was discovered abandoned half-way across Midsummer Common and has been returned to its allotted position where it can be played by whoever is passing.

For over a century those who prefer a piano of their own have found specialists such as Millers Music Shop able to offer advice. It was founded in 1856 when hard times forced the sale of the Miller family's grand piano to save the family bonnet shop from bankruptcy. This sale was so successful that more pianos were purchased and keyboard instruments remained an essential part of their business.

But they were not alone. Henley Arthur Bedwell also made and rented out pianos. In 1898 one was lent to William Elliott who was staying at the Cutter Inn, Ely. The instrument was carefully packed in a wooden case and despatched by the Great Eastern Railway. It arrived safely in Elliott's sitting room, overlooking the Great Ouse, and was placed in an inside wall, next to the fire. He played it every day and was delighted: the piano never went out of tune and showed no signs of being damp. When he'd finished with it he contacted Bedwell who send a packing case for its return.

Richard Brown, manager of the Cutter, ensured the piano was properly packed into the case, then Ebenezer Dewey took it to the station where he left it in a parcel shed. James Merry, the goods foreman at the station, loaded the case safely on to a railway truck immediately behind the engine and covered it with a tarpaulin. As soon as the train arrived at Cambridge it was backed into a goods shed where Thomas Tatham helped unload the piano into a grain shed. Later James William King put it on his delivery wagon together with several barrels of beer and took it to Bedwell's premises. As far as they were concerned, the job had been done.

But when Bedwell lifted the lid he found the wires inside the piano were rusty. He was convinced that the railway company had been negligent. So he took them to court. But the evidence proved difficult to refute: the packing case itself was dry inside and out, the piano body, although dull, was not wet and Harold Pain, an optician and keen amateur weatherman, was adamant there had been no rain during the time of the journey. The only possible source of damp could have come from the barrels of beer that had shared the wagon on its journey from the station. But these definitely had not been leaking, the Railway maintained.

Another railway company had more trouble denying liability in May 1907 when a horse attached to L.N.W.R. parcels van collided with a handcart on which two men working for Mr H. Leavis of Regent Street were conveying a piano near the Guildhall. The man pulling the cart narrowly escaped injury by jumping aside, but the piano was pitched on to the road and damaged. The firm suffered more badly in May 1907 after fire broke out in the upper floor of Messrs Constable's stained glass works above their piano warehouse. The glassworks was gutted and the glass cracked and popped and although firemen prevented the fire gutting Leavis' premises several pianos and portions of pianos, were surrounded by pools of dirty water, drops of which fell with a monotonous splash from the ceiling.

Transporting pianos is a difficult job and getting them up winding staircase into upper rooms of buildings was one problem for which the removal men had an answer. George Love from Burleigh Street manhandled them up a ladder while some old houses, such as those in Bene't Street, had rings under their eaves through which ropes were placed to enable such bulky items to be drawn up to upper floors and taken in through the window.

But some people moved pianos themselves. Back in December 1910 a woman calling herself 'Lady Marcia Somerset' rented a large house, Broom Lodge at Hemingford Grey, saying she intended to open it as a riding school and take in paying guests. Furniture was delivered via St Ives railway station and she lived there with her brother in some style. They employed a groom to look after the horses and had bulldogs. As befitted her status, she opened accounts with local tradesmen who were happy to supply goods. They were less happy when their accounts were not settled.

When Pc Warrington visited the house he had found it stripped of everything except an iron bedstead in one room and a camp bedstead in another. Bedroom furniture, brass candlesticks, a pair of staghorns, a small cupboard with glass doors, two carriage lamps, a pair of horse bits, a couch, two easy chairs, eight small chairs, three carpets, one hearthrug, four chairs, fender and a set of fire-irons, wardrobe, dressing chest, washstand, desk, dinner wagon, six hunting crops, cricket bats and stumps and two baskets containing glass and china had all gone. So had the grand piano. When questioned the 'Lady' said she could not get on with Hemingford people; she owed them some money but they were pressing her rather too hard and she had sent her grand piano to her town house. But it was discovered in Norman Bradley's pawnbroker's shop in Fitzroy Street, Cambridge

Quite how she got it there is unclear but it must have taken even more effort than that exerted by the more recent potential piano-pinchers.

Bonfire night in Cambridge used to be one of mayhem. In 1786 it was celebrated in the traditional manner with squibs, crackers, rioting and mischief to the personal injury of many and the great danger of the inhabitants in general. We wish housekeepers would unite with magistrates to suppress this dangerous nuisance, the Cambridge Chronicle commented.

By 1860 correspondents were lamenting the loss of old-time traditions: The Guy of former years was a figure dressed in modern but seedy clothes, supported on the back of a donkey by some partner of his saddless seat, his arms outstretched to denote the intensity of the torture he had undergone, his gloved hands bearing brimstone matches spread out fanwise to show his diabolical intent; his face red and apoplectic with no nose to speak of, eyes fixed and expressionless complexion highlighted by a large white frill and gigantic paper collar. The Cambridge guy this year was a hollow mockery, attired in a top coat of green paper copiously bedecked with spangles somewhat like a Chinese mandarin and borne on a stretcher.

By the turn of the century however the battle lines had been drawn once more. In 1899 almost as soon as it was dark a large number of youths made their way to Cambridge Market Hill which was in a short time alive to the crackling and bangings of fireworks. The 'Varsity' joined the townspeople and from eight to eleven there was a roaring, rushing crowd of several hundreds about the hill and neighbouring streets. Certain of the townsmen who had begun the day not too wisely by profusely drinking were responsible for the greater part of the disorder and were seized and marched off by the ever-vigilant gentlemen in blue, the paper reported.

Disturbances followed for several years; 1911 saw a violent battle for the bridge by Jesus Lock when five policemen successfully resisted the attacks of 300 undergraduates and 'town rowdies' though PC Johnson was knocked out and PC Tillet had both heels of his boots torn off. Next year Bonfire Night fell on Sunday and it was hoped it would put an end to the bedlam. But gowmsmen rioted with equal vigour on both the 4th and 6th. Some raggers climbed the fence into Newnham College grounds, pulled up the hockey goalposts and prepared a bonfire. The noise aroused the College; several of the lady dons and students came out and ran towards the revellers. But police arrived before the Amazons had chance to wreak their revenge. In Trinity Street mounted policemen dispersed a group of undergrads and arrested one of the students. He was conveyed to the cells escorted by ten constables on foot with a dozen mounted police strongly protecting the rear and flanks from attempts to 'rescue' him. Then in 1913 the Cambridge railway station was attacked and the platforms flowed white with the upturned churns of the night milk train

During the blackout of the Great War the tradition was suspended and the 1920s' were relatively calm: Indeed by 1923 had it not been for the mounted police and the proctors, the market square would have been its usual desolate self soon after 9.30 pm. It was noticeable that as soon as the mounted police left the crowd decreased by 50 per cent. Violence flared in 1934 during which many of the police lost their helmets, several more had their tunics ripped right down the back and not a few sustained split knuckles and bruises as nearly 40 arrests were made. When supplies of fireworks began to run low parties of undergraduates attempted to put out every street light but carried their efforts too far and smashed the glass of two shop windows and the traffic signal at the top of Petty Cury. Some 35 people appeared in court including a Trinity undergraduate who was fined for 'tipping' a policeman's helmet.

During the Second World War things quietened down; afterwards Bonfire Night started again. In 1948 a big crowd on Market Square was joined by undergraduate men and the newly-admitted women students wearing their gowns for the first time on bonfire night. Scores of fireworks and smoke bombs were thrown, some down the underground toilets and rockets were aimed at the Guildhall clock. The interior of the Senate House was severely damaged by an explosive charge and 70 panes of glass broken. The priceless medieval glass of King's College Chapel narrowly escaped destruction. There were eight arrests – five of them undergraduates - and 10 people were taken to Addenbrooke's Hospital. The headlines of Varsity, the student magazine read Bonfire damage worse than enemy action during war

It prompted the University to clamp down on undergraduates and in following years Proctors patrolled the streets while police cordoned off Market Hill. But violence exploded once again in 1959 with a pitched barrage of squibs and bangers while youths poured oil on the water in the Market Hill fountain and then set it ablaze. After an hour's bombardment the square was blanketed under a thick pall of sulphurous smoke into which more and more people groped their way. Nearly everyone was caught at one time or another by a squib, many people's clothes were scorched and burnt and several people injured.

Given such horrendous acts the police and university authorities took steps to control the situation, with students and members of the armed forces being banned from the centre of the city.

In the 1970s Cambridge Round Table organised a fireworks display at Cambridge United's Football ground which attracted hundreds of children and resulted in 1972 being one of the quietest Bonfire Nights for many years. It was an example that has been followed and now thousands flock to organised fireworks spectacles.

The old bonfire nights were 'fun' for some, but terrifying for others. Writing in 1999 Judi Pollard (nee Moore) recalled: "Living most of our childhood in Sidney Street I remember my father used to take us to a friend's house in Chesterton to share their celebrations. But inevitably we would return home to find Sidney Street blocked off by the police to avoid the Market Square crowd rampaging. On one such occasion my mother, who had stayed in the flat, was bombarded by fireworks being thrown up against our windows. I can remember when in my teens my boyfriend and I crammed on to Market Hill with a few hundred others. Somebody let off something – probably home made – because it was the loudest bang I'd ever heard and the ground actually shook. As a finale to that evening we were then pelted with bags of flour by the people residing in flats over the Milk Bar and other premises on that side of the Square"

But should anybody feel tempted to recreate the madness of past times it might be worth recalling that: "Any person who casts or fires a squib, cracker, serpent or other firework in the public street shall forfeit 20/- or be committed to the House of Correction to hard labour for one month." And when that rule was made in 1786, twenty shillings was a great deal of money!

Jesus Green is in the news at present with proposals to undertake a drainage project to enable it to be used all year round. At present the area nearest Victoria Avenue turns into a bog after heavy rain. Such improvements could pave the way for sports pitches. However there are fears that it might change the peaceful character of the area.

However the area has not always been peaceful. There have been various events held on the Green over the years.

In 1894 the Royal Show was held on Midsummer Common and Jesus Green; trees that had been planted alongside the newly-constructed Victoria Avenue were dug up and replanted once the various pavilions and show rings had been dismantled. Ten years later a Mammoth Show, was held in the grounds of the Leys School attracting a crowd estimated at 17,000. A larger venue was needed so next year an area of Jesus Green was fenced off to provide a venue for a vast array of activities. There were sports including an obstacle race with men running with a bucket over their heads and the 100 yards boys' race. But it was the cycle races that attracted the crowds, especially when Cambridge had champions like Arthur Markham. In addition there were displays of various types. The show ceased during the Great War when the peaceful area became a military camp for a short time, but was revived in 1922 and continued until 1926: the Council did not want the grass to be cut up as they had other ideas for Jesus Green.

In 1922 an Act of Parliament had increased the Council's power over the common lands - they could now restrict the traditional grazing on Lammas Land and Jesus Green. And they could legally built a swimming pool on grass which some considered sacred. Inevitably the proposals met opposition but construction began in 1923. The new baths were 300 ft long and 40 ft wide and ideal for water polo. By putting them near Jesus Lock it was possible to get a natural flow of water from the river, which avoided the expense of pumping. They proved a success: by September 1925 20,000 tickets had been issued for male bathers alone. But in 1953 the swimming pool was running at a loss, partly because the water often looked more like soup and failed to meet public health regulations. Despite opposition mains water was substituted.

Swimming was not the only attraction: despite a shower of rain a number of tennis enthusiasts were present on Jesus Green when in February 1925 the Mayor opened Cambridge's first public hard tennis courts. Directly adjoining were new grass courts, nearby was the bowling green whilst further afield cricket pitches were being laid. Dr Rouse Ball of Trinity College gave money to build a pavilion, which was named after him. Then in 1927 an 18-hole putting green was opened. Children's play equipment was also installed

Since then Jesus Green has been home to a variety of entertainments, including a pop festival in 1969. There were even proposals to build a £40,000 open-air theatre on Jesus Green to be funded by the City Lottery Committee, but this never came to fruition.

The most ambitious was in 1976 when an enormous blue big top was pitched to provide a home for Sadlers Wells Ballet. It proved a great success although in 1979 hundreds of disappointed enthusiasts had to be turned away after heavy rain transformed the grass to slub. The bad weather continued incessantly for almost a fortnight but finally it relented and peace returned to the Big Top. At last it was possible to enjoy performances without the accompaniment of heavy rain on canvas, whistling wind and a variety of off-stage rumbling though audience and artistes still had to be on their guard against damp patches on the walkways and duck-boards

Being so near to the river, flooding is something that has reoccurred over the years. In August 1879 more than three inches of water fell in six hours. The Cambridge Chronicle reported that "the lightning and thunder were awful in grandeur and the downpour of rain and hail terrible". The Cam flooded at Midsummer Common and the Jesus Lock footbridge stood only inches higher than the river.

Hopefully modern drainage techniques will ensure that such scenes remain a thing of the past

Clare Hall was founded so that Richard Eden could invite his friends to Cambridge – or so Sir Geoffrey Elton, the distinguished historian, regularly told visiting scholars. But history books show Clare Hall was one of the earliest of the University Colleges founded in the 1300s.

Richard Eden can only trace his connection with Cambridge back to a damp and misty December day in 1939 when he was shown into rooms at Peterhouse, overlooking the ancient gravestones in St Mary the Less churchyard. For such a prestigious address he was charged ten shillings a day for each of the four days it would take to complete the University entrance examination. He was successful, qualifying for scholarships enabled him to take up his place to read Mathematics from October 1940.

His initial accommodation was a room in Tennis Court Terrace where his landlady provided a jug of hot water each morning. If he wanted a bath he could walk to Peterhouse in his pyjamas and dressing gown, as a previous occupant, J.B. Priestley, had done before him. Since there was a war on he could not concentrate solely on study and was expected to train for the army, air force, navy or home guard. As the latter did not clash with his studies he decided to join the signals unit.

Having successfully completed his degree in Mathematics, Richard was invited to travel down to Bletchley Park for an interview. He was not told quite what the job entailed, but he turned it down. For he was by then engaged in something more important: the development of radar to direct the searchlights that guided anti-aircraft guns. In December 1942 he was sent as an officer to an ack-ack battery based in prefabricated huts at Ely.

But Eden was not a stay-at-home soldier; in September 1944 he was in a glider that landed near Arnhem, leaping out, sten gun at the ready, to be greeted not by Germans but welcoming locals. However the Germans were nearby in force (as the code breakers at Bletchley Park had warned) and the attempt to seize the nearby bridge was one advance too far. Of the 12,000 airborne troops who landed, just 2,500 came back across the Rhine; he was one. Later he was amongst troops planning to parachute into Singapore until the explosion of the Atom bombs made that attack unnecessary.

For many people such wartime excitement would be the main talking point of a lifetime, for him it was just a start. The Atom bomb had been pioneered by physicists at the Cavendish Laboratory and soon he was a researcher there, meeting many of the men who had been involved in making that bomb, as well as Werner Karl Heisenberg, one of the leading German wartime scientists.

But life was not all study. In 1949 he married Elsie, the attractive girl he'd met at a dance ten years earlier. Soon they set off for America following an invitation from Robert Oppenheimer to study physics in Princeton. By the time they returned to Cambridge in 1957 they were a family of five. Today Richard and Elsie have seven grandchildren and eight great-grandchildren, some of whom visit and dine at Clare Hall in Herschel Road.

Although it has an ancient name, this college, based in Hershell Road, off Grange Road, is one of the newest in Cambridge. It was founded by Clare College as an Institute of Advanced Study after Richard Eden's proposals won the backing of the Master, Sir Eric Ashby and its Governing Body in 1966. There were many problems to overcome but today Clare Hall welcomes research students and senior academics of different nationalities and disciplines from across the globe, many of whom bring their families with them. They stay in a range of modern buildings with all facilities for study – and of course even bathrooms!

At lunchtime they take soup from a large pot in the centre of each dining table. The wealth of expertise and breadth of knowledge that gathers in that room is astonishing. They are researching topics such as nineteenth-century volcanic eruptions, after-life and grief in funeral sermons in England in the 1500s, environmental changes at Angkor Cambodia or the role of differential Calorimetry in revealing the mechanism of superconductivity (whatever that is).

Amongst those who dine is a gentleman who did take up the invitation to work at Bletchley Park, cracking not on the German but the Japanese codes. And a modest Cambridge University Emeritus Professor of Energy Studies, Dr Richard Eden, who has been encouraged to set down his Memoirs, now published by the college he helped to found.

His book gives an insight into one small part the University of Cambridge that most residents and few visitors will ever glimpse. Yet one that is known by academics the world over, all of whom regard Richard Eden as a friend – as Elton predicted.

In November 1962, 50 years ago, the Cambridge News published the first of a series of articles entitled 'Down Your Street'. Erica Dimock was asked to visit a street trace its history, talk to residents and shopkeepers and record impressions of life in that locality at that period. The articles were illustrated by pictures taken by News photographers and together they painted a unique picture of the area.

It seemed appropriate to start with Castle Street which gave an opportunity to reflect on the Roman road, the first castle built by William the Conqueror and St Peter's church, one of the smallest in England. It meant too that Erica could pop into the Folk Museum and talk to Enid Porter, its curator since 1947 and already an acknowledged authority on Cambridge. But most importantly she spoke to residents: "In Leonard's Yard, one of the numerous little yards and courts of cottages in the area lives Mr Claude Parkinson, who for many years had a cycle repair shop in Castle Street. He recalls the early 1920s when he set up shop and allowed all those who cycled into Cambridge from the country to leave their bicycles in his yard while they did their business in town".

In the course of her travels Erica met many such people. In Petty Cury Mr Monty Harris ran Separates, a ladies shop selling skirts and blouses, woollen goods and slacks as opposed to full length coats and dresses. He complained that there were only three locally owned businesses left in Petty Cury, all the others being branches of national firms. "I think it is local firms which attract people and which have something different to offer them. Otherwise you might just as well go to Bedford or Welwyn to do your shopping. The goods will be the same anywhere in these multiple stores", he said

In Green Street Leonard Whitehead had been cutting men's hair for more than 40 years. When he first started, porters and waiters from nearby colleges would trundle their wicker trays along the street, delivering breakfast to their students or waiting upon them at private cocktail parties. One man who had become a kind of institution in the street was Mr Freddy Fulcher, who used to stand with his coster barrow selling fruit to undergraduates.

Histon Road residents were gradually witnessing the countryside slipping away from their doorsteps and people were still living in prefabricated houses erected as an emergency measure during the war. In 1963 the Gwydir Street terraced houses looked much the same as they had when they were built in the 1860s, but the atmosphere of the street had changed. It was becoming 'the Soho of Cambridge' as young families moved away to be replaced with people from Italy, Jamaica, Poland, Yugoslavia and a variety of other countries. Dales had stopped brewing and its landmark seven-foot high cup, a reminder of the gold cup won for the best beer at the Brewers' International Exhibition in 1911, had been removed for safety reasons.

Some Park Street residents had a most attractive outlook over Jesus Green and across to the river. But there was a problem: "The only disadvantage of living in these small terraced houses is the lack of a bathroom and indoor toilet. Some of the slightly larger houses round the corner have managed to have bathrooms installed and, with this very necessary amenity, have turned their homes into lodgings for undergraduates," she reported.

Union Lane, the link road between Milton Road and High Street, Chesterton, was the home of the old Chesterton Union Workhouse and the stark building still dominated the area, though memories of the harsh and bitter regime of that institution had almost disappeared. By 1963 it was a Hospital dedicated to the care of elderly people. Union Lane was also home to the Cambridge Electro Plating Company which specialised in painting and electro-plating items from car bumpers to silver or the large copper urns used in college kitchens to prevent them rusting.

On and on the series ran, covering Newmarket Road with its gas works and brickyards, Fitzroy Street with its thriving shops and Sturton Street where Bill Coulden, licensee of the White Hart, found residents 'a wonderful crowd of people. Bateman Street had a home for unmarried mothers and their babies. Most of the girls were from the local area; they entered it about six weeks before their babies were due, were taken to hospital for their confinements and then returned to the home until their babies were six weeks old, giving the mothers adequate time to plan for the future. The home was not run as an institution but had the atmosphere of a family, each mother being responsible for the care of her own child. Family prayers were held in the chapel night and morning. Careful plans were made for the future of the babies, about 50 per cent of whom were legally adopted through one of the Registered Adoption Societies. Others went home with their mothers, into residential nurseries or were placed with foster mothers.

So much of what Erica discovered has now completely passed away. Her articles continued until the autumn of 1964. They are all filed in the Cambridgeshire Collection at Cambridge Central Library in Lion Yard, and are a wonderful snapshot of 60's life, much enhanced by the pictures taken by News photographers, then modern, but now a valuable record of a vanished city half a century ago

Memories 3rd December 2012 by Mike Petty

Few motorists queuing along Elizabeth Way to turn into Newmarket Road will notice an ancient chimneystack rising above the terraced houses on their left. Yet it belongs to Abbey House, one of the oldest and most-interesting properties in Cambridge. It was built in the 1670s on the site of an Augustinian Priory and was once claimed to be the most haunted house in all England. But whatever the supposed ghostly residents, the real ones have been an interesting set of characters.

They include people whose names are immortalised in Cambridge streets – Panton, Gwydir and Geldhart - and one whose remarkable story has just been told. Peter Danckwerts won the George Cross for his wartime work as a bomb disposal officer, he combated Italian frogmen riding human torpedoes then absent-mindedly stepped on a landmine. Postwar he joined the newly-established University Department of Chemical Engineering becoming Shell professor and gaining an international reputation.

In 1962 he glimpsed Abbey House. By then it belonged to the City Council who'd been given it by Lord Fairhaven in 1946 as the site for an enlarged Folk Museum. But the building was just not suitable and the museum did not have the resources to keep it in good repair. Instead it creaked alarmingly in high winds, enhancing the impression of hauntings. Danckwerts became the latest in a series of tenants

In retirement he looked into the stories of those who had lived there before him. The most remarkable was Jacob Butler who inherited the property in 1714 when he was in his 30's. Butler was a barrister, a graduate of Christ's college and a man of massive physique, being six feet four inches tall and broad in proportion so his appearance in court was striking. He was frequently involved in litigation himself.

Jacob owned much of the surrounding area including the field where the Stourbridge Fair booths were set up on St Bartholomew's day. This was a real little town laid out in rows – Garlic row, Brush row and Cheese row with sections for cloth, iron and coal, and a cheap side. It brought sellers from all over Europe and buyers from all over the country. There were curious rules attached to Stourbridge fair which Jacob saw were observed, once driving his carriage through the crockery stalls and smashingg tons of their wares after the traders failed to clear the land in time.

But he had a soft heart, especially for the poorer folk, and a love of the eccentric. He always invited the dwarfs and Giants from the side shows to dine with him while the fair was on, and this was accepted as one of his little quirks. He also liked to get value for his purchases and, long before his death, had a coffin made of oak which was so huge that several people might have got inside. Visitors flocked to see his final resting place - sometimes they used it as a card table, when tired he would lay down in it.

Jacob's funeral in 1765 was a grand event, for he was the oldest barrister left at that time being 84 – though he had not practiced for some time, being considered cracked in his intellect. He left instructions that they were to drive his giant coffin on a farm cart drawn by his favourite horses Dragon and Brag to the Abbey Church, St Andrew the Less on Newmarket Road. If the church would not bury him there he was to be brought back and buried in a grass plot in the Abbey House grounds. However that caused problems, for he wasn't living at Abbey House then – he'd lost it in a lawsuit and moved to a house in Emmanuel Lane.

Then they found that the coffin was so large it would not go into the church. So his corpse was laid in a lead coffin and was conveyed in a normal hearse to the Church, while the wagon behind drew the large oak coffin. Then after the service, the large oak coffin was lowered into the vault and the smaller one put down into it.

Such a man deserves a memorial and so Jacob Butler erected one himself, eight years before his death. It took the form of six large mural tablets erected on the walls inside the Abbey Church giving his own view of his life and achievements, not wanting to rely on the judgement of others. But after a new Christchurch was erected across the road the Abbey Church fell into disrepair. When it was 'restored' in the 1850s Jacob's memorial was taken out of the church and set up outside in the churchyard where time has taken its toll.

Now Peter Varey, author of the book on Dankwerts, is hoping to get the Squire Butler's hexateuch repaired. Expert restorers have said the six slabs are slate and shouldn't have been exposed to the elements. It may be possible to restore them, perhaps to be reinstalled inside the church. But they have worn away and are virtually blank.

However all is not lost. Back in 1786 Jacob's version of his life story was published in 'The history and antiquities of Barnwell Abbey, and of Sturbridge Fair' and although stone and slate crumble, paper has survived. The actual volume itself is very rare but it can be freely read, page by page, by anybody with a computer connected to the internet as it has been scanned as part of the Google Books project.

One day all books may be available this way. In the meantime Peter Varey's account of the career of Professor Peter Dankwerts can be ordered from bookshops or by email directly from the author - peter varey19@gmail.com

Memories 10th December 2012 by Mike Petty

“We Also Served”, the official story of the Cambridgeshire Home Guard during the days when England prepared for invasion, was published in January 1944.

It tells how on 14th May 1940 Mr W Eden, Secretary of State for War, had broadcast an appeal for a citizen force to be called the Local Defence Volunteers. Colonel Cutlack was nominated county commander for the Isle of Ely, Major Phillips for Cambridgeshire with zone commanders based at March or Ely and elsewhere. Men who responded to the call were entitled to claim expenses such as a bicycle allowance or payment for underclothes torn on barbed wire. But it remained a volunteer force until 1942 when conscription was introduced.

The official story was subject to censorship. But last week Peter Tooley of Trumpington showed me a few notes which give details which the censor did not approve.

Some of these were written on 31st January 1944 by the Chairman of the British Legion, Major W. Phillips, from the Cambridgeshire Home Guard Group Headquarters at 2 Trinity Street, Cambridge. He suggests amendments to the draft text, insisting that that the work of Colonel Diver should be recorded. He'd spent many nights out in his car checking and distributing rifles, ammunitions and denims. It would hurt his feelings should this not be mentioned.

Initially weapons had been in short supply. In 1940 one checkpoint was issued with packets of pepper, short lengths of lead casing and iron tubing. But many men had their own shotguns and breech-loading punt guns could be adapted to stop tanks. Then Cambridgeshire received 8,000 rifles sent by the United States. They arrived at the Corn Exchange thickly covered in grease and for two weeks hundreds of helpers were kept busy cleaning them - and ruining many garments in the process

Molotov cocktails were an important part of the arsenal. Many were manufactured by the chemical department at Chivers of Histon until they ran out of bottles. They were filled with a mixture of petrol, tar oil and paraffin with a lighted rag in the top and were dangerous weapons since the liquid might leak out as they were being thrown and set the thrower's uniform on fire.

A separate unsigned typescript is much more interesting. It relates to the 4th Battalion which covered the area from Grantchester to Bassingbourn. "We were to block roads when the Boche landed. Anything would do. Old wagons, rollers, binders, anything. Stop the roads, trap him in defiles if you could find any, in one of the flattest countries in Europe! Get at the parachutists before they have time to form up, with a few old rifles and the village poachers' shot guns. Splendid, everyone was thrilled. It was a magnificent bluff, and it succeeded. No Boche could believe that we were so unprepared"

At first administration was relaxed. When three hundred and fifty rifles with 10 rounds for each were left at Melbourn police station there was not even a chit to show who'd received them. Another handful of rifles were dumped on the billiard table of the village inn, with ducklings waddling in through the door. But inevitably paperwork followed and this added to the problems: "In all, more than 65 articles of equipment now have to be listed, filed, docketed, signed for and put on returns, which may, or may not, bear some resemblance to the actual holdings".

No 'bumph' had been the original promise, which in the typical manner of the age was immediately broken. Add to this, Home Guard officers in the country had to attempt to put into force numerous instructions which seemed to have been drawn up by people who have never seen a village except from the window of a rapidly-moving car, the writer complained. These two sentences did not make it past the censor.

While the book rightly salutes the work of the men prepared to defend their village to the last bullet, there was another side to the story, according to these notes. By 1944 the Home Guard was no longer the happy body of volunteer adventurers it had been in the first hectic year. The spirit had been killed by an ill-devised and badly-administered system of conscription.

There was worse: "The Platoon Commanders, keen NCOs and men are driven wild by the non-attendance of shirkers who openly attend as few parades as possible and make the work of training an almost intolerable strain on their instructors. I saw Private So-and-So walking along the road one Tuesday evening. He did not turn up at the parade but sent a message by another man to say that he was tired"

The writer concludes: "The Battalion now consists of about one-third keen, willing, comparatively well-trained men and another third who train unwillingly".

But that left another third. They were "slackers, shirkers, money-grubbing, scrimshanking conscripts who would be better dead than wasting their time and breaking the hearts of the loyal old volunteers who try to train them."

Somehow these words failed to make it into the official history!

Christmas is a time when children look forward to future presents and older folk reflect sadly on a time when they had less to look back on. It's a time when many regret they had not recorded the memories of those who were once an essential part of their own Christmases

Members of Meldreth Local History Group have been spending many hours speaking to long-time villagers, recording their voices, dialects and reminiscences. Now they have issued a compilation on a double CD which paints a picture in sound of a way of life that had vanished, perhaps for the better.

Eric Walbey recalls his schooldays in the 1930's: "We used to take a packed lunch to school which was mostly bread and cheese, or meat perhaps after the weekend. I remember one day, it was bitter cold and my mother walked from over the hill in the pouring rain with a bag of baked potatoes from the oven, full of butter so that we had something hot that morning. We used to have a third of a pint of milk that was delivered to school and once we had Horlicks for quite a while for our mid-morning drink."

At Christmas the school arranged a party for the pupils when the teacher dressed up as Santa Claus with a sleigh and bag of presents. At home Eric always got a chocolate football with 'Meldreth' printed on it and a pack of handkerchiefs decorated with nursery rhymes. After Christmas any unsold toys were displayed in the spare bedroom of the Post Office and sold off at half price

Daphne Pepper remembers how Mrs Thurley who once lived in West Way had a little sweet shop in a field opposite her house. "It was like a little wooden shed with steps up to it and it was there for a long time. When you wanted anything you used to go and knock at her door and she used to come over and serve you. She had other things as well; I mean butter and things like that but they were in the house"

There were various pubs in Meldreth in the pre-war days. Sylvia Gipson was born in 1916 at the British Queen. "In those days life was quite hard, no electricity, no water; well I often wonder how we survived. There were four bedrooms for my parents and four children but there was no bathroom. We had coal fires and we had to sit huddled round them to keep warm. Of course you went upstairs to bed and everywhere was cold. You went to bed with a candle. There were oil lamps that had to be filled every day and outdoor toilets so there wasn't much comfort there. We were luckier than some because we had a pump outside" Other people had to travel some distance to fetch water and carry heavy buckets back home using a collar and yolk.

Sylvia continues: "My father made a cart because he was a carpenter and joiner, especially to go to Royston to pick up the beer sometimes with a horse and cart from Phillips Brewery. We had some characters who came into the pub. There was old Alf Jacklin who liked his drink and then there was a farmer from Whaddon, Jarman, he used to bike over here and before he used to leave he used to stand on his head". Bill Marsh used to punch the ceiling when he had had a lot to drink.

The family had their Christmas dinner, always a 30lb turkey. "Mother got up at 6am on Christmas morning to get the fire going and get the coal oven heated. It was cooked in a big baking tin made by Mr Ellison of Melbourn and was very heavy to lift out".

They also had a Christmas tree – or rather the branch from a yew tree which they decorated. It came from the gardener at the big house, Meldreth Court. Kath Huggins worked there in the 1940s: mostly cooking and serving table: “I washed up a pure gold tea set and Miss Mortlock would say ‘Kathy we’ve got friends coming for tea tonight’, and she’d come and give me the gold service. I thought ‘Oh my God if I drop that!’” The house had big shutters, we used to go outside and shut all the shutters on those big windows. But it was haunted: “I definitely felt a ghost, I do believe I did; I know I did. I went up the staircase one night because you had to go and turn the beds back and I got coming back up this passageway and there was a swish and I felt somebody go by me. People think you’re crazy but it’s true. I shot down that stair.”

‘A Century of Meldreth Memories’ makes fascinating listening, especially on the car stereo – you almost hope you hit a traffic jam so you can hear it all before you arrive at your destination.

And if you’d like to see what the village used to look like just log into Meldreth Local History Group – www.meldrethhistory.org.uk from which you can order a copy of the CD for £7.00. If you’re not into computers just ring 01763 268428

Robert Dennis Farren was born in Willow Place off Fair Street Cambridge in 1832, the son of a publican. He went to school until he was twelve years old then got a job with a heraldic artist, grinding colours for the men doing the painting.

When the firm collapsed in 1854 Farren got a post at the University Museum of Geology, mounting and labelling specimens He impressed Professor Sedgwick who encouraged the youngster to improve his education. He was given the run of the Fitzwilliam Museum where he spent many hours copying the works of ‘Old Masters’ and covering considerable areas of paint with images of angels, nymphs and goddesses. But he also had to work in the dissection rooms drawing anatomical specimens

Farren became a successful portrait painter, including various Professors amongst his sitters. He included many members of the University in a painting of Degree Day Morning 1863 outside the Senate House. This was reproduced photographically by his brother William with whom he went into business in Rose Crescent as photographers, print-makers & frame makers. The partnership ended in February 1870 though his pictures continued to be displayed in the shop until 1874 when twenty were destroyed in a fire that ravaged the premises. They included a view of the Isle of Arran that had been displayed at Dudley Art Gallery

Robert Farren travelled extensively around the Cambridge area to find picturesque rustic spots to depict. He made the acquaintance of Robert Bowes, a publisher who was planning a re-issue of 'Memorials of Cambridge' that had been originally illustrated by the engravings of John Le Keux. Farren was asked to produce some alternative pictures.

This led to a successful series of books of local scenes including 'The Granta and the Cam, from Byron's pool to Ely' published in 1880, 'Cambridge & neighbourhood', 'Cathedral Cities, Ely & Norwich' and a limited edition of 'The fenlands of Cambridgeshire' in 1883

Farren featured a number of the fenland engravings in a series of essays in 'The Etcher' throughout 1882, though this did not stop the magazine publishing an unflattering review of one of his other productions, 'A Round of Melodies' showing the affinity and harmony as represented by airs and songs. He also produced volumes of etchings depicting performances of plays by Sophocles, Aeschylus and Euripides as performed in Greek by members of the University.

By 1881 Robert Farren was living at Mayfield, a large house in Hills Road with wife Annie, four sons, nine daughters and his father, William. All seemed settled.

Then Farren decided to move from Cambridge, he sold off his goods and went to Scarborough in 1885 returning briefly a few months later to accept a cheque for 110 guineas from the hands of the Mayor as a departing gift from his local friends. Up in Yorkshire he continued to sketch the scenery and work as an artist, exhibiting at the Royal Academy and enjoying a reputation as an artist of high repute

But things did not go as planned. In 1891 he was dogged by ill health and was unable to sell sufficient paintings which forced him to sell his furniture in attempt to clear his debts. Despite this he was adjudged bankrupt in January 1894.

In 1896 he issued a book of engravings of the Cathedral Cities of York, Lincoln and Beverley which included some of his original drawings and an introduction which had been drafted some nine years earlier, shortly after he'd made the journey north.

By then however Farren had returned to Cambridge, living at the Great Northern Hotel, Station Road and teaching oil and water colour painting at his daughter's studio in St Andrew's Street.

In August 1912 Robert left Cambridge and went to live in Highgate where he died on 17th December. His body was brought back by train and taken directly to Chesterton where he was buried in the churchyard alongside his wife. The funeral service was a very quiet one with just three of his fourteen children among the mourners. The wreaths included two representing an artists' palette and pant brushes, one on a white background, the other blue

Robert Farren's illustrations remain some of the finest engravings of Victorian Cambridgeshire and are eagerly sought for in antiquarian bookshops, 100 years after his death.

Robert Farren, the well-known Cambridge artist, died at Highgate. Farren, who was born in Cambridge about 80 years ago, lived in Cambridge all his life with the exception of a few years' residence at Scarborough until August last when he went to live in Highgate. He was a very clever water colour artist but best known for his work in oils and his etchings. His fen pictures were well-known and his series of etchings of cathedral cities amongst his most famous work.

His 'Degree Day' was published as a photo by Wm Farren when he lived in Rose Crescent. Farren loved to paint Cambridge & Cambridgeshire scenery and there is scarcely a picturesque 'bit' in the town or county that has not been reproduced by him. At one time he had his studios at the top of which are now the University offices but were formerly a Liberal Club. A good many years ago he resided at Mayfield, Hills Road but during the last three years lived at no.1 Station Road.

In his younger days he was a very handsome figure, tall and well-built. He was a skilful fencer and attained some note as a geologist. He married Miss Mason, a Cambridge lady and had a family of 14 children, none of whom are now living in Cambridge, his only relatives being his nephew William Farren, the naturalist, of Regent Street and his brother. Two of his daughters have inherited their father's artistic skill in no small degree. The funeral will take place at Old Chesterton churchyard where his wife is buried. – 12 12 20bb

Robert Farren died in 1912.

I'm also interested in a painting Farren refers to in his short autobiographical memoir - of the Burial of Christ which he painted as a very young artist on the wall of King's Old Gateway... can you shed any light on this? is he referring to the Old Schools entrance here? But where exactly and why was it painted here?

Memories 31st December 2012 by Mike Petty

Christmas time in Cambridge Corn Exchange in 1934 was a pantomime. Merchants who spent their lives assessing the quality of the flour, wheat or artificial manure brought for sale in the staid, solid building let down what hair they had in a riot. The signal for the commencement of the battle was the explosion of a cracker near the door. The 'firer' was then bombarded with samples of whatever substances were near at hand. Bags burst with marked (and marking) effect and very soon many of the dignified corn merchants were life-like imitations of snowmen. The 'battle' spilled out into Wheeler Street when those nearest the door were charged into the road, followed by missiles of all sorts. Dignity of every kind went to the wind and even the rather grim statue of Jonas Webb looked comical with the flour-bag headgear that one of the brighter sparks had placed on it. After about 30 minutes or so ammunition supplies ran out and the combat ceased with only the debris-covered 'battle-ground' bearing witness to the fight that had taken place.

In Ely any such activities came to an end in December 1962 when its Corn Exchange was used for the last time. It could trace its history back to 1845 after the recent arrival of the railway promised to bring increased prosperity for farmers. The Bishop was consulted about the possibility of pulling down an ugly cluster of houses that had grown up in the middle of the market place and erecting a building which would become the pride of the town and one of the best in the Kingdom.

A Cattle Market and Corn Exchange Company was set up, a tender for £1,500 from Simon Oates of Cambridge was accepted and work started. Initially there were problems as adverse winds delayed the docking at King's Lynn of the ship laden with stone for the building. But the Exchange was completed by February 1847 and merchants took every desk and stand.

Things did not go smoothly: the new merchants demanded a discount on prices, which led to a boycott by farmers. And with agriculture in a critical condition the new building was used for a public meeting with the erection of a platform for speakers and a gallery filled by 2,500 farmers. The Wesleyan Methodists also used it for a meeting that degenerated into great confusion and noise before it finished at the late hour of 11 o'clock. Similar public meetings continued in the following decades together with auction sales – at the first of which Mr Bidwell disposed of 175 tons of Peruvian guano. There were wrestling matches, balls and dances in the 1950s to bands led by Peter Ward, Wally Scott and Ross Norman.

Then in 1855 a Public Room was constructed alongside. Only on completion was it noted that the architect had forgotten to include any stairs to the gallery so another parcel of land had to be acquired to build a staircase.

With its stage and dressing rooms below it was used for pantomimes organised by Alice Ramsdale and concerts held by the Police to raise money for their benevolent fund. The highlight of the season in Edwardian time was the Militia Ball when it was decorated with flags and bunting. There were men in regimental dress and a galaxy of beautiful ladies in long evening gowns, each carrying their dance engagement card suspended from the wrist by a white cord. During the supper interval dancers would retire to the restful atmosphere of a drawing room laid out with small tables and easy chairs in the Corn Exchange alongside.

In 1910 Ely's Public Room was enlarged and fitted with a maple floor for roller skating which proved popular; learners paid threepence admission and threepence more to hire the skates. During the Great War it housed productions of Gilbert and Sullivan by the Ely Trinity Amateur Operatic Society and afterwards served as a cinema – the City Picture House, initially showing silent films. For a while it returned to general social purposes but re-opened as the Exchange Cinema in 1938 and continued until May 1963

Meanwhile things were changing in Ely's Corn Exchange itself. Before the war some 300 people from the Eastern Counties and London had congregated every Thursday and Broad Street was packed with people coming off the trains to the markets. But in December 1962 only a handful of farmers, merchants and representatives of seed, feeding stuffs, fertilisers and oil companies turned up for the building's last two hours' use as an indoor market before sales transferred across the road to the Club Hotel.

The Corn Exchange and Public Room were put on the market with an asking price of £20,000 and in October 1962 a London development company, Suburban and Counties Properties of London submitted proposals for a development of modern shopping units that would transform the city centre, standing proudly alongside a new Post Office and a big new Tesco supermarket on the corner of Brays Lane.

Both of those are now just memories but if you remember Ely's Corn Exchange and Public Rooms then write to Mike Petty at the News

Fifty years ago a News reporter, Erica Dimock went 'Down Your Street' down St Andrew's Road in Chesterton, then headquarters of one of the greatest names in the electronics industry, Pye of Cambridge

One of those she chatted to was James Brignell who remembered the area long before any factories, or indeed houses. In his childhood he'd wandered from Chesterton church picking his way between bushes, gathering buttercups from the fields and stopping to watch the donkey tethered there. In those days it was known as Lovers Walk.

But in the 1890s Chesterton was changing with the development of a large new De Freville Estate bounded on the east by Cam Road. From this Moses Gawthorp constructed a roadway and houses were built along part of Lovers Walk. The quiet seclusion had gone and in 1904 this part of the Walk was renamed 'St Andrew's Road'. After coming out of the Air Force in 1921, James Brignell used some of the adjacent land as a gravel pit, then started a building business on the site.

John Hodgkinson was another man who knew the area well. He was a Director of Banham's the Cambridge boat builders. The firm had been started in 1906 by Mr. H. C. Banham, whose father owned a shoe shop in Regent Street. For some time Banham had worked in the shop by day and on the boats by night, but eventually he'd decided to concentrate his attention on the boats. He acquired an osier bed to which people would come to collect the raw material needed for basket making, cleared it and started his one-man business, making small rowing and sailing boats. A year or so later he obtained a steamboat and barge on which he took passengers for special river trips. He also built up a fleet of motor cruisers which proved popular with holidaymakers. But the firm's principal skill lay in the construction of rowing eights, including the Cambridge boat used for the annual inter-Varsity boat race. By 1963 they were making 30-40 cedarwood rowing eights a year, most of the work done by hand with a five years' apprenticeship needed to become a proficient boat builder.

Nearby was the Cambridge depot of the India Tyre and Rubber Company which had opened in 1953 receiving tyres made at the company's factory in Scotland which it supplied to distributors. The depot in St. Andrew's Road was stacked high with over a thousand tyres of all sizes, ranging from large tractor tyres to those intended for small wheelbarrows.

But the biggest company was Pye of Cambridge. Its story went back to 1896 when Mr. W. G. Pye, a workshop superintendent at the Cavendish Laboratory, started in business as an instrument maker. New premises were acquired at Mill Lane and in 1913 they moved to St Andrew's Road. The First World War brought a considerable demand for Pye's instruments but when that market collapsed the firm started to make radio sets and even televisions. With another conflict the firm turned to war work with large numbers of girls producing equipment for aeroplanes one week, jeeps or tanks the next. Then it was back to more peaceful pursuits and as television spread so Pye's Outside Broadcast Units – as supplied to the BBC - were exported across the globe. Transistors, space, radio telephones and electronic telephone exchanges were further fields of Pye's activity

St Andrew's Road became the hub of the worldwide Pye Group though in 1963 residents complained that the residential character of the area had been lost and former open views to orchards, field or the river had been blocked as the firm expanded. More change was to follow when a new Elizabeth Way ploughed down the tree-lined Cam Road and a new Elizabeth Bridge opened in July 1971 alongside Banham's boatyard

It was just 25 years ago in January 1988 that the Pye name disappeared from the Cambridge scene. The firm it had become part of the Dutch-based Philips group in 1967 but in the years that followed, with competition from Japanese manufacturers, various parts of the former empire had been closed or amalgamated. When Pye Unicam became Philips Scientific a reminder of Cambridge's industrial heritage disappeared.

Now St Andrew's Road is once more undergoing a radical transformation with new homes being constructed where wirelesses were manufactured and donkeys once grazed.

But if you have memories of the area, the do share them – write to Mike Petty at the News.

Subject: Kiss farewell to Lovers Walk and bye, bye, Pye CN Monday 7th January, 2013

Hi Mike,

Just been given a copy of the above. Belatedly I would like to add my memories of the date given to the aerial photograph showing Pye Teleom, Site One, as it became known.

A close examination of the top centre of picture reveals there are:

(1) there doesn't appear to be much sign of occupation either by production or office workers or office staff.

(2) the rear of the large flat roof production area, (that we were told at the time was the one of the largest to be built in the UK and possibly Europe), was to become the goods entrance usually was a hive of activity with staff cars and delivery vehicles - yet free of construction workers.

(4) to the left of this point and round the corner of this block, there appears to be some form of construction staging going on - indicating final work or maintenance.

(5) the carpark used by catering staff and office workers behind the 'Wavey Line' building is also empty apart from a single coach like vehicle.

(6) a windowless, cube shaped, Squash Court, was to be built later c1980 alongside and to the left of the brand new 'Pye Sports & Social Club' (seen here sticking out onto the Pye Sports field, that replaced the old wooden hut, also looks free of human activity).

I started work in the Mobile Radio Development Lab', Pye Telcom, Newmarket Road at the junction with Ditton Lane in 1966 but we all moved to Site One, St Andrews Road in May, 1978. It was a very well planned move with all the Pye Telecom labs contributing to the design of the brand new work benches, chair heights and general layouts etc of the new Engineering Block. Characterised by the black bands of windows, providing the wrap-around front and side of the production area - seen the photograph, top right of centre. First to move to our new home were all the production workers from their 1930 style wooden floor areas recently demolished and now the carpark, all neatly marked out ready for the development staff cars to occupy, shown centre bottom of the picture.

By the above observations and memories I judge the year to be early 1978. Perhaps all of this can be added to, or corrected, by other personal memories of others?

Many thanks for allowing me to see the photograph. I'm sure it must have stirred many memories and I hope you got a good response.

My best wishes to yourself and Pat,

Tony

Can it really be 25 years ago that Cambridge's Victoria Cinema passed into history

Its story started in the Victoria Assembly Rooms off Market Hill, a building used for a variety of meetings and gatherings. In 1911 it was converted into a cinema called the Electric Theatre holding 280 people.

A specially-constructed fire-proof lantern chamber was installed projecting non-inflammable films. However these were difficult to obtain so in August 1911 Mr Jordan, the manager, sought a licence to show flammable film instead. The room could be cleared in less than two minutes and a skilled fireman was always on duty, he told magistrates. There were continuous performances with people coming and going all the time and never more than 100 by the end of the evening. But there was no back door and the exit to Market Hill was rather narrow, police pointed out. So the licence was refused and they carried on as before. In 1915 it was refurbished and reopened as the Victoria Cinema continuing until 1929 when it gave its final performance.

Two years later in 1931 a new Victoria Cinema opened further along the east side of Market Hill. This was much larger with 1,500 seats, 500 of which were in the balcony. The building was an attraction in itself with a large bar and lounge, a restaurant and dance hall to entertain patrons.

The auditorium could be illuminated by a gorgeous flow of rich colours that rose like waves to reach a climax in the rich proscenium curtain of crimson and gold. And, as a highlight of the evening there was a modern theatre organ capable of producing every possible noise necessary for the accompaniment of a film, from telephone bell to tram car, bird, boats, motors and surf. It was played from a beautifully decorated console which rose on an electric lift into the centre of the orchestra pit.

Bert Hewett was amongst the 1,500 people who crowded in for the opening. Bert worked for Baily Grundy and Barrett, the electrical engineers in St Mary's Passage who'd carried out the complete electrical installation work at the Victoria Cinema and was there with Dick Matthews just in case anything went wrong.

In 1952 the cinema was restyled in a 'eurythmic' design – "designer, architect and illuminators combining to make a symphony of shape, colour and tone". That November 1952 they tried something new – a three-dimensional film. The late Albert Waldock who worked as a projectionists from 1941-1988 remembered it. "The Victoria was the first in Cambridge to show the true 3D – not the red and green type. The projectors had polarising filters in front of the lens to separate the images, one for the right-hand reel and one for the left – one horizontal and one vertical. The patrons were issued with glasses to separate the images”. Other innovations followed: new 70 mm film equipment was installed in 1967, a second screen came in 1972 when the Victoria was renamed ABC1 & 2.

But an era ended in May 1982 as the lights went up for the last time on the ABC Minors Matinee. The final credits brought to an end an institution which had won a place in the hearts of thousands of children. No more would Keith Kendall and his part-time cleaner colleagues sneak into the lavatories to catch some 12-year-olds having a crafty cigarette. Sid Perkiss, who had manned the box office, remembered when two or three hundred children packed the cinema. Now it had been killed by television.

Film fans were assured that the Victoria would not follow the example of the Central and be turned into a Bingo hall. Instead EMI were planning to add a third screen to it. It was after all the largest cinema in Cambridge attracting an average audience of about 600 people paying £2.10 for their seats

In December 1983 fire broke out causing damage estimated at £50,000 but by February 1984 both screens were back in service. It was hailed as one of the best-equipped cinemas in the country with new equipment, new seats and much-improved lavatories. It had six-track stereo, a new screen and a new 70mm projector which was seen at full benefit in films like ‘Ghandi’ and ‘The Star Wars’ trilogy that was brought back by popular demand.

Then came the news that the cinema was to close and the site had been sold for new Marks & Spencer store. In January 1988 the lights went up for the last time as the final performance of its last show came to an end. As the audience left after seeing ‘Spaceballs’ or ‘Predator’, staff reflected on the cinema’s long history recalling when ‘South Pacific’ had ran for two solid years and ‘The Sound of Music’ for three in what many still remember as the Victoria Cinema.

Does the Victoria have special memories for you. Write to Mike Petty at the News

“Land of Hope and Glory”, so familiar from its performances at the Proms was penned by A.C. Benson, son of an Archbishop of Canterbury and Master of Magdalene College, Cambridge. He was also a keen diarist whose volumes are carefully preserved alongside those of Samuel Pepys in the college library where they are accessible to scholars.

But who would want to make the trip into Cambridge read the private jottings of a one-time master of Eton whose prolific volumes of poems and essays are downloadable freely from internet sites.

Step forward David Jones, former history teacher at the Perse School for over thirty years. He'd read various published extracts from Benson's four-million-page diaries and realised that the two of them shared a common passion – cycling. Now he has published an account of Benson's bike rides in Cambridgeshire between 1904 and 1925. It is an utterly charming and captivating account of the county with numerous brief pen pictures of villages and people, not all of them flattering.

Haverhill “a vile place of red-brick houses clustering round a cloth manufactory. I daresay a useful and industrious place, but not a place to visit ... had tea at a confectioner's shop”

Rampton ... “an out-of-the-way village with a quaint ancient church ... an old lady played evil tunes on an excruciating organ”

Bourn ... “stood long to see a poor mare who had fallen in the road with a huge cart of gravel upon her being rescued. It was strange to see how utterly patient and submissive she was. The collar nearly strangling her ...”

Cherry Hinton ... “came back by an abandoned road by the huge cement works with their chimneys belching smoke, their powdered roofs, their odd retorts and towers; the lights beginning to be lighted within and the giant shapes of moving beams and rods to move shadowly before the windows”

Coveney ... “I stumbled upon a spectacled, red-noses, dyspeptic-looking parson and really I think the worst-dressed man I ever saw – an old ragged coat, brown and green ... and trousers patched and creased and torn, burnt nearly yellow in places. But he had a friendly dignified and agreeable manner – very much of a gentleman”.

At Quy “I met a funeral. The slow procession of clumsy rustics, in greasy black, the self consciousness, the ugly dreary coffin, the whole hideous pomp affected me strangely

Fen Drayton ... incredibly out-of-the-way, remote. There are three or four very pretty old houses – but all hopelessly desolate. There were artists sketching in the little main street

Roads were often in poor condition and punctures were frequent. At Toft ... my bike punctured, but I found a blacksmith's shop and a nice young man mended it. I should have been quite content to sit there. I like a smithy, the darkness of the roof, the odd things hanging from the walls ... the smouldering fire and the way in which it puffs and snorts when they pull the bellows. Another puncture occurred near Fleam dyke ... “a gig approached, with a man who looked like a doctor, or a very respectable farmer, yellow, wrinkled, whiskered; driven by a cheerful boy. What was my astonishment when on passing he shouted out loud, abusive and derisive remarks at me ... I was furious, but being punctured could not ride in pursuit, as I would have done”.

Nor were there many bridges as he found at Dimock's Cote, a solitary farm on the Cam between Wicken & Stretham: “we shouted loudly and presently wild men appeared to whom we made signs that we wanted to get across. They sent out a man in a black boat, but the wind was too strong and he was driven back. He then, carrying a line and rowing with a spade, struggled over and they pulled us across”

Railway gates were usually closed in the days before motor cars were common: at Foxton ... “had altercation with a signalman who would not open gates - and watched with pleasure a great heap of weeds on a lonely fallow pouting rich smoke on the sunset air – exquisitely beautiful. Tried to light my lamp but failed and lost a glove as well. Very angry. Just escaped the police”

Benson often took the train for part of his journey and it was the presence of a railway across Grunty Fen, making it easier to get to and from College, that prompted him to rent Hinton Hall at Haddenham in 1906. It also allowed the making of long journeys, often with his Wilburton neighbour, Albert Pell:

“After breakfast we looked at maps and made up our minds for Brandon. We started at once, as soon as we could get sandwiches – but the wind was against us and we had a nightmare ride to Ely. We tore along, the wind relentlessly keeping us back; and at last I gave up hope – but when breathless, streaming, sick and palpitating we drew up at Ely, I found our clocks were fast and the train was not even due”. Brandon was a pleasant, sleepy sort of town. He visited a gun-flint manufactory – “quite a poor little place, a back garden of a cottage in a row; we still supply flints by the thousand to African natives. The whole thing done by a man ... he made me a little stone axe ... But oh, how he talked ... I longed to get away but he came to the door, not to let us slip out ... Then we got off ... he came running after us down the road ... it was terrible”

Benson found the rides a wonderful way of unwinding from the pressures of academia. He continued them through the dark days of the Great War, when at Eversden he met a man who toiled in a munitions factory for twelve hours a day. They were therapeutic when he suffered depressions, but eventually declining health and old age took their toll.

On 13th October 1924 Benson took what was to be his last bike ride: “I rode – a hot, autumn day, very beautiful, by Harlton and Haslingfield. The gossamers streaming from the telegraph wires a beautiful sight”

All this and much more he recorded in his diary, adding “I should like to think that in the days to come, when I am gone, someone should care to retrace my rambles”. He would be delighted that David Jones has done just that.

Cambridgeshire Family History Society helps people trace their ancestral roots. At their regular Saturday meetings at Girton enthusiasts come together to learn new hints and share their discoveries.

Recently one of their members chanced upon two old family photograph albums. One is small, old and tattered, the other was once rather grander with gold-edged pages, a brass clasp and an ornate cover containing the initials J.H.F.

Neither is worth a fortune but they will be priceless to somebody.

For they contain about thirty Victorian photographic portraits; there are old men and old women, ladies in their prime and young children. But who were they?

Most of the pictures are small Cartes-de-visite with decorative backs advertising the names and addresses of the photographers who took them. They come from Oxford, Norwich, Salisbury, Hingham, East Dereham, Keithley, Aylesham and London amongst other places. One of the earliest shows an elderly couple, the image now fading away. It was printed on a Carte with the decorative back proclaiming the name 'S.Goodair, Photographer, Hopton'. But it has been over-stamped 'J.W. Garbutt, Leopold Street, Leeds'

There are however a few taken locally. One was by R.H. Lord who had studios at the junction of Market Place and Market Street, Cambridge between about 1882 and 1900. Lord's work achieved international acclaim, winning medals in Vienna in 1888. Much is known about him, but who was his sitter? Another was by H. Faulkner White who had studios at 47 St Andrew's Street, Cambridge in 1883-84.

Four of the smaller pictures have stamps on the back showing they were taken by John Titterton of Ely. He had studios on the corner opposite the Lamb Hotel where he combined technical skill with an artist's eye. Titterton chose some unusual angles from which to record familiar scenes and a picture taken from the top of the chimney of the Quay brewery in 1879 was hailed as "the best photograph ever taken of the Cathedral exterior". One has a date, 1869, but there are no names.

There is however one clue to the mystery.

A picture of a grand old lady was taken at the Ayers photographic studio, 3 Clarence Place, Regent Street, Great Yarmouth. It has writing on the back. which reads "Mrs John Mayle. Died Jan 20, 1875, aged 67. The mother of the late Mrs John Freeman"

Research suggests that she was born Mary Preston and in 1825 had married John Mayle a publican, cattle dealer and farmer of Newnham Street, Ely. They had at least 11 children. One married a druggist from Watton, another a commercial traveller from Wandsworth – and there are pictures from these places.

The first of Mary's daughter, also named Mary, married into the ironmonger family of Peck's of Ely while a son, John, wed Elizabeth Wallis from Witchford. Her father was a horse dealer, and they reared seven children.

The second daughter, Elizabeth, married John Freeman in 1863. They had a son who died in infancy and two girls, Mary and Jane – doubtless the children in the 1869 Titterton picture.

John was a prominent builder, responsible for a number of important projects including Ely Methodist church, a schoolroom and chapel on the Mildenhall Road in Burnt Fen and the restoration of Wentworth Church. In August 1870 disaster struck. He went to inspect work being carried out on the railway bridge over the Old West River near Little Thetford but stumbled and train ran over his foot, crushing it. He survived, walking with the help of crutches but died later that year.

This connection with the Freeman family may account for the initials J.H.F. on the cover of the larger album

This legacy needs to return to its original family. If you have the surname of Mayle from Stuntney, Freeman or Peck from Ely in your family tree it may be of interest to you. If so please contact Mike Petty

Memories 4th February 2013 by Mike Petty

Kingfishers are plentiful, marsh harriers and herons common in the fens and nightingales very abundant everywhere.

Not early results from the recent RSPB bird survey but extracts from a remarkable journal compiled at Swaffham Bulbeck nearly 200 years ago by its vicar, Leonard Jenyns.

Leonard was son of the master of Bottisham Hall and passionately fond of birds, botany and natural history. Whilst a pupil at Eton he'd borrowed a friend's copy of Gilbert White's 'Natural History of Selborne' and copied out large sections.

Then when at St John's College, Cambridge he'd made friends with John Stevens Henslow who later married his sister and became University Professor of Botany. He also palled up with a younger student, Charles Darwin, and together they explored the fens around Bottisham, collecting specimens of plants and beetles.

When aged 23 Jenyns was ordained curate at Swaffham Bulbeck. That vicar spent all his time running a school near Wisbech so Leonard was left to his own devices. After five years he was appointed to the vicarage. There was not much money attached to the position but it was near his family home at Bottisham so it suited him well.

Swaffham Bulbeck church attracted quite a good congregation on Sundays but scarcely any of them showed the proper reverence during services. The main problem was a group of young men and boys who sat together on the short benches under the north wall. So Jenyns decided that immediately he noticed any laughing or talking he would come to a dead stop whether reading prayers or preaching, and stare at the offenders. The rest of the congregation followed suit and the youngsters quietened down without a word being spoken. However on one occasion the congregation took no notice so Jenyns simply walked out, leaving the bride and groom at the altar.

The vicar himself became something of a joke amongst his parishioners. When the fenland fogs formed on the large grass meadow in front of the vicarage he would be seen outside sitting at a small table jotting down notes until it lifted – sometimes all night. He recorded month by month the arrival of swallows, the singing of the greenfinch and the migration of winged ants as well as the ripening of his snowberries, peaches and Jargonelle pears

He noted badgers, natterjack toads, otters and the fish caught in the streams. One day he spotted a cow. They were common sight in the village but this one was different. It was dead and suspended from its heels against the west tower of the church where it was being cut up. Jenyns intervened and banished the butcher from the churchyard.

One day he was offered the chance to see the world as naturalist on a boat called the Beagle. He was not the first choice: his brother-in-law Professor Henslow had already turned it down. After a day's agonising, Jenyns did likewise and so his friend Charles Darwin got the trip.

Jenyns was content in his fenland parish and quite thought he'd spend the rest of his days there. But his wife became ill and they had to move away from the damp fenland to the Isle of Wight where the climate was more conducive to her recovery. Later they relocated to a parish in Somerset where she died. Jenyns' grief was compounded when Professor Henslow followed her to the grave within the year.

He remarried and moved into a small house in Bath. But as there was little space for all his books and herbarium he donated them to town's Royal Literary and Scientific Institution who built a room to house the Jenyns Library. He continued to publish extensively and his expertise was recognised by learned societies, several of which he'd founded

In 1871 Jenyns received another invitation when his cousin offered him an estate in Norfolk and a fortune in shares, but only if he'd change his surname to that Blomefield. This time he accepted the offer.

Leonard Blomefield died at Bath in 1893, leaving piles of paper, specimens and cuttings. Amongst them was a manuscript detailing his observations in Cambridgeshire. It was full of notes and newspaper cuttings on the mammals, birds, reptiles, amphibians, molluscs and fishes.

They record how moles were common (including white varieties), badgers were very uncommon, otters – formerly abundant – were still occasionally found at Trumpington, red squirrels were not unusual but Cambridgeshire's unique variety of long-woolled sheep had disappeared. Porpoises had been observed near Earith and a sturgeon caught at Ely.

Bustards had become very rare, though a gentleman had seen one near Swaffham Prior – if he'd had his gun with him he could have bagged it for Jenyns' collection. As it was there was a newly-stuffed one on display in January 1831 at Mr Denny's taxidermy shop in Downing Terrace, Cambridge. This was quite near the present University Museum of Zoology one of whose senior curators, Richard Preece has now edited Jenyns' remarkable record for publication.

"Fauna Cantabrigiensis ... by the Rev Leonard Jenyns (1800-1893)" is edited by Richard C. Preece and Tim Sparks and published by The Ray Society at £65 ISBN 978-0-903874-44-1

Memories 11th February 2013 by Mike Petty

When Jim Swainland was having a clear-out recently he discovered a map he thought might be of interest to me. “Harding’s Guide Map to Cambridge” is a bit out of date - there’s no M11, no northern bypass, not even a Twentypence Road from Wilburton to Cottenham. But at least the A10 north from Cambridge is still shown much as it is today – and despite all plans for new towns, this seems unlikely to change any time soon.

Nor is there a decorative picture to make it worth displaying. There is a calendar covering the period from February 1924 to January 1926 but in none of those years do the dates match those of 2013

What makes it fascinating is the decoration around the edge. It comprises a series of delightful colour advertisements for local tradesmen, many of which have faded from memory.

This was a period when motoring was all the rage and you could hire a car or motor cycle taxi from Rudd’s garage on Histon Road. Although there are no advertisements from firms offering to sell you a car, there are some for firms that would patch them up.

Queen’s Garage of Newnham Terrace, sole agents for National Benzol petrol, were motor engineers and haulage contractor who undertook repairs and overhauls and were open day and night. Bryant & Howlett of Abbey Walk repaired and painted motor van bodies and built lorries to order using the best seasoned materials.

The building trades are well represented. Craft and Company, decorators and painting contractors from Mawson Road, Cambridge, undertook paperhanging, distempering and glazing

If you needed a sanitary engineer, then there was a choice. C. Tolliday & Son, hot water engineers of Barton Road, would fit cisterns and water tanks, repair hot water and steam pipes and also sharpen lawn mowers while Clark’s Abbey Building Works on Godeston Way were able to tack any job, large or small.

A.W. Morlin of 148 Hills Road were one of the oldest ironmongers and builders’ merchants in the area, having started in 1909. They specialised in fireplaces but also had a large stock of baths, sinks and lavatory basins at reasonable prices. They’d opened a large warehouse in 1920 but it was soon too small and another wing was added in 1933.

Waller’s of Fitzroy Street supplied suits and suiting of lovely quality and colourings in fancy Worsteds, Tweed and Serges; they’d fit you, please you and save you money too. And when clothes needed cleaning there was the Swiss Laundry. When they had set up in 1903 they were the largest in Cambridge and one of the most improved laundries of the day using only the best pale soap and boiling water. They also mended all holes in tablecloths and other linen free of cost. The firm took pride in their service: their building had a glass roof so that the smallest grain of dust could be detected and their workers were supplied with white clothes to ensure the clean linen was in no way soiled by coming into contact with material of a different colour. But in 1910 local residents complained that smoke from the laundry chimney deposited smuts on the washing they'd hung to dry in their gardens, making it so dirty that it had to be taken in and washed again. One lady complained she'd washed a tablecloth three times and each time it had come in dirty. In the end she'd sent it to the laundry.

For relaxation at the end of a hard week, you could hire a pleasure boat, punt or canoe from any of S. Dolby's boat houses at Garret Hostel Lane, Robinson Crusoe Island or the head office at the Anchor Boat House in Silver Street where there were two large billiard tables that could be hired at reasonable terms.

J.J. Butterfield of 107 King Street sold wirelesses. They had receiving sets, amplifiers, audio filters, loud speakers and even telephones. But if you preferred to make your own music then W.J. Moore at 52 Bridge Street sold pianofortes or organs. The firm made news in September 1927 when three pianos were badly damaged after an oil stove they kept in their warehouse to prevent the instruments from becoming damp caught light.

The most unusual advertisements is for the Borwood Tool Company whose Ditton Works supplied wood-boring and circular moulding bits for hand or machine use. Do you know anything about this particular firm?

And at the end of the day, H.S. Mansfield, monumental mason and carver would supply memorials in marble, granite or stone from the works on Rock Road, guaranteeing the best possible workmanship at the lowest possible prices.

If any of these ring a bell with you, let me know.

Regarding the poster W J Moore – My father brought me a piano from that shop in 1945. It was a reconditioned one as no new pianos were being made because of the war.

It cost £60, and my father had saved his pocket money for a long time, I do remember him counting the £1 notes in the shop.

Mr W J Moores nephew Arthur was courting Doris Doggett who lived next door to us at Trinity Cottages in Madingley and on their wedding day in Madingley Church I was their Bridesmaid, I wore a pink taffeta dress and carried a posy of blue Scabious.

Arthur who was a piano tuner for his uncle I think, tuned my piano until he died. When the W J Moore shop closed Arthur worked for Millers.

Memories 18th February 2013, by Mike Petty

The current controversy about horsemeat in beef burgers has caused consternation around Europe. One reason for the substitution seems to be is that beef is so much more expensive than horse.

But such issues are not new

Writing in 1894 John Cordy Jeaffreson lamented the difficulty of buying any beef of good flavour in London: the beef that was displayed in the butchers' shops at Christmas-time was magnificent to the eye and tender to the tooth, but it was the flesh of young oxen.

Horse was one possible alternative but no cook could make the flesh of an old and worked-out horse into meat fit for human beings. The flesh of a young horse was a poor meat; the flesh of an old and worn out horse so bad a meat that men had to be goaded by famine before they cared to consume the hard and coarse viand, he noted.

Then one of his friends invited him to dine on something better: donkey. Jeaffreson accepted with reservations:

“I went to my friend's house without a keen appetite for the meat, although I was assured that the donkey had been, to the last, a young and healthy animal, and had been fed on bread-and-milk for the experimental table.

“Indeed, I went to the feast with a strong repugnance to the notion of eating donkey, and with a resolve to dine on the more familiar and common viands which would doubtless be offered to me. As I intended to avoid the donkey, I partook heartily of the soup, the fish, the entrees. After going thus far in the menu, I remarked to my host, ‘So far the dinner has been more than good. When will donkey be offered to us?’

“‘With the exception of the fish,’ he replied, ‘everything of which you have partaken was a preparation of donkey. The clear soup and the thick soup were made of donkey. The entrees were donkey. And now comes the piece de resistance — loin of donkey.’ As I had committed myself so largely to all the hygienic risks and consequences of eating the unfamiliar meat, I conceived I should not make matters much worse for my health by partaking of the loin of donkey, which proved alike tender and tasteful. Delicate in texture as well-kept five-year-old mutton, it had the flavour of roast loin of pork”

But this was well-known in Cambridge.

For in 1869 A.A. Vansittard, a Fellow of Sidney Sussex College, bought himself a healthy young donkey. He fattened it on oil-cake and when it was nice and juicy had it killed by a butcher. The idea of eating it was endorsed by another Fellow of Sidney, whose gastronomical tastes were notorious, and under his direction every part of the animal was utilised. Joints were also given to Trinity College and to one or two private friends. The considered opinion of one diner was that the meat was delicious, rather like swan. But the stench of fat in the kitchen was so disgusting that the man who usually collected the dripping refused to do so that week and it had to be buried some distance away

A handbill, preserved in the Cambridgeshire Collection, records the event:

Great Donkey Feed

O have you heard of the dainty feed,
(It is really true indeed,)
By some gourmonds it was agreed
To try a fatted donkey.

All who tasted did thus declare
No venison, French dish or hare,
Could by any means compare,
With a roasted donkey.

They found the meat so very fine,
They vow'd they never more would dine,
Ether off mutton, beef or swine,
But a good fatted donkey

Some chose the head and some the tail,
And it is said they did not fail,
To wash down with the college ale –
The nicely fatted donkey

Others preferred the loin and rump,
So nicely dressed, and so plump,
On which Neddy had many a thump,
Before he was a fatted donkey.

Some chose the liver, and some the heart,
Such delight it did impart,
And the brains made into a tart
Of a nicely fatted donkey

Some thought delicious was the tripe,
So nicely dress'd, sweet and ripe,
More delicate than grouse or snipe,
Was a good fatted donkey

The feet and ears made into soup,
With a fowl who had got the roup,
Delighted the epicurean troup,
Who fed on the fatted donkey

Even the skin made into a stew,
Was a dainty dish known to a few,
Which all gourmonds will now find true,
Of a roast and fatted donkey.

It adds intelligence to the brain
And cures disease too, some maintain,

He who Senior-wrangership would gain,
Must eat some fatted donkey.

The 'Varsity Crew, 'tis by all agreed,
Upon the Thames would take the lead,
If they were all made to feed -
On a good fat donkey.

In Athletic Sports they're now so fleet,
By being fed off Donkey meat,
They can perform almost any feat, -
E'en up goes the donkey.

Soon the fashion will combine,
Instead of mutton, beef or swine,
Off Baalam's breed all will dine -
On a goodly fatted donkey.

In the future it may be seen
If the members are very green,
And the partakers ass-inine -
Who enjoy'd the roasted donkey.

USE THIS VERSE LAST – PERHAPS CROP SOME OF THE EARLIER VERSES IF NECESSARY

Knifefum, forkum, feedem fum,
He haw! He haw! He haw hum,
How do you like your donkey done,
The wonderful donkey feeding!

Memories 25 March 2013 by Mike Petty

The other evening I gave a talk in the WI Hall at Wickhambrook, an old wooden structure that has been a focal point of community life since it was erected in the 1920s. But it was not new then. It was a throwback to the Great War that may even have sheltered wounded soldiers just across the Backs at Cambridge.

Philomena Guillebaud has lived much of her life off Grange Road. However it was not until she was researching the history of the area that she noticed a series of buildings marked on the Ordnance Survey map for 1927. She asked various people what it was but it was some time before she met somebody who could tell her. It was a massive military hospital. How did it get there, what was its role and what happened to it? Now, after months of research, she can reveal its story.

It was through the efforts of Florence Nightingale that people became aware of the sufferings of wounded soldiers in the Crimean war. A Royal Army Medical Corps had been established just in time for the Boer War when once more the treatment of wounded hit the headlines. In 1908 the War Office made plans for some 23 Territorial Forces general hospitals to be set up in case of future conflict. By 1911 it was decided that Cambridge would be the site of one of these receiving medical and surgical cases. The headquarters of the surgical division would be at King's College and the medical wards in the Senate House. The nurses would be quartered in Downing College.

In 1914 the Cambridge medical volunteers went to summer camp in Kent under their commanding officer, Colonel Joseph Griffiths, a surgeon at Addenbrooke's Hospital. They got back home just as War was declared and were quickly billeted in the University Physiological Laboratory while nurses moved in to Downing, as planned, though later they transferred to King's.

The first patients were housed in the dormitories of the Leys School where an operating theatre was fitted out. But the school wanted its buildings back after the summer holidays so Griffiths approached Trinity College about using the famous cloisters under the Wren Library as an open-air Hospital.

Soon it was obvious that something bigger was wanted so Negus, a Cambridge builder, was commissioned to erect a large hutted hospital on the Clare College cricket field just across the road. The first patients were admitted to the ten-acre site on 17th October 1914. The buildings were made of wood with just three sides, the other being left open. It was felt that this would speed the healing of wounds. In summer it was quite balmy and in winter patients tucked up under blankets were kept warm by hot water bottles and an early version of an electric blanket. But they still got wet when rain lashed in and during the bad winter of 1916-17 snow built up on their beds. But nurses suffered worse. Eventually the fourth side was glazed in.

Thousands of wounded were brought by train to Cambridge station and conveyed to their hidden hospital down Burrell's Walk which was made wide enough for the motorised ambulances. Beyond the hedge there were flower beds between the wards, a Post Office, newspaper shop and canteen. The little town even had its own newsletter to which patients contributed their reminiscences and rhymes including comments on rats running over their beds – something they'd thought to have left behind in the trenches.

The site was usually out-of-bounds to townsfolk though ladies choirs entertained troops – some perhaps hoping for a glimpse of a son who had gone 'missing' or a comrade from his regiment who could have knowledge of his fate. Other entertainment was provided by John Gambling, a magician, who visited nearly every evening.

The Hospital was inspected by the King in August 1916 and J. Palmer Clarke of Post Office Terrace was commissioned to produce a detailed photographic record including the carpenter's shop, skittle alley, laundry, canteen and wards, the negatives of which are preserved in the Cambridgeshire Collection.

One feature pictured was the Bath Ward – dubbed the Aquarium - where patients suffering open wounds were immersed for extensive periods in warm circulating water. Such modern treatment attracted the attention of the Princeton Alumni Weekly whose correspondent reported in November 1916: "One man who had his foot blown off by a shell has been lying in this bath for nine weeks without being removed. He suffers no pain from the ragged stump of his leg while the cure is proceeding"

Once the carnage of war had ceased and the last shattered men sent elsewhere for nursing, the vast wooden township had another role to fulfil. For many of the men returning from the trenches had nowhere to restart their civilian lives and so the buildings were used as temporary homes for heroes till council housing was ready. Remarkably there are still a few people who have personal recollections of a childhood in the huts. If you are one, Philomena would love to hear from you.

But the colleges wanted their field back – Clare had a Memorial Court to construct and the University needed a site for a new Library. So it was that the wooden wards were sold off, some went as chicken huts to Manea, others became village halls.

And people forgot there had ever been a hospital. Now, at last, its history has been told

Memories 4th March 2013 by Mike Petty

Proposals for an underground link road beneath Cambridge are currently being investigated with suggestions for a network of bus routes linking Castle Hill and Coldham's Common, with stops beneath Christ's Pieces and The Grafton.

Back in March 1963 – 50 years ago – the News featured a very similar idea.

It was obvious back then that there would need to be redevelopment in the city centre, the question was how would deliveries and shoppers get there.

City Architect, Gordon Logie, came up with a scheme, hailed by the News as 'imaginative and daring'. The large shopping precinct off Petty Cury would be serviced by an underground road.

It would burrow from Emmanuel Road, under St Andrew's Street, Downing Street and the proposed new Lion Yard shops before crossing Market Street beneath Macintosh's shop – then scheduled for redevelopment - and below Sidney Street to emerge in Jesus Lane.

As well as keeping traffic moving, it would allow vehicles to stop, with parking for 1,500 cars on three underground decks, probably 30ft at the deepest.

Existing roads would retain their present scale and character with buildings in King's Parade and Trinity Street left virtually untouched while Sidney Street would retain its pattern of small shops. In St Andrew's Street individual rebuilding to the same general height and scale would be allowed but the rear of the existing shops would be redeveloped to give more shopping spaces and allow goods to be delivered.

Petty Cury would see radical change: most of the properties on the south side and some on the north would be rebuilt to the same height and scale as the existing buildings with a covered arcade, shopping hall and two shopping squares open to the sky, linked at ground and first-floor levels by pedestrian walkways. The scheme would include a new Central Library whose old site in Wheeler Street would be used to extend the Guildhall.

A pedestrian precinct would extend to Petty Cury, Market Street and Market Hill which would see a new Concert Hall and the return of Hobson's Conduit displacing the cars that currently clustered between market stalls.

But it was the underground access route that was key. It would be used by buses bringing shoppers from the villages right to the centre of the town and pick them up again on the way home. It would also carry customers' cars and vans delivering stock to replace that sold

If the redevelopment was profitable enough, the developers would be willing to meet the cost of the underground road, bays and car parks without expense to the Council. They would have to fund just the entrance tunnels - not an unreasonable price to pay for future commercial prosperity.

All the technical problems of building such a road could be overcome and it would probably be developed separately from either end. The route would be designed to avoid the temptation of non-shopping motorists using it as a by-pass, returning to almost the same point from which it started

Inevitably there would be opposition but the only main sufferers would be two colleges.

At Sidney Sussex the wall on the corner with Jesus Lane would have to be set back by thirty feet to allow for one of the entrances to the tunnel

More badly affected was Emmanuel College where the underground road would run beneath part of the building. While this might be acceptable, there was a major problem

For the new tunnel would also go beneath the college lake. This would have to be resited, disturbing the college's most famous residents - the aged carp that had been a pet of undergraduates for years

Needless to say, the plan came to nothing. But at least public opinion was tested before the council became involved in heavy expenditure on investigating the many legal, engineering and financial problems involved.

There have been other plans, both before and after. Now we start once more.

Early March 1913 was a busy time for Huntingdon firemen.

Out at Papworth Everard, Kisby's Hut, an old thatched coaching inn filled with valuable antique furniture was razed to the ground in less than an hour, the landlady and her daughter escaping barefoot. The pub, a frequent meeting place of the Cambridgeshire Hounds, had recently been sold to Marshall's brewers of Huntingdon who had now to face the prospect of replacing it by a more modern building

Huntingdon Brigade had raced to the scene with their steam fire engine but were only able to prevent the flames spreading to a large shed nearby. Next afternoon they were called into action once more, this time to Swavesey. But again by the time they arrived, it was too late.

At Swavesey the fire had started when a spark from the chimney was blown on to the thatched roof of George Hepher's house in Taylor's Lane. As the family rushed to save their furniture a strong wind sent more sparks to the adjacent properties in Church End. The Railway Tavern and two houses burst into a tremendous sheet of flame sending burning pieces of thatch flying through the air to ignite Mr Williamson's large barn. The livestock were rescued but poultry had to be left to perish. Nearby Old Fred Dodson was in bed when his cottage caught light and he had to be roused to escape the blaze.

The flames were now literally leaping down both sides of the street towards the railway station, and the spectacle was at once a grand and terrible one. The intense heat from the burning buildings, with the dense clouds of black choking smoke, combined with the patches of burning thatch and fragments of wood which filled the air, made the road practically impassable.

The village Bobbie, Pc. H. Plowman was one the first on the scene, soon joined by Sergt. Day of Longstanton and other officers. Scores of willing helpers faced the danger and discomfort bravely and did their best to assist their stricken neighbours. The Rev. J. F. Cooksey set a brilliant example rescuing furniture and poultry, carrying a large sofa some distance on his back. He was joined by various Parish Councillors.

But where was the Parish Council's fire engine? It was some time before it could be brought into action: there were rules to be followed; the Captain of the brigade could not take the engine from its shed until he had been formally asked to do so by an owner of a burning house. The village fire fighters were volunteers, but they'd not been paid for turning out on other occasions and so were less than enthusiastic. Eventually however they got to work, drawing water from the Swan Pond as they waited for the St Ives and Huntingdon engines to come to their aid.

But in truth very little could be done as old thatched house after house caught alight until practically the whole street was burning at once. Some were important parts of the village streetscape, others old properties that had already been condemned and were awaiting demolition. There was no hope of extinguishing the burning houses, so fire fighters concentrated on stopping the spread, playing water on the walls of brick houses better able to resist the flames. Then came a heavy shower of rain and after two hours it was over.

For a long distance the street was enveloped in a cloud of dense, pungent smoke. On each side were wastes of smouldering embers and blackened brickwork. As twilight began to fall a row of chimney stacks, where some half-dozen cottages had been destroyed, towered over the ruins like a line of sombre sentinels.

Passing down the darkened street, people stumbled here and there over a little heap of chairs and pictures or a bundle of household linen blackened by smoke and soaked with water. Heaps of furniture were all mixed up together presenting the gigantic problem of sorting out which belonged to who.

Some homeless families were sheltered by their more fortunate neighbours though the older and poorer people were taken to St. Ives Workhouse for the night

As day dawned and the news spread so thousands of visitors poured into the village by motor cars, traps, cycles, and train to witness the quarter mile scene of total destruction, the skeletons of cycles, remains of sewing machines, twisted ironwork of bedding and children's toys.

Collecting boxes were put out in the street begging donations towards the relief of the sufferers. At least sixty-seven people were homeless in a village that had been short of accommodation even before the first spark had ignited.

John Shepperson, the Swavesey historian recently awarded the British Empire Medal, has recorded some of the later developments in his new publication 'Swavesey Born and Bred' with personal memories of farming alongside some of the stories told by elderly residents.

Memories 18 March 2013 by Mike Petty

Memories don't have to be recent: Jean Turner from Queen Edith's has kindly shown me some wonderful recollections that were written back in the 1940s by her late father-in-law, John Turner

Composed in clear, copper-plate handwriting they record how he'd known in 1896, when 16 years old, that he wanted to be an engine driver,

"I went to the Cambridge Loco. Yard and saw Mr Maroch the District Superintendent and told him of my ambition. I learned from him that many years would pass before I should stand on the footplate with my hand on the regulator. He told me I could start as a cleaner at 1/10d a day and that it was a ten hour day. Also I should get a yearly rise of 2d a day with three days holiday.

So I started the next morning April 7th 1896 on engine no 454. I thought it would take me a week to clean this large blue engine, and I had to do it in a day! I set to with a will, with someone to show me how it should be done, and I rubbed away with my cloth thinking with each rub, that it brought me a step nearer by goal – the footplate. In the sheds at the time there was an oil-burner designed by Mr Holder, a Stratford engine, one of the first in the country. She was painted blue with 'Petrolea' on the splashers picked out in gold.

Three days after I started the Company's oil and tallow stores in the Loco Yard were burnt down, and the following night the stables in the Goods Yard were burnt out. In May the Coldham's Lane branch to Newmarket was opened which saved running over the main line and Good Yard at a busy spot.

After six months I was given my own engine, No.456, to keep clean. As an inducement to clean the cab I was given the driver's old great-coat. This suited me as I had to walk from Fulbourn four miles away and I had to leave at 5 am so needed some protection from the weather.

After three years of cleaning I was made acting fireman for local and relief work on shunting engines. This necessitated my living in Cambridge. Whilst on this job there was a vacancy at Huntingdon, then a small country town with only a single track and only one engine there, a 'Sharpie' which the other acting fireman and I had to coal and clean, as well as firing. With a light load these Sharpe engines could hold their own with any engine of that day.

In October 1900 I went to Newmarket. I was pleased as instead of coaling my tender, it was coaled off the stage at Peterborough, the run I was on. The type of engines I worked at Newmarket were 2-4-0 and 2-2-2, the latter having a single driving wheel. This type of engine was originally used to work on the Cambridge to York expresses, but as the trains got heavier they were taken off and sent to Cambridge for the Ely, Peterborough and Cambridge traffic. On April 7th of the following year the new Newmarket station was opened and I was fireman on the first train out of the dock, the 8.7 am to Peterborough. On my return I went to Ely and was made regular fireman on September 9th, 1904

The year 1906 found me firing on the main line goods. My run was through the Fen country, where in those days it was possible to buy twenty eggs for a shilling and butter at 9d a pound.

BREAK NARRATIVE

John seems to have had a narrow escape from injury. In April 1906 a serious accident occurred on the Great Eastern Railway at Shippea Hill station. The engine attached to the Norwich-London express jumped the line, the following coach reared up on end and fell down the bank into the ditch, breaking the telegraph wires. The second coach was hurled down the bank on the opposite side and the third, fourth and fifth coaches left the lines. Three passengers were injured, two seriously, but all had a miraculous escape from death. Perhaps he was not on duty, certainly he does not mention it.

RESUME NARRATIVE

In 1910 I went as fireman on local passenger trains and the following year I started firing on expresses on an engine running to Lincoln, Norwich, Peterborough and London

I was only on this job seven weeks when I was made acting driver, and in those days there were no Improvement Classes or Instruction Vans so we acting firemen used to meet in each other's houses for discussion and exchange of knowledge for our mutual advancement. In 1917 I was made full driver, and I remember our instructions in the event of air raids were to bring the train to a standstill as any hovering Zeppelin could by stopping its engines, hear the training running.

In November 1919 I joined the Cambridge Railway Silver Prize Band as a drummer. This band won the First Prize, a shield valued at fifty guineas in the Brass Band Contest at the Crystal Palace in 1922.

During the war and for several years after I was supervising at Newmarket. On race-days as many as sixteen specials ran out. In July 1922 the Cambridge Royal Show was held in the meadows at Trumpington, and the company built a temporary station for the convenience of passengers visiting the show.

I went back to driving expresses on March 1st 1913 on 2818, Wynyard Park. My longest trip with it was from Cambridge to Manchester with an excursion of college servants. I had a pilot from Lincoln over the other Company's line.

In 1932 whilst standing at Liverpool Street Station I slipped off the engine and broke my right leg. This put me in hospital for 13 weeks and it was eleven months before I could report for duty"

This marked the end of John Turner's express-driving career. In accordance with normal practice he went back to the branch passengers trains and then to goods where he finished his service on the footplate. His final trips were made on the old Colne Valley and Halstead Railway which was taken over by the L.N.E.R. on the amalgamation in 1923.

John had enjoyed his career: "Looking back over almost fifty years of railway working there have been many improvements both with regard to working conditions and pay. Were it possible to live my life over again I should make no alternative choice. I have never regretted my decision, made as a boy, to become an engine driver"

Memories 25th March 2013 by Mike Petty

Travellers journeying through Earith have been delayed recently due to maintenance work on the concrete deck and road surface of the bridge across the New Bedford River.

It has long been an important crossing point. In the Middle Ages the road from Earith to Haddenham was the responsibility of the Bishop of Ely who installed a hermit to repair the causeway and river crossing

The original bridge was constructed of timber. By 1286 it was so old and broken that footmen, horses and carts were unable to cross and the sheriff was ordered to make repairs. It had fallen down by 1346 but was brought back into use and in 1604 had nine twelve-foot wide arches through which 14 feet of water passed 'vehemently' along the West Water towards Chatteris.

Within half a century that single West Water had been replaced by a new and then a newer Bedford River, both of which had to be crossed. Travellers made their way over the first by a nine-hole sluice which was replaced by a seven holes bridge built by the Hundred Foot Wash Commissioners in 1824. This was topped by a fence along the parapet erected at the expense of Tom Benton in the 1880s. He had been driving across it in a light cart when his horse shied and jumped the parapet, taking the cart with him. There happened to be a boat moored nearby, from which Tom was saved from drowning. So he paid for the extra rails and ensured that a boat was always moored there for the rest of his life. This was replaced in April 1954 by a new sluice bridge.

The more major impediment was the New Bedford River; the drainers had dug it, so the drainers had to pay for a bridge over it. They constructed what was described as 'a very strong and high wooden bridge' probably similar to one that remained in use at Mepal until the 1930s.

But by the early 1840s the Earith bridge was unsafe for people to cross and tenders were sought for building a new iron one. The Directors of the Stockton and Darlington Railway Company offered a second-hand suspension bridge built in 1830 that they wanted to dispose of at a good price and numerous contractors submitted proposals for new ones. The Cambridge Eagle Foundry came in at £2,030 with an extra £229.10s for stone facing. After considerable debate it was agreed to accept a tender from Messrs Sharp of Long Sutton for a suspension bridge Work started in October 1843 but the contractor found great difficulty finding a good foundation. What should have been completed in seven months dragged on and it was March 1847 before it was completed. But problems were quickly apparent: in February 1850 one of the iron girders broke and the deal flooring was also reported in a dangerous condition.

Then on 13th June 1863 a traction engine belonging to Messrs John and Stephen Feary of Bluntisham was making its way over the bridge when two of the cast iron girders snapped with a loud crack. This so scared the driver that he jumped off the engine, leaving it to cross by itself, which it did without mishap. Additional timber struts were fixed as a temporary measure but it would need the replacement of the fourteen cast-iron girders with others made of wrought iron, Richard Reynolds Rowe, the Isle of Ely County Surveyor, advised.

It was decided to build a complete new suspension bridge which was finished by July 1865. Its strength was tested by driving over it that same threshing engine that had damaged the old one. This time it stood the weight. But there were other problems: the new suspension bridge swayed too much and additional anchoring needed to be put in place to hold it steady.

As traffic increased plans were commissioned for the present bridge which was officially opened on 5th April 1963.

It was not the end of the difficulties, as engineers made clear at that time.

Eventually a high-level viaduct would need to be constructed across the 150-yard section of often waterlogged road causeway between the two Bedford Rivers. It was blocked to cars for sometimes 15 days a year providing a lucrative income for locals who leapt into action as cars spluttered to a halt in more than a foot of floodwater. The price for motorists who lost the gambol to get across was £1 for a push out and clean-up with a rag, £2 for a tow out with a Landrover. "If they can't pay we'll take anything: watches, foreign currency, cheques", one rescuer told reporters in 1977. However he had cut-throat competition from two enterprising schoolboys from Bluntisham who made £20 during one week.

In March 1978 this income was threatened after the County Council spent £23,000 in raising the level of the road by more than ten inches. Hopefully when the present works are completed this vital route for travellers will once more carry them dryly on their journey

'Memories' readers often write to share their recollections of Cambridge shops and businesses

Mrs J. Jenner from Bourn was in the A.T.S. stationed on Donkey Common during the war. She writes: "We A.T.S. girls, mainly from Lancashire, with me being the odd one out coming from Yorkshire, made a bee-line after lectures to upstairs Woolworths for tea and eats before going sightseeing. When I was posted to Guildford and had a weekend pass I wrote to my then boy friend (later my husband) and he would book a double room for me and my friend, Punchy, at the Central Hotel. We had to go down the side to get in. Our room was looking out on Guildhall and the market". She remembers many of the shops: Bacon and Ora the tobacconists, Eaden Lilley and Joshua Taylor, but others have slipped from her memory

Cambridge had a number of shops selling ladies fashions: George Stace in Petty Cury was one which filled a special niche in the local fashion trade for many years. The name came to stand for a good, solid, middle class trade. It catered for the matron, and for the essentially well-to-do family of both town and county. Their shop windows curved inwards to reduce reflections making the glass invisible while spotlights inside made customers feel they had only to reach out and touch the articles. Its closure in 1951 was mourned by many.

Coads' department store had arrived in Burleigh Street Cambridge in May 1929 offering keen prices, up-to-date goods and an immediate refund if the customer was not satisfied. 'Value and Variety with a smile' was their motto, and it worked. A new Sidney Street store opened in 1935 with three floors and a splendid oak-panelled stairway. Its arcade and island cases were a glowing example of the shop fitter's craft. Coad's were famous for their remarkable values in coats, woollies and blouses and the millinery salon was well lit. At the farther end was the Lingerie and Corsetry Salon and a Younger Ladies' Department where girls could shop like their mother did. Coad's ceased trading in September 1958, the site being acquired by Woolworth as an extension to their adjoining store

But who remembers Heyworth's, a ladies department store in Cambridge which was run by two generations of the Heyworth family from 1914. George Heyworth first opened his shop in Burleigh Street, quite near the Co-op, before moving to the corner of Sidney Street and Market Passage in 1928. He offered a fashion service to women of every age, claiming to clothe them from the 'cradle to the grave'. In 1952 the firm completed their ambition of clothing ladies from head to foot with the opening of a new show department in the basement stocking Lotus and Delta shoes for both day and evening wear.

Its sale attracted large crowds in 1950 with fur coats marked down from £37 to a tenner (about £250 at today's values). But can anybody help date an advertisement that I have in my files. It was published probably about 1923 when ladies cosy winter knickers could be bought for one-and-ninepence-halfpenny - though outsize pairs were one shilling extra.

Heyworth's closed in the 1960s and has virtually faded from memory. Now Ellee Seymour, a former News journalist, is seeking information about this almost-forgotten emporium. If you worked there, have pictures of the store or can tell her about the Heyworth family please contact me and I will put you in touch.

And if you have memories of being behind the counter in any other Cambridge or village shops, then share them with other readers. Life cannot always have been straightforward. There must have been those customers you looked forward to – or dreaded. Tell us.

Hi Mike,

I had a very interesting morning meeting another Heyworth lady called Eve (children's wear) and then going to the Cambs Collection and researching the tragic death of a salesgirl in a coach crash in 1950 on her way home from a dance at RAF Lakenheath. I believe the girl, 18-year-old Molly Rolfe from Suez Road, had gone to the dance without her parents knowledge as they were very strict. Her death shocked and saddened her working colleagues at Heyworths.

A couple of memoirs from Betty which you can mention are how the Marchioness of Cambridge would regularly buy her hats from the store, a different one to match each different dress she wore to Ascot on each of the four consecutive days that Ascot was held then. She would bring some fabric from the dresses that she had cut off from the generous hem or seam to make sure it matched. Betty would take the fabrics to London and match them up and select one or two hats from the wholesalers which she thought would be suitable. These hats would no doubt be worn in the royal box as Lady Cambridge, who died in 1988, was the oldest member of the royal family. She belonged to the so-called Old Royal Family who descended from King George 111. She had no airs and graces and was a delight to serve, confiding in Betty that she liked to buy Marks and Spencer dresses for Ascot, and dress them up with special hats and accessories.

Heyworths was a very smart shop, very upmarket, all the women wore hats back in the 1940s and 50s - and Easter was one of their busiest times of the year. There were separate drawers for feathers and ribbons of all colours to decorate them with.

Betty remembers the strict working conditions, and how the younger Mr Herbert Heyworth had a red light which flashed outside his office to indicate a member of staff was in trouble. On one of these occasions, a terrified Betty was summoned before him and was shaking like a leaf. She was told she had to sack a sales girl for leaning against the fixtures, after he told her: "Here's her cards, I don't pay my staff for leaning against the fixtures." The woman was out straight away, she left that Saturday night, you didn't get a week's notice in those days. You couldn't stand there and look around, you had to be busy all the time.

Betty has has fond memories of the older Mr George Heyworth, and remembers the excitement when all the staff were taken to London for a day out to see the Festival of Britain in London in 1951. I have attached a picture of this outing showing Betty left, and fellow millinery sales girl Maureen, right.

Eve remembers starting at Heyworth's as a junior in the children's department at 14. Mr Heyworth senior felt sorry for her as she was one of seven children her widowed mother had to support and increased her starting salary from the normal 15 shillings a week which was given to newcomers to one pound. She had to work 5 1/2 days a week, including every Saturday, and was not allowed to have a Saturday off to be bridesmaid when her cousin married, even though a gold taffeta dress had been specially made.

I hope this is ok. Stephen and I are going to Norfolk tomorrow for a couple of days. I will be able to answer emails and other queries about this before 11am tomorrow, it may be hard to get a signal in Norfolk.

Thank you again, wouldn't it be wonderful if we had a good response from this.

We are meeting Joy for a birthday dinner this evening.

Memories 8th April 2013 by Mike Petty

Recent proposals for a new Cambridge University boathouse at Ely have prompted concern about the impact on wildlife along this peaceful stretch of river.

But it has not always been peaceful. During the Second World War a version of the Oxford & Cambridge Boat Race, banned from the Thames because of fears of bombing, was held along the stretch of river from the junction of the Rivers Ouse and Lark to Adelaide Bridge. The event was recreated in November 2002 when some of the original crews who had competed in 1944 came back to the scene of the battle. They recalled how Cambridge had led for much of the contest, only to be overhauled at the end as they neared Ely.

Film footage of the original race shows that crowds lined the river banks, with some on horseback galloping to keep up with the rowers. And amongst scores of people who had come to relive the occasion there were numbers of local folk who as boys and girls had journeyed from Littleport or Prickwillow to witness a once-in-a-lifetime occasion.

The river caters for many other types of craft as Hugh Easton, a marine consultant based in Lowestoft, recalls. Hugh was born in Cambridge in 1932 and worked at Ely's Appleyard Lincoln boatyard as an apprentice making pleasure cruisers both of wood and later fibreglass which provided many a pleasant holiday on fenland rivers.

Both holiday-makers and rowers had to share the water with the heavy working barges used to transport clay from Roswell pits for repairing river banks. During the great floods of 1947 lines of heavily loaded barges were guided by tug-boat drivers to fill the breaches in the river banks that were releasing water to gush over fertile fenland.

The barges had another use, as Hugh recalls:

“Until the early fifties, Ely Sugar Beet Factory, beside the Ouse at Queen Adelaide, ran a fleet of about sixty, large, steel, dumb barges together with three diesel-driven tugs. These were used to pick up harvested beet, during the annual 'campaign' season, having been loaded from river-side fields, into previously delivered, empty barges

When a sufficient number of loaded barges were ready, a tug would be despatched, to tow them back to the factory, near the Adelaide bridge. Thus, during the season we at Harry Lincoln's boat yard, had to be very much on the 'qui vive', when we heard the 'toot-toot' of a loud horn, signalling a warning that a string of loaded barges was approaching from upstream hidden by the rail and river bridges because ahead, lay the sharp bend in the river, by the Annesdale (Cutter) quay

On average there were probably about eight or ten barges in a 'string' - but occasionally, there could be a dozen or more - and on one occasion I counted seventeen! The barges themselves, were connected to each other, by chains at each 'corner', and in order to negotiate any of these bends, barge-men were stationed at intervals along the 'string' - able to hop from one barge to the next - and when approaching a bend, they would slacken the outside chain at intervals, to allow the 'string' to bend, as the tug altered course. Also, in order to try to prevent the tail-end barges from swinging outwards too much, a drag chain was deployed, dragging along the bottom of the river

But sometimes these efforts still did not have the desired effect, resulting in the last barge coming into violent contact with the quay-heading - or possibly a boat. Thus we had to endeavour to move any boat, moored at the quay - dinghy, launch or cruiser - further up stream, clear of the actual bend. But occasionally, for what ever reason we were not always successful - oops!

But then the Ely Sugar Beet Factory began to collect everything by road. Whether they did that as a matter of policy, I know-not - but it did happen at just the right time because they were able to sell their entire fleet to Derek Crouch Construction Limited, when they won the contract for digging out and constructing the 11 mile, flood relief channel, between Denver and Kings Lynn!

Derek Crouch contracted Appleyard & Lincoln to pull each and every barge out of the water, scrub it, do any necessary welding repairs and give it a coat of black tar-varnish, before relaunch. We also pulled out the three tugs to have their bottoms scabbed and tar-varnished as well as any welding - plus overhauling the stern gear and mechanicals! Ted Appleyard was put in charge of that operation with Harry employing a separate gang of labours to do the 'dirty' work! And Appleyard & Lincoln finished up with one of those barges in its fleet!

Memories 15 April 2013, by Mike Petty

I have been sent a small scrapbook that was treasured by the late Christine Newman of Cambridge. It was compiled by her father, Mr William Ewart Lile, who was born in Fitzroy Street in April 1886, and contains snippets relating to his family, to Holy Sepulchre Church and especially his interests in the Bumps, with numerous cuttings devoted to the '99 Rowing Club of which he was Secretary

For 40 years William worked for Cambridgeshire County Council's smallholdings estate established under the Small Holdings and Allotments Act that came into force on 1st January 1908, two years after he'd started his scrapbook.

Smallholdings were pieces of land of not less than one acre and not more than fifty which could be acquired by the council and rented out to local people, should there be demand. And there certainly was. There was demand from Cottenham when 200 people asked for 663 acres of land, from Steeple Morden, Isleham and Willingham, where it seemed everyone was an expert gardener.

But it was Soham that attracted the attention of a special reporter from The Standard of March 1909. For of all the experiments under the Small Holdings Act he'd investigated this was the most interesting.

Soham was then a quiet, little, by-way town, with a population of just over 4000, forming a most interesting, even extraordinary, community that was synonymous with work and thrift. If the smallholdings experiment was to succeed anywhere it was in here. They had the right kind of land for the experiment, and the right type of man to work it "Take Mr. T. Everett, the secretary of the Soham Small Holders' Society. He has lived in this town over forty years, is a local magistrate, and out of his labours has fashioned that coveted armchair of retirement to which the majority of us vainly aspire. Yet, to-day, despite the bleak east wind sweeping over the long, low-lying fens, I found him hard at work branch-logging in his three-acre garden adjoining the house.

"Work is a religion in Soham. It should go into history as the Town of Toil. What would some men say to such a day's schedule as that of one of the small holders here: 'Rise at five o'clock and see to my horses. Go down the street and see to Mr. Blank's cows. Get across to my holding and put in an hour there. Then off to my regular job of "claying" (lifting the sunken clay of the fields to the surface before back for an hour or so on my holding.'"

From the very first the Act was taken up with enthusiasm. The County acquired Tile House Farm on a fourteen years' lease and sixty-four applicants came forward. They wanted men with a little capital who were able to pay the rent and some sign of security was sought. The sequel was dramatic, almost comical.

"These humble men, these toilers of the field who regard a wage of £1 a week as princely, came forward hesitatingly, bashfully, as though thrift were a thing to be ashamed of, and gave proof of their solvency. I heard of one man, a labourer with a large family, who went to the house of one of the committee men and laid before his astonished gaze a bank book showing £56 to his credit, and a bag containing £70 in gold. 'Where did I get it?' he echoed; 'I worked for it, sir; just worked'. 'And why in the name of conscience didn't you put that £70 into the bank and let it work for you?' he was asked. He merely pulled his forelock foolishly"

And others came in similar manner. Gold that had been hoarded for years in the dark recess of their humble cottage was brought, out and displayed as proof that the owners were men of substance.

They were also hard workers: there was a quantity of manure for disposal among the several successful smallholders. In the ordinary course this would have remained in the heap until the summer, when the roads across the farm were more accessible. But no sooner was the money paid than every man secured his rightful allowance, and, by hook or by crook, conveyed it to his holding. The ownership fever was on him, and he could not rest until he had his due.

But who were these men with money to invest in their future. Although a few had been small holders for years the majority were merely agricultural labourers or drainage workers earning from 15s. to £1 a week.

"You may term these small holders a superior class of labourers," Mr. Everett told the reporter. "Most of them have never done any farming before excepting at harvest time. But they know the work intuitively, and they will succeed because they can work and because they are thrifty." A Soham Small Holders Society was set up to purchase heavy farming implements, such as a manure drill, a corn drill, a reaping machine and a Cambridge roll to be hired out to members, though drills and reaping machines could only be used by somebody competent. .

Were your family one of these hard-working men in 1909; and did they survive the trauma of war that was to follow five years later and the depression that was to succeed it. And is Soham still a paradise for poor people. In 1909 there were no fewer than 300 acres of common land, and he was a poor man indeed who had not at least a few geese to turn out on the common. Perhaps its time to return to the days of self-sufficiency.

William Liles retired in 1948 after forty years service and retired to Clacton, dying in 1981. He was in youth a passionate photographer and in the 1980s Mrs Newman deposited copies of many of his photographs in the Cambridgeshire Collection. Now this scrapbook will be joining them.

Memories 22nd April 2013 by Mike Petty

Keith Ward from Canada has been a welcome correspondent for many years. Back in September 1999 he appealed for help in arranging a reunion of pupils who'd attended the Central School for Boys between 1945 and 1949. This went ahead in 2005 and he has sent a photo of the lads who got together to revive their memories.

Keith keeps in touch with Cambridge happenings and recent reports of how water-filled pits near Brooks Road might become a leisure facility have encouraged him to share his recollections of the days when he trespassed into similar out-of-bounds areas.

I have many memories from my childhood days during WW2 ranging all the way from scrumping fruit from orchards to finding pieces of shrapnel and the foil tape that was used to block radar waves.

Our "gang" were an adventuresome lot. During the WW2 period the four or five members of us would venture into the aircraft dump on Coldham's Common (I once used this term several years ago and received an angry reply from a former worker and was told that it was not a crash dump but a MRU which I think was the acronym for Maintenance and Repair Unit).

We used to play hide and seek in the fuselages of the British, American and German planes that had been shot down and heaped on top of each other. The site was patrolled by RAF personnel and their German Shepherd dogs so it was a challenge to hide in the planes and not be discovered during their patrols. We had a perfect record of never being discovered.

All of the planes were basically scrapped and it's my understanding that any re-usable parts were removed to repair other planes. During our play in the "crash dump" we used to find all sorts of things that had been overlooked or ignored by the maintenance crews. This involved coins, cigarette lighters, and other personal items of the aircrew. We manually transported the belly and wing fuel tanks and oxygen bottles to the old Brick and Tile Works water-filled pit adjacent to the Coldham's lane bridge.

At the bottom of the pit there was a flat area with an old barn type metal storage area in which there were two or three old rusting tractors that we played on. The aircraft fuel tanks had bullet holes in them and we filled the holes with clay and grass and then let the filling bake in the sun. Once the clay mixture had dried we applied more clay to make sure the tanks were watertight. After testing the tanks in the water we'd sit on the tanks and paddle around the pond using our hands as paddles. The wing fuel tanks were round and obviously were not stable in the water so we used the oxygen tanks as outriggers.

All this will strike a cord with Bob Giddings who lives in a line of cottages at the entrance to Denny Abbey. As a lad Bob in 1951 watched the wartime military activity in the adjacent newly-established Waterbeach airfield and had his own special playthings – the remains of wrecked aircraft that were being cannibalised for spare parts. He has snaps of them amongst his collection of old postcards

But back to Keith:

Another favourite place for our games was the Rifle Butts on Coldham's Common. When we were not digging out spent bullets from the chalk mound we played a game of Indians. We had made bows and arrows that would shoot over the Butts so we used to have two people on the top with bows and arrows firing at the rest of us hiding in the moat like area that surrounded the base.

This bottom area also had large bushes so that it was difficult for those on top to shoot at us whereas those on top were fully exposed. The oldest in the group nearly always insisted that the youngest had to be on top of the Butts since they had virtually no protection from those firing from below.

In order to make the arrows fly straighter we would wrap the point with electrical copper wire and then wrap black electrical tape or white adhesive surgical tape around the wire in the hope that it would be less damaging if you were hit. But you'd still have a nice round bruise the following day. It's a miracle that none of us suffered any serious injury..

We also used to visit the Norman and Saxon pits between Brooks Road and Cherry Hinton. One of the big dares was to travel through the small tunnel connecting the two pits since you were in total darkness for most of the way. Several years later I went fishing in the Saxon pit with my father hoping to catch the monster pike that was purported to be lurking in the waters"

If the current plans go ahead, perhaps others will enjoy a spot of – legitimate – fishing at 'Romsey Beach'

Memories 29th April 2013 by Mike Petty

Keeping warm has been a problem through the ages and for many years the principal source of heat in the home was coal. But how did it get to the grate?

Initially coal was transported to Cambridge down the Cam in horse-drawn barges and offloaded at coal yards beside Magdalene and Silver Street bridges. However the arrival of the railway in 1845 meant it became possible to carry greater quantities to supply the increasing needs of an expanding town. Major enterprises such as the Gas Company constructed sidings at Coldham's Lane from which a fleet of vehicles conveyed coal to the gasworks and some families went with barrows or old prams to collect coke for their homes.

By 1904 there were some 25 coal merchants listed in the Cambridge Street Directory. They included Austin & Company, Patrick Beales, Coote and Warren, Arthur Swann and J.O. Vinter whose horse-drawn carts or motor lorries delivered sacks of coal to individual households

In 1953 the now combined firm of Austin Beales opened a new coal depot on a piece of waste ground off Clarendon Road, beside Hills Road Railway Bridge. Here coal arrived by railway wagons and was unloaded by a crane or 'Jumbo' into hoppers or direct onto lorries using electrically-controlled conveyors to reduce the heavy, dirty process of filling sacks by hand. Within a decade 45,000 tons of different types of house and industrial coal, coke & smokeless fuel was arriving each week to be delivered by a fleet of lorries to domestic and commercial customers around Cambridge.

But times moved on and the development of oil-fuelled heating brought new challenges to the suppliers. Initially heating oil was fetched from the Mobil refinery by a fleet of tanker lorries but as demand continued to grow Austin Beales and Coote and Warren added a new fuel oil terminal to their yard in 1961, making it the most modern coal/oil distribution centre in Europe.

The oil arrived from the Mobil refinery at Coryton by rail in 5,000 gallon tankers and was discharged into three main storage tanks. Soon the number of deliveries increased until trains were arriving at the siding every night to be unloaded and sent off before the morning rush. Yet more trundled in during the day. As demand increased the firm constructed more storage tanks each holding 131,000 gallons of different types, including 'Medium' fuel oil which had to be kept heated by a boiler to ensure the thick heavy oil remained fluid enough to pump out into insulated tanker vehicles.

Such a complex organisation required an office staff to ensure it ran smoothly. And that is where John Poole of Comberton came in. He started at the firm in 1952, aged 22, and worked there until his retirement. John took great interest in the technical details and, as a talented amateur photographer, built up a wonderful pictorial record of the site and its activities.

His pictures show two of the first tankers. He points out that the headboards were interchangeable since they delivered for other companies, thus sometimes they read 'Coote and Warren' or Ridleys Fuels. Those names disappeared as they became part of the Charrington Group

John snapped the construction of new storage tanks and loading bays, the long lines of rail tankers waiting to be emptied, the engineers and the men who worked alongside him behind the scenes.

Inevitably accidents happened; there were derailments, spillages and on one occasion men were cutting redundant pipe work when some oil ran out and caught fire, quickly spreading to a contractor's lorry. Firemen were soon on the scene to quell the blaze – and John was there with his camera to record it.

But it is his views over the site towards the old Foster's Mill at the station that gives some impression of the scale of an enterprise which might otherwise have disappeared largely without trace.

Dear Mr Petty

I phoned Chris Elliot concerning the Charringtons coal oil depot Clarendon Road Cambridge, in the memories section on Monday the 29th of April 2013, and he told me to drop you a line. It brought back many happy memories and I am the driver standing in front of the newer tanker. I worked for Charringtons for over 30 years and I could write a book on all the things that happened, some of them unbelievable. I'd just like to add, John Poole was the best manager you could wish to work for.

I would be pleased to talk to you if you would like to contact me this is my landline number 01353 664020.

Kind regards

Memories 6th May 2013 by Mike Petty

Last Wednesday's News reported how parents and children have been anxiously waiting to see whether they have gained a place at the school of their choice. That very afternoon I met Ivy Jude, a lady who had first-hand experience of that issue. For she had been one of the children who turned up at her village school, day after day, only to be sent home again.

Just 75 years ago, in 1938, parents and children at Meldreth School went on strike. The dispute started after the County Council ruled that 21 pupils over 11 years of age should transfer from Meldreth Council School to the school at Melbourn.

To get there the children would face a journey of anything up to ten or twelve miles a day in all weathers, passing a dangerous corner, parents complained. However old inhabitants recalled the time when there had been no Council School in the village, and all the children had gone to Melbourn. One lad used to walk daily from Hauxton, six miles distant, and another, Charlie Hart, came from Barrington, 4½ miles away

Eighty protestors packed a meeting presided over by Mr. Hubert Ellis and decided to fight. They had an excellent head in Miss Grace Butler, and her two uncertified staff, Miss Rose Pearce and the infant teacher. Meldreth School had always turned out good, clean, honest and straightforward workers.

But as the County Council had decided to remove the older children they'd reduced her staff and Miss Butler felt she could not on her own do justice to the children whose ages ranged from eight to 13. Their capabilities were so different that they would not progress. She would be sad if the older ones had to go to Melbourn but it was for their good. Even now the older boys and girls went there one afternoon a week for instruction in woodwork or cookery.

Mr H.W. Dainty agreed: theirs was an elementary school and although the children could be taught reading, writing and arithmetic, this was now a scientific age; what chance would Meldreth children have in life against those from other villages? His arguments were downed in shouts of disapproval.

Hubert Ellis, chairman of the Parish Council, had been one of the Managers when Meldreth School opened in 1910 with space for 120 children. He greatly enjoyed fighting for what he believed to be right and was convinced that no child could be compelled to go to another school if he could learn reading, writing and arithmetic at the one he was attending. Anything beyond that was optional.

There had been a new Education Act in 1936 but did not come into force until September 1939. In the meantime their children should be taught in the village until the age of 14 and competent teachers employed. After all they were paying their rates.

So parents continued to send their older children to the school; the head took their names, but did not let them in. Ivy was one of those who went each morning, then once registered, turned round and came back home. Miss Butler was not allowed to teach her and anyway the county had moved the desks to Melbourn

Various resolutions were passed which were sent to the Board of Education, the Education Committee and the local Member of Parliament demanding that "proper education be given to our children in our own village." They even started to plan for a private school for the children concerned to open after Easter. The parents would, of course, have to pay for the children's education.

A deputation from the County Education Committee, together with Melbourn and Meldreth school managers, called a meeting to discuss the issue. But passions were inflamed when Mr. Ellis, who had presided at past protests, was not invited to attend. The parents, who turned up in full force, sent for him but he was refused admission by Education Secretary Henry Morris. The Press were also refused entry, and this was a cause of further dissatisfaction.

After the meeting, one of the parents, Mr. T. Meikle, told a reporter "They asked us to try sending our children to Melbourn for 12 months, and they would meet the parents at the end of that period to see if everything was working all right. We refused and told them we were going to keep our children from school unless they could remain at Meldreth. We told them they could send us to prison if they like."

In May 1938 parents were summonsed before Melbourn Magistrates and, despite the arguments of Mr Ellis, were ordered to send their children to school forthwith. As Meldreth

School had been closed to children over 11 years old by an order approved by the Board of Education, it could not be deemed a 'suitable school' within the meaning of the Act.

The parents were given a chance to choose which other school their children would attend, but only two had any suggestions to make. Ivy together with the children of Stanley Wing, Richard Lockwood, Harry Jacklin, Charles Plumb, Frank Course and the others were ordered to go to Melbourn School. However the charges against Stanley Wing, Frank Course and Cornelius Dash were withdrawn – their children had reached school leaving age of 14 and were free to leave.

Hubert Ellis challenged the ruling through the courts but eventually lost his case. Although his initial fight had made him the most popular man in Meldreth his protracted legal actions were expensive and various village events had to be organised to pay the costs.

But Meldreth folk still remember their battle with bureaucracy, a fight that has been fought by other parents in other villages ever since.

Memories 13th May 2013 by Mike Petty

As I entered the Afghan compound I was charged at by a demented shape in a woollen coat and only through the greatest fortune did I escape being left sprawling on the bloody, bullet-littered ground.

But how had the intruder entered what should have been a secure area? Incredibly in the middle of a restricted military complex, somebody had left the gate open. And nor was that invader alone, she had brought members of her family with her, one of whom causing consternation even after the main threat had been removed. Fortunately it was just a lamb who eventually responded to repeated efforts to encourage it to regain the flock in the open grassland just feet away from the 'native' buildings

All this happened last week, just across the county border in Norfolk where, in the days when invasion had seemed imminent, the small communities around West Tofts had played their part in the Second World War by packing their belongings and leaving the villages they had called home.

Since then it has been part of the Army's battle training area where different facilities have been constructed to give troops an insight into the conditions they would face for real when they are deployed to various areas of conflict. The surrounding thousands of acres of rolling countryside are dotted with crashed helicopters and wrecked tanks together with churches which are carefully preserved and some of the original buildings, their thatch roofs now replaced by corrugated iron and transformed from family homes to military checkpoints or forward observation points

The visit had been arranged by the Waterbeach Village Society amongst whom was Jim Swainland who has passed to me a souvenir of the Diamond Jubilee of Queen Victoria in June 1897. Cambridge had celebrated the occasion by singing the National Anthem on Parker's Piece, a cyclists' lantern parade, a salute of 60 maroons, flight of 1,000 pigeons, sports on Midsummer Common and a procession of flower-decorated carriages in Queen's Road. It concluded with a water carnival on the river between Walnut Tree Lane and Jesus Locks, a great bonfire and a gigantic display of fireworks.

But the programme had to be paid for, and it is the advertisements which capture something of the commerce of that time. They include a cluster of traders in Fitzroy Street: G.P. Hawkins, pastrycook and confectioner, baker of fancy bread and biscuits, William Thompson, the cheapest for furniture and bedding or mangles and wringers, while ladies were encouraged to take their hair combings to Cartwright's who would transform them into swishes for just half-a-crown.

In King Street W. Robinson made travelling trunks and children's mail carts while H. Rooke and George Smith were house decorators and sanitary plumbers and M. Smooty a greengrocer. St Andrew's Street advertisers included Barton the tailors, Rawlings' British and Foreign Cigar Warehouse and Alphonso Smith, a boot and shoe maker. Alphonso was obvious a man for adventure for he later ascended to the heavens in the 'Enchantress' balloon on August 7th 1911, landing at Exning one hour later.

On Mill Road George Bailey was a stone, marble and granite monumental mason on the corner of Covent Garden – examples of his work are doubtless to be found in the nearby cemetery. There were two cycle sellers, Woolston & Sons and H.J. Storey, maker of the 'Ruby' Cycles, whose advertisement depicts an elephant seated on one of his 'Jumbo' bikes.

It would be great to have more details of these men who were once such an important part of local life.

Now the Heritage Lottery Fund has backed a two-year project to document the Mill Road area. It is being launched with a display at the Playhouse Cinema, currently the Sally Anne's charity shop, which opens today and runs till 25th May. If you are able to assist, or have things that should be recorded then contact the Mill Road History Project, email millroadhistoryproject@gmail.com

A News' photograph of the early 1980s shows a greengrocers shop across the bridge in Romsey Town, looking somewhat different to one we saw in the battle area. And although cycling elephants may not be a regular feature of Mill Road today, the area has had its experience of errant animals as a correspondent to the paper in September 1903 recorded:

Sir – last evening I met three horses running loose and apparently unattended along Mill Road. Some distance behind them two men were being dragged along by a young horse which they were evidently trying to 'break in'. Carts, cycles and other users of the road overtaking them had to slow down until they could dash past & foot passengers had to seek safety in doorways. These things ought not to be allowed in our streets

Memories 20 May 2013 by Mike Petty

Coronation Street was once part of Cambridge's 'Royalty Square' connecting with George IV Street, Prince's Street and Queen Street.

It had started life as part of the New Town that grew up on the west side of Hills Road following the enclosure of the Barnwell open fields in 1807. The names have strong Regal connection but need to be put in the context of the time

Before his accession George IV had been Prince Regent during the madness of his father, George III. He'd married Caroline of Brunswick in 1785 but their relationship was not an easy one. He accused her of adultery and left her for a Mrs Fitzherbert. When George succeeded to the throne in 1820 he tried to prevent Caroline from attending his Coronation at Westminster Abbey. Many Cambridge people believed 'Queen' Caroline had been badly treated and there were town and gown riots on Market Hill with 250 special constables sworn in to try and keep the peace. Although the University voted a loyal address they also voiced their detestation of infidelity.

Over the years various readers have recalled their memories of the area.

Jim Langford was born in Coronation Street in September 1921 and spent many happy years of his early life there, he recalled in March 2008: "I would often be sent to the snug at the Ship pub to fetch my grandmother a jug of ale". Across the road stood St Paul's Institute, which he used to attend and where he threw fireworks in the reading room. The street was lit with gas lamps: "I would wait eagerly for the gas man to come and light them. When he arrived on his bicycle he would use a long steel pole which he poked through a flap under the lamp at its base and light the mantle above. If I was lucky or near enough I was allowed to operate the trigger and do the job for him", he wrote.

"On the same side of the street there were various shops: Daisly and Stubbs, general stores, Maskels the barber, Gillingham who sold hardware, firelighters and coal, Barbers joinery and undertakers. I could write much more but I am sure it would bore the pants off you", he'd added.

One of the great characters was Albert Craske, who had a muffin and crumpet bakery. In November 1980 Mrs Clare Driver, one of his daughters, recalled that he'd set up after the Great War. It was hard work; muffins were made of a dough, crumpets from batter. They were all mixed by hand so they had to be up at four in the morning to beat the mixture. Muffins and crumpets were supplied to all the Cambridge colleges, several cake shops and to places as far afield as March and Chatteris, to which Albert travelled by train. He was also given patronage by the Prince of Wales who became Edward VII. Apparently he had sampled some of these muffins on a visit to Cambridge, liked them so much that, when he came racing, Albert sent a supply to Newmarket by bicycle!

His wife, Harriet, was on call to anyone in trouble, the dying, those in labour at child birth, the sick - people used to come and knock the door at all hours of the day or night asking for her help.

In February 1983 a News reporter visited the Jug and Bottle at the Panton Arms where a tight knot of locals were wont to congregate in deep discussion. She chatted to two of the older residents. Frederick Christian and his wife Alice recalled when it used to be a real community with two breweries, three pubs, a general store, hardware shop, tailor's and a greengrocer's.

Small houses with pretty cottage gardens lined the street and the inhabitants knew each other's business in the nicest possible way. It was all families in those days – some with two, three, four or five children. “We knew everybody. You really did know people, although we were not in and out of each others’ houses much, Mr Christian told her.

Change came when the council demolished ‘Royalty Square’ and rehoused residents in new blocks of flats in the 1960s. More work bulldozed the Victorian streetscape into the twentieth century and by 1983 it was one of the most modern-looking in Cambridge.

Now current residents of the area are seeking to recreate some of the old spirit by organising a party to emulate that staged on Coronation Day, 1953. It will be held at St Paul’s Church, Hills Road, on Saturday 1st June from 2-5 pm. There will be people dressed in ‘50s clothes, period games such as Pin the Tail on the Donkey and even fish paste sandwiches.

A prime attraction will be a wonderful series of photographs showing the scene in Coronation Street 60 years ago. They would love to put names to some of the faces. Were you one, do you recognise somebody

Flora Falanaki from Auckland, New Zealand has emailed me a photo of a group of Officer Cadets that was taken by Thomas Stearn of Cambridge in 1917

It shows her grandfather, Albert Victor Waitford (later changed to Waetford) on the 3rd row down, looking to his left. On the lower right-hand side he has recorded handwritten a note to his parents dated 5.7.1917.

Flora will be visiting Cambridge in September and would like to visit the actual place where it was taken ffalanaki@orcon.net.nz

The Garrison (22nd) Officer Cadet Battalion was formed in December 1916 with its headquarters at Westcott House, Jesus Lane. Companies were accommodated in Jesus, Sidney Sussex, Magdalene, Gonville and Caius and Trinity Hall colleges.

Albert was part of the Maori Pioneer Battalion and later wrote about his wartime experiences in a article published in his local paper, The Wanganui Chronicle. Amongst the others in the photograph is Rikihana Carkeek who went on to publish 'Home Little Maori Home, A Memoir of the Maori Contingent 1914-1916'. Flora visited and spoke to his 77 year old daughter Nellie Carkeek in Otaki, New Zealand, a few days ago.

Albert may also have met John Lawton who went to Magdalene College as an Officer Cadet in January 1917. Whilst there he penned letters which were published by his son, Ray Lawton of Cottenham in 2001 under the title "A soldier writes home – John Lawton's wartime letters"

John recorded: "Our College is a magnificent old pile with many fine traditions. The Cadets here are collected from all parts of the United Kingdom & from nearly every regiment in the British Army. The majority of them are N.C.O.'s, but some of them belong to the R.A.M.C., & do not know much drill. They are all very nice & pukah gentlemen"

Their daily routine started with roll call at 7.30 am and progressed through physical training, drill, map reading, engineering and trench digging lectures till bed at 10.15

But as well as learning to be soldiers, they had to learn to be officers and gentlemen: "We are treated as officers all the way through & are to behave ourselves generally as 'cadets & gentlemen'". They mixed with the few undergraduates left in the college – invariably public-school boys - & every evening they dined in Hall with the Dons. The table was covered thick with plate emblazoned with the college arms & lighted by innumerable red-shaded candles.

A Latin Grace was said and then all that one could hear was the tinkle of silver & the subdued murmur of conversation. It was a memory that was to last, for John Lawton survived the war, trained as a teacher and obtained his first headship at Dry Drayton School in 1927.

There were practicalities to be considered: "We have to provide ourselves with cadet uniform. However the usual procedure is to buy better cloth & to have it made into officers' uniform so that it will be ready for us when we get gazetted. Otherwise we shall have to discard the ordinary cadet uniform in a few months time & that would be a waste of money. We are all practically certain of getting our commission: in the last two classes only one chap failed to pass the final exam, and even he got his commission" Given the slaughter in the trenches officers were badly needed at the front

The contrast between the peace of Cambridge and the horrors of the trenches was captured in a poem of 1918 by Alan Mackintosh of the Seaford Highlanders. After being gassed at the Front he taught bombing to the Cambridge cadets for eight months and became engaged to Sylvia Marsh, daughter of a Quaker family. They planned to make their home in New Zealand when it was all over. It was not to be: Alan returned to his Regiment and was shot through the head shortly afterwards..

In a poem entitled 'Cambridge' he'd written

Here there is peace and easy living,
And a warm fire when the rain is driving,
There is no sound of strong men striving,
Here where the quiet waters flow,
But I am hearing the bullets ringing,
Hearing the great shells onward winging,
The dead men's voices are singing, singing,
And I must rise and go.

Back to the trench that I see so clearly,
Back to the fight I can see so nearly,
Back to the friends that I love so dearly,
The dead men lying amid the dew,

The droning sound of the great shells flying,
Filth and honour, and pain, and dying
Dead friends of mine, oh, cease your crying,
For I come back to you.

The Cadets recorded their own experiences in various souvenir publications copies of which are housed in the Cambridgeshire Collection at Cambridge Central Library. Some include the autographs of the men for whom a Cambridge Education was a brief period of peace before a return to the horror of war. It will be a first stopping-point for Flora when she makes her way here in September.

Dear Mike

Thank you so much for being able to publish our story along with other documented accounts from that time – it is fascinating that these accounts could be published together after so many years. I have spoken to my Mum and she is so pleased that when we visit we’ll be a little bit closer to where her father trained nearly 100 years ago. We will let you know what information comes through.

Before visiting Cambridge on Wednesday 18th September, on Tuesday 17th we plan to go to the Commonwealth War Grave of my husband David’s great-grandfather Pvt Filitoua (service no. 16/1046), from Niue Island who was part of the Maori Pioneer battalion WWI, buried at Hornchurch (St Andrew) Churchyard, Essex 19 June 1916, and then on Saturday 21st September, my grand uncle Eugene Waetford – who is my grandfather Albert

Victor's 1st cousin (service no. 16/1297) at Longuenesse (St Omer) Souvenir Cemetery, Pas-de-Calais, France.

The Auckland War Memorial Museum sent us the attached Scroll which contains the signature of the Pioneer (Maori) Battalion and was presented to the ships captain at the time. Albert Victor's signature is 9th down from the 1st column in the closer picture.

Interestingly Albert Victor was named after his uncle Albert Victor Pomare who was the first Maori born in England and was the son of Hare & Hariata Pomare and became the godson of Queen Victoria – he was born around 1864. I have also attached the photo of myself (on the right) and Nellie Carkeek holding the original photograph.

Thank you once again.

Recent television programmes focussing on Votes for Women cause me to reflect on what was happening locally.

Generally the struggle for the Parliamentary vote was conducted in Cambridge and the neighbouring villages by serious political lobbying, torchlight processions and debate. Such meetings usually passed peacefully though occasionally there were protests, some of them rowdy.

Cambridge's early experience of more disruptive protestors came in December 1907 when ladies shouted 'Votes for Women' as the War Minister left a meeting in the town. The following November a reporter described a 'very exciting' incident when a struggling female had to be carried out of a meeting - they would soon find out that Cambridge was not a congenial place for this sort of activity, the paper commented.

However the ladies were not to be ignored: 1910 saw a visit from the leading militant, Mrs Emmeline Pankhurst, who was greeted with hostile demonstrations. Next year a local minister's wife was arrested during a suffragette raid on the House of Commons and women walked the streets of Cambridge to avoid being counted on census night.

In 1912 a large crowd gathered when a militant suffragist spoke from the back of a lorry as it made its way across Parker's Piece – pushed from one side to the other by a large crowd of unruly youths. The Conservative Women's Franchise Association was formed, and the University Men's League for Women's Suffrage lobbied on their behalf but it was the suffragettes that hit the headlines.

They disrupted a garden party at Magdalene College, landed by boat at St Johns College to paint the gates purple, green and white before daubing "Votes for Women" on the stone work, and generally caused such mayhem that Colleges closed their gates during the Long Vacation.

Women even tried to set fire to the Varsity rugby pavilion – or did they? It was claimed that an improvised bomb had been found in a mustard tin with, nearby, a 'Votes for Women' card and a lady's shoe she'd – apparently - left when dashing away from the scene. However several of the 'suffragette' outrages were later confirmed as undergraduate hoaxes

There was no dispute of one act of incendiarism. Early one Saturday morning in May 1913 two plain clothed policemen spotted smoke coming from newly-built houses in Storeys Way. The new motor fire engine roared off from St Andrews street, followed shortly afterwards by the firemen, some cycling, some running and some riding in a covered van. They were too late to save the home of a widow lady, Mrs Spencer. Flames had quickly spread to the upper rooms and roof, leaving the £1,150 house a charred shell

The adjacent property being built for H.A. Roberts of Gonville and Caius had resisted attempts to set light to it. However the newly appointed Professor of Genetics was not so fortunate. There was no sign of fire when the brigade arrived at his house but very shortly afterwards flames were spotted and damage caused to a staircase and some woodwork.

Detective Sergeant Marsh was set on the case. He discovered somebody had broken in through the study window, poured paraffin over sawdust and packing cases and set them on fire. There were three clues: bloodstains from broken glass, footprints and a ladies gold watch. On Wednesday he travelled to Norwich and arrested a schoolteacher.

The accused, Miss Miriam Pratt, was an active Suffragette. She admitted being in Cambridge on the evening in question and she had a fresh wound on her hand. The crucial evidence was the watch, a present from her uncle, a Norwich policeman. She was convicted and sentenced to 18 months hard labour but went on hunger strike and was released in October.

When women were accorded the parliamentary vote in 1928 the Cambridge Committee for Equal Citizenship celebrated with a meeting at Newnham College. Invitations were sent out to all members of the Cambridge Women's Suffrage Association to meet Dame Millicent Fawcett, one of the most prominent fighters in their cause. She had been one of those attending the inaugural meeting of the Women's Suffrage Association in Cambridge in 1888 along with the Mayor and Vice Chancellor. Sadly she was unable to attend but those present recalled their part in the struggle, the battles they had fought with undergraduates and the support they'd received from certain University dons.

One of the most militant of the suffragettes spent her latter years living quietly in a local village. Miss Mary Richardson had slashed the famous Rokeby Venus in the National Gallery as a protest against the imprisonment of their leader Mrs Pankhurst, she'd planted a bomb which practically demolished a new railway station at Birmingham and set fire to a big uninhabited country house. Mary served many sentences in Holloway and wrote a book about her experiences called 'Laugh a Defiance'. She settled at Castle Camps intending to keep ducks 'to provide birds for the tables of the Cambridge colleges'. But her heart failed her when it came to killing them and in the end there were over three hundred birds running free.

Do you have other stories of militant or more peaceful struggles by Cambridgeshire women that should be added to the history books. Write to Mike Petty at the News

Memories 10 June 2013 by Mike Petty

The recent discovery at Whittlesey of a number of Bronze Age boats that had been abandoned centuries ago on the edge of watercourses is nothing new. Ely historian John Titterton painted a picture of one such craft found in the fens near Manea in the 1880s: "she came up when the fen was drained. Grandfather pecked her to pieces".

Antiquarians might lament such destruction, but once such craft are removed from their watery graves they will crumble away without specialist, expensive, conservation. More recently such a fate has overtaken the wooden remains of fenland lighters discovered in various fenland backwaters.

Originally pulled by horses they were later towed by steam tugs such as the Olga and Nellie. These were joined on the river about 1900 by the 'Nancy', a steam driven barge which plied between Kings Lynn and Cambridge carrying whatever cargo she could, principally timber and bricks, until 1914. It was then towed to near Ely railway bridge to be cut up for scrap. But the work proved too expensive and she was left to rot until the 1940's. Then when the Ouse was widened Ted Appleyard dug a hole on the Babylon site, dragged Nancy out of the water and dumped her in it. She was rediscovered in 1981 during excavation work on a new marina

Nancy II, a successor 70-foot long steel diesel-driven barge from Holland, was brought by Cambridge boat builders H.C. Banham in 1927 to carry goods along the fenland waterways, unloading at the Pike & Eel. The River Cam Conservators were approached to make the river navigable up to the Quayside near Magdalene Bridge. This would involve dredging but they had recently taken a lot of trouble to make Jesus Green a beauty spot and would not sanction the mud being placed on the grass. Nancy II was taken out of service after nine months: she was really too big to pass through the locks and the tall chimney made it difficult to squeeze under the bridges on the tidal section of the river.

An older craft, the Viscountess Bury, is still fondly recalled. A pleasure boat originally powered by 200 storage batteries, she was on charter to the Prince of Wales for four seasons. It then became a public passenger launch plying the Thames until acquired by H.C. Banham in 1910 and brought around the East coast to the Cam. Here it gave pleasure trips to numerous groups and individuals including a young A.F. (Bill) Leach who in 1911 paid his sixpence to take a voyage down to Clayhithe, admiring the bright varnish and polished brass of what had once been described as "the largest electric launch in the world".

Bill became a school teacher with an abiding love for things mechanical. In 1926 he discovered an old steam boat capsized and sunk beneath a boat builder's shop. It was the first of a number of craft that he was to restore. For twenty years this relic of a bygone age could be seen steaming up the river, a dirty, stinking old thing to some, a source of unmitigated delight to its owner who renamed her 'Kathleen' after his wife. But finally the hull was just too weak for the choppy waters of the Cam.

One day Bill was in Banham's boatyard when someone called in with a steam engine in the boot of his car. It had come from a tender called 'Artemis', which was being converted to a motor boat. Bill journeyed to an Essex creek where he discovered an elegant little boat built of teak and cedar. He acquired the hull and machinery on the spot and arranged its transfer to Cambridge. There it was restored by Banhams Boatyard and the engine reinstated.

This remarkable survivor of a bygone age is still gracing the Cam well maintained by the craftsmen at Two Tees boatyard, Chesterton and with a new steam boiler soon to be installed will hopefully be around for many years to come. But just as it comes on to the market, so does the yacht for which it was originally made as tender over a century ago.

‘Artemis’, a 94 ton racing yawl, was built in 1899 at the Summers & Payne yard in Southampton, famous for beautiful racing yachts. She participated in races right up until 1938 but during WW II was laid up as a house boat in West Mersea and her lead keel melted down for bullets. In 1994 what remained of the once-elegant yacht was sold and shipped to Germany where after an extensive refit she was brought back under sail in 2008. But planking below the waterline was found to have been infested by a fungus during her long period in the back waters of the Essex marshes. Repairs were started, but it all proved too big a job and she is up for sale at an asking price of 350,000 Euros.

History will show which survives longest, the yacht or her tender. And will the Bronze-age boats abandoned centuries ago now outlive them all.

Memories 17th June 2013 by Mike Petty

Last week an intrepid group of historians from March Museum journeyed deep into southern Cambridgeshire to see what may be the oldest fenman in the world.

He rests on a pew in Balsham church, carved with care some 750 years ago. The figure is kneeling and wearing a pleated ‘cotte’, cloak or kilt; his left hand is holding a dog on a leash and he has stilts strapped to his legs.

Then it was on to the remarkable, and largely forgotten Roman burial mounds at Bartlow. Several were removed by the railway as they constructed their track to others had been flattened by a farmer in the 1830s to release land for agriculture. There were other excavations in following decades. At that time rumours had spread about finds of glass urns, human ashes, a gold ring and various beakers dating back to the Roman times. And in each one there was also a large iron-bound locked wooden chest. Work was stopped until a group of academics and clergy had gathered. They watched while the ancient boxes were opened to reveal a glass vessel filled with the cremated ashes of a single body together with flower petals, incense that still smelt of frankincense or myrrh and bottles containing wine mixed with honey, and blood and milk. But the oddest thing of all had been a folding iron chair with a seat of leather straps.

Now the mounds stand hidden in trees, which are extending to the ancient slopes themselves, and nettles are growing up among the steep flight of steps that can be climbed to the impressive heights

But alongside lies a mansion whose peaceful gardens were scene of conflict in 1806 between the village parson and the University Professor of Anatomy.

The Rev Joseph Hall had lived in harmony in his peaceful parish since 1782. Then Professor Busick Harwood became tenant of Bartlow Hall alongside and decided to divert a footpath that ran across his grounds, moving it somewhat nearer the rectory. The Rector objected, saying it would encourage people to look into his garden. But Harwood moved it anyway. He also planted trees and erected unsightly fences which obstructed the view from the parson’s windows. Then – according to the rector – he strung up a skeleton to provide him with an alternative prospect.

At this rector was prompted to vent his spleen in a letter, adding: “Schemes of reprisal have been shewn to me, one of which is calculated to destroy the beauty of your grounds; but I cannot imitate your example. If ever you should be in want of bread, I will have no difficulty in denying it to you”.

Things deteriorated and the matter went to court. The Professor agreed that he had erected a skeleton but claimed it was there to frighten thieves who had robbed his garden. And anyway he'd taken it down the next day – given the shortage of bodies for anatomists to work on a skeleton was too valuable an object to be hung in a garden. The court came to its conclusion and fined the Rector as a punishment.

Bartlow is just over the border in Essex and so the remarkable dispute is not featured in a new book on historic Cambridge gardens.

But the story of nearby Horseheath Hall whose grounds were initially landscaped in the 1660s and changed eight years later is illustrated with an estate plan giving a glimpse of a now-forgotten grandeur. The owner in the 1770s had a taste for extravagant living and was soon in debt; the house was stripped of its furniture and the plants auctioned off. Later the mansion was demolished and even a newly-erected greenhouse sold. Today almost all of the parkland has been ploughed up.

The study by Professor Timothy Mowl and Dr Laura Mayer records the achievements of others to create peaceful havens, be they the grand works of Capability Brown or the lost gardens of Humphry Repton, University college gardens or the smaller oases of peace surrounding Village Colleges or private homes. It is an essential addition to the shelves of any garden-lover

The Ministry of Defence has now released the last of its official logs of Unidentified Flying Objects, covering sightings from 1997 to November 2009 when they closed down their UFO Hotline

Locally there are no dramatic claims of alien abductions though the log includes sightings of a long, thick, red streak which shot across the sky at Huntingdon at 20.56 on 11th February 2008. There was a silver ball of light attached to the front of it. It was rather large. The ball then got bigger and burst, they report

In August 2009 a Retired merchant seaman saw glider like objects in the sky flying around in an anti-clockwise direction at Hauxton. In November that year, just before seven in the morning, a Haddenham observer saw a large bright white light; there was no trailing light ray ground-wards and no sound or vibration, so it was not a police helicopter or aircraft heading for Mildenhall. Then in April 2007 fifty objects, each with a single orange light gathered over Duxford before ascending directly upwards.

Now mysterious lights in the night sky are probably Chinese Lanterns which have been blamed for starting fires in trees or killing grazing cattle who come across them in the fields.

There have been confirmed reports from previous centuries. In 1785 an old man and a boy witnessed an apparition that descended from the heavens into the field in which they were working near Soham. The lad fled, his companion stood his ground - too scared to move; then seeing the shape appearing motionless he approached it - "In the name of the Father, Son and Holy Ghost, what are you, speak and tell me" ... Reassured, he put it over his shoulder and carried it into the village – probably telling increasingly enhanced tales of how he had slain the fire-breathing dragon.

Others have reported seeing flying horses – but these reports were true. Mr Green senior, a celebrated balloonist made an ascent from Cambridge on horseback – or so an 1829 handbill claims. As he drifted over the countryside people looked up from their cottage gardens and watched as things descended from the basket to the ground beneath. Those keen on roses went running out. What they found were mice on parachutes!

In June 1909 there was such concern about unidentified flying objects that a postcard was produced depicting Sawston folk watching the skies. There were reports that an unknown airship whose nocturnal wanderings in East Anglia had caused such a sensation had been seen in Downham Fen. Other people observed something heading in the direction of Littleport while William Lack stated that when he was in Taylor's Lane, Swavesey, at 2.30 am, he saw a large object in the sky. It had a strong light at its head and another at its tail and appeared to be passing towards Huntingdon. However a police constable, who was patrolling at the same time, saw nothing of the apparition

In October 1913 a flying object came down in Eddy Read's field near Sutton Gault. This was not unidentified: it was an advertising blimp with 'Give her Bovril' on its envelope. But a couple of years later there was a more threatening presence in the clouds. In September 1915 a German Zeppelin crossed the coast between King's Lynn and Terrington St. Clement before following the railway to Downham Market. There the commander made a mistake in navigation and followed the Bedford Level, instead. When he was over Mepal he realized that he was off course and dropped a flare, startling villagers, who had been disturbed by the engines of the prowling Zeppelin and had come out to see if they could spot her. The light of the flare showed him his error and he crossed the branch line running west to St. Ives and Huntingdon, passed Haddenham and Histon, crossed the north-west sector of Cambridge and continued his bombing raid on London.

More recently in October 1985 students at Cambridge's Magdalene College were woken by the sound of something scraping over the roof. It was the steel cable of a wartime barrage balloon that had broken away from R.A.F. Cardington carrying weather instruments. It had dragged its wire rope thirty miles across country before becoming hooked on scaffolding. The College was evacuated whilst it was winched to the ground.

They were right to be worried. For in September 1940 a large barrage balloon had drifted over Cambridge when its trailing cable threw a wireless pole through the roof of a house in Mill Road. The interior of the house was not damaged and nobody was injured. The balloon then gained height and drifted in the direction of Teversham where the cable struck an old chimney stack at Teversham Hall before it shot up into the air and continued in an easterly direction. Telephone wires were damaged and the electricity supply affected for a time.

But there was a tragic side to the story: a 60-year-old platelayer, named as Daniel Dunston, was working on the railway between Mill Road and Coldham's Lane bridge when he was caught by the trailing wire and carried up into the air for a distance of over 30 yards before being dropped, sustaining fatal injuries.

Do you have tales of unexplained aerial sightings? The Government's files may now be closed but the News would be happy to hear them

Memories 1st July 2013 by Mike Petty

Last Thursday Stretham was awakened from its customary post-lunch calm by the boom of explosions. Looking out of their windows villagers were greeted by the sight of a massive, black cloud of smoke obscuring the afternoon sky over Top Street

Something was obviously very wrong. Beyond the windmill, just across the A10, some of the industrial units in what was formerly a farmyard, were blazing furiously. Police closed the roads as wailing sirens heralded the approach of fire engines while the flames burned fiercely. It was a frightening reminder of the power of fire. But it was not the first time that lesson had been learned

On May Day 1844 came what the Cambridge Chronicle newspaper reported as: "One of the most awful fires which it was ever our province to record. The destruction of property is enormous ... houses have been razed to the ground, including habitations of wealthy agriculturalists and humble labourers.

The fire started at Mr John Wesley's blacksmith's shop in Read's Street. Although at first just a small fire it spread with great speed to the adjoining farmyard and from there along the street. In little more than one hour 25 homes were ablaze. The thatched buildings and farmyards were tinder dry and nothing could be done to check the flames.

People who thought their own premises safe and went to help others found to their horror that they too were burnt out. Some lost 'every chip and every rag, save the garments they happened to have on at the time'.

On the south side of Top Street the fire destroyed the property of John Wesley blacksmith & Mr Boulentaft the miller. Farmer William Wright lost his barns and stacks, though his house was saved. Mr S. Coy, farmer, lost his house barns, outbuildings, stacks and stock, Mr I Murfitt his house, furniture, barns etc as did Mr Lester, a butcher, Mr Jackson & S.Wright. Mr Philips, a baker, lost his house and 'in fact every thing'. There were six families in almshouses who were burnt out, along with John Wheeler, a shoemaker & brewer before the fire was checked on this side of the street at a cow-lodge belonging to Mr Hazel.

On the other side the victims were R. Wheeler - house and out-buildings, Mr Gibbons shoemaker who lost every thing, Mr Dimock, Mr Langford, a linen-draper - house, furniture, stock-in-trade. Mr J. Baxter, harness maker & J. Savidge, tailor also lost everything they possessed.

Mr T. Grainger, farmer, saw his barn, stables, every out-building and stock consumed. His barn was the largest in the county but nothing but the walls were left, and so intense was the heat that the brickwork seems in some places to have been almost molten. The house was saved. However Levi Langford, Mr Dring, a veterinary surgeon & Messrs Sennitt and Graves all lost their homes.

The desolation was heart-rending & the Church was made the receptacle of the furniture that could be saved. Those 30 families burnt out of house and home were looked after as well as could be, several taking shelter in the church until their premises could be rebuilt. The Rev Baber organised subscriptions for the relief of the suffering. It was estimated that damage between £15,000 and £20,000 had been caused.

Work commenced to rebuild. Some started from scratch. others added new bricks to the remains of the old properties. Several properties still have plaques bearing the date 1844, a reminder of the devastation of one day's events of 169 years ago. For years a long pole with a hook on the end hung on the wall of one of the village barns. It was used to pull the burning thatch from cottage roofs. Similar poles can still be seen in Needingworth, Linton and other villages.

It might have been worse: in 1844 the fire engine was rushed from Haddenham and thanks to their efforts, the paper reported, 'may be attributed the saving of the great part of the village'. Last Thursday appliances forced their way through traffic halted due to the smoke and flames that closed the Cambridge-Ely road and turned the sky black.

Other drivers were faced with lengthy diversions and extended journeys via Wilburton and Haddenham as they made their way home to Ely. But they too were fortunate. For today the road from Wilburton towards Stretham and Wicken is due to be closed for major resurfacing. Thank goodness it was not last week!

Memories 9th July 2013 by Mike Petty

It is one of my earliest memories. I was standing with my Nan in her garden, beside the hutch in which Grandad kept his ferrets. And the sky was filled with planes. It was a memory that returned last Sunday when a Lancaster bomber made sweeps over the former wartime airfield at Mepal. But what was the occasion?

Then – quiet out of the blue – Mike Bowyer, the expert on all things aeronautical – sent me the answer without me having asked the question. For he had seen the same thing. It was a rehearsal for the Coronation Review of the Royal Air Force 60 years ago.

Mike Bowyer writes:

Central Cambridge, lunch time, 9 June, 1953. From the north a thunderous roar approached, produced by 36 RAF Avro Lincoln bombers some from Upwood. Following came 11 Boeing Washingtons (RAF B-29s). A dozen Canberras – several from Bassingbourn - passed over a little later. Not since 1945 had so many aircraft been seen together over Cambridgeshire.

All were participants in the first of ten ever bigger practises held that month for the RAFs largest and most demanding fly-past ever undertaken. It was to end H.M the Queen's Coronation Review of the Royal Air Force, held at Odiham, Hampshire, on 15 July 1953.

At Duxford I watched much of the assembly of the last full practice. It involved 637 slow or fast, big or small aeroplanes, of which 440 were jet propelled. Included were five new Lockheed Neptunes from distant Kinloss which overflowed Cambridge before slotting in with other types heading westerly. Some 45 Lincolns half orbited before joining the ever lengthening procession. Then nearly 200 Meteor 8s, 36 Vampires and 24 Venoms arrived overhead.

Literally within seconds, hundreds of aircraft were slipping in to a 49 element parade. Meanwhile a not inconsiderable number of unwanted 'spare aircraft' were flying in the opposite direction. It was an amazing sight.

Vampire 5 trainers and Meteor 4s of 206 AFS Oakington, (a dozen of each) joined in along with 24 Meteor 8s of 64 and 65 Squadrons which formed the Duxford Wing together with 24 Meteors, of Nos 56 and 63 Squadrons from Waterbeach. Then from 2TAF in Germany, 24 of the RAFs 'new' F-86E Sabres raced off from Duxford over which, just momentarily, the sky seemed full of aircraft.

Living in Cambridge or nearby at the time, almost daily and for nearly a month one had 'the last chance' to see hundreds of RAF aeroplanes flying together. Disturbingly, like many of the 300 aircraft on the ground for Review, a high proportion were obsolete. One formation of 12 Airspeed Oxford pilot trainers included planes overhauled in wartime by Marshalls.

But Mike did not just glimpse the rehearsal: he was in at the event itself.

Starting the Fly-Past, a Sycamore rescue helicopter flew by at 98 mph. Incredibly precise timing made enormous demands upon every participant. Each formation had to catch up with slower aircraft ahead in order to pass the saluting dais without a break and at the designated moment.

Lincolns, 18 from Upwood, flew at 166 mph, Vampires at 305 mph, and all the Meteors behind at 345 mph. A continuous stream of groups of aircraft flew by the Queen for nearly half-an-hour. Last of 639 aircraft were an early Hawker Hunter and finally the 'latest' Swift F Mk 4 fighter flown at 667 mph by test pilot Mike Lithgow who turned on the re-heat as he concluded the fly-past at exactly 16.07 hrs BST.

For the aircrews the event was far from over. Safely homing so many very assorted formations over much of the southern half of Britain was highly demanding. There was little time to play with and, over Cambridge, Meteors seemed to fill the sky.

Positioned at the Review by an Airspeed Oxford, I came very close to Queen Elizabeth II. I was amazed to see how much like any '20 something' she looked. She spoke and laughed with an RAF officer, looked my way and smiled! I was thrilled, but I'm not sure whether I dared to smile back. I remember thinking how nice and incredibly young she looked, the sort of girl to whom one would like to say 'Hi!' No, I didn't chance my luck, 'The Duke' was too close by...

As Dad and I motored home I thought 'how lovely to be able speak of "my" air force'! How daunting, and surely at times frightening, to have held high office at such a young age. Your Majesty, you did it brilliantly, and you continue to do so!

Bernie Wallman of Great Shelford has sent me a most interesting picture. It shows members of all the racing pigeon clubs in Cambridge preparing their entries for a competition to celebrate the Coronation in 1953

There were three Cambridge clubs with others at Histon, Shelford and Ely. The Cambridge City Homing Society was the oldest whilst the Cambridge Premier had its headquarters at the Station Hotel, Station Road. The Romsey Town and District Homing Society was based at the Corner House pub on Newmarket Road, which is where this picture was taken – one can clearly see the old gas works at the rear that supplied Cambridge with town gas for so many years

Bernie can identify many of the fanciers of the day whose families enjoyed the sport over several generations. Today there are at least three descendants of those photographed that still race pigeons in the area. It also shows the publican of the Corner House pub, Harry Habbin and his wife. Harry was a leading light in the early days of Cambridge United as the Habbin Stand testifies.

Before a race members gathered to mark their birds. Each pigeon had a closed band on one leg containing its unique number. A numbered rubber band was attached to the other leg and they were taken to the railway station for the long journey North before being released to find their way back to their home lofts. On arrival calculations were need to compute the bird's velocity – the distance of each loft being precisely known.

The time taken depended on winds: in July 1913 a pigeon owned by Mr F. Pollard of Pratt Street, Soham, was released from Perth in Scotland at 7.10 on the Saturday morning and got to its Soham loft at 2.27pm – a distance of nearly 320 miles in about seven hours. This was an average of nearly 46 miles an hour. Nowadays, Bernie says, on a calm day a bird will fly at about 40 mph, coming down to 30mph with a head wind but soaring up to 60-70 with a strong tail-wind.

One of the most successful local fanciers was Ray Farrington who outshone his father and grandfather by becoming the first man from Cambridgeshire to win Britain's premier homing pigeon race, the North Road Championship Club from Lerwick in 2010. His pigeon completed a marathon 558-mile flight from the Shetland Isles back to Ray's loft in 18 hours and 20 minutes, a better time than any other bird in the country – including pigeons from the Queen's own lofts at Sandringham.

The Royal involvement with the sport can be dated back to 1886 when King Leopold II of the Belgians gave racing pigeons to the Royal Family as a gift and they started a racing loft on the Sandringham Estate. But it can be traced in Cambridge back to the mid 1850s with a Canary, Pigeon, Rabbit and Poultry holding its fourth show in December 1859

The birds homing instinct played an important part during both World Wars, carrying messages of importance. In September 1917 the Chief Constable of Cambridgeshire urged people not to shoot pigeons seen flying singly; should any carrier and homing pigeon be shot by accident it should be taken to the nearest police station.

It was not the only problem facing fanciers: in March 1919 five lads appeared before the Cambridge Justices on a charge of stealing seven pigeons of the value of £10 (about £500 at today's prices). One of them, aged 16, had been before the court on five occasions for similar offences. Magistrates did not like to send a boy so young to prison but there was no chance for the lad unless they marked this offence and made the boy realise how serious it was. He was sent to prison for a month with hard labour. The other lads were fined – they were too old to be birched.

Pigeon racing is a sport has given great satisfaction to thousands of people for generations, but one whose history seems not to have been recorded. If you have pictures or family stories, I'd be delighted to share them.

Charles Lingard Bell was born in 1854, the youngest of the five children of Charles and Ann Bell who were then living at 34 Gloucester Street, a 'rather squalid street' off Castle Street leading to his father's timber yard and business premises.

Cornfields and gardens came right up to the back of the house and his playground was the land around the County prison opposite. The castle moat was overgrown with elder and sloe and teemed with rabbits and bird nests. He and his friends were given food in the prison kitchens, played in the chapel and visited the debtors' quarters where they were treated to fruit cake (debtors had provisions sent in). There was also 'a fine garden with grapes and cabbages'. Rather gruesomely, they also played around the gallows, which were built in his father's yard before being taken across the road to the prison every time there was to be an execution.

Charles was sent to the nearby Cambridge & Home Academy where there were forty to fifty boys 'mostly of the lower orders'. There he learnt to write and was taught minimal Latin, Greek and French. In 1868, the family moved to a rather imposing terraced house at 73 Chesterton Road, now the site of Henry Giles House, where Charles lived until his death in 1941. In 1871 he started to compile a diary that he continued until 1938 which, together with some leather-bound sketchbooks, are preserved in the Cambridgeshire Collection at Lion Yard Library.

By 1874 he Charles was training to be an architect in the office of William Milner Fawcett of Silver Street. This involved him spending much time touring the Cambridgeshire countryside drawing and measuring bridges and other structures, in preparation for building works. However he always took the opportunity to divert to sketch the local church and was pleased when he found one that had not yet been restored – “I went to old Chesterton church again to sketch. I have been there near a dozen times but the old Tower and spire are still unrestored, so I find something new every time” he noted. It could not last: the church was thoroughly restored in 1880 when some of the monuments he'd recorded were removed

By June 1878 he had left Fawcett's and set about trying to earn some money by entering competitions for small-scale architectural projects. He was unsuccessful and a year later noted “I have at last given up all thought & ideas of ever practising as an Architect myself. All my ambitious thoughts have vanished, died...”

He then had grand plans for producing a book of pen and ink drawings of Cambridgeshire and its churches, with notes on their memorials and bells, which he anticipated would take him ten years. It would have been a culmination of a lifetime's work, echoing the volume produced by the Lysons brothers in 1808. The material was compiled but the book was never published.

The manuscript was bought at auction in 2001 by Mike and Val Cowan of Gt Eversden. Now they have transcribed the handwritten text and reproduced Bell's illustrations including numerous coloured armorials in villages across the south of the county.

At Little Eversden he came across a shepherd resting on a tombstone while tending his sheep – perhaps Bell also used the monument as a place from which to draw. At other times he took photographs from which he produced his sketches. One of these shows the dovecote at Manor Farm, Barton. It was falling into ruins when he visited in 1914 but restored by its owners, St Catherine's College next year, when the thatched roof was replaced by slate. But where are the other photographs?

Mike Cowan has taken magnificent modern colour photographs of features described but never sketched by Bell. The result is two magnificent glossy volumes which are an essential addition to the library of any lover of Cambridgeshire and – more importantly – a long-overdue and fitting tribute to one of the county's greatest architectural illustrators.

In July 1938, 75 years ago, Cambridge gained a new addition to its architecture with the completion of a scheme to transform Sussex Street from "a narrow, winding alley of ancient houses and shops, a picturesque survival of an older Cambridge, but none-the-less a slum" to one of its premier shopping destinations

There had been talk about change for many years: in 1865 residents objected to the widening of the narrow lane, concerned about the inconvenience created by the opening of the street to vehicular traffic. By 1904 Sussex Street was often blocked by traffic using it instead of Hobson Street where the pebbles were very uneven

Work finally started in 1930 when Sidney Sussex College announced plans for an artistically-designed crescent and colonnade of 12 shops and offices on the south side of the street.

This was a period of massive development in central Cambridge as the News observed: “There never was a time surely when there were so many works of destruction going on as at present. Little bits of old Cambridge are going one by one and elaborate new buildings are rising up in their place”. As the months past so both sides of Sidney Street were knocked down and rebuilt seeing the arrival of major new stores such as Sainsbury’s, Woolworths and Boots together with the Dorothy Café-restaurant and dancehall which was to remain the entertainment centre of Cambridge for over 30 years.

Around the corner in Sussex Street the first of the new shops opened in 1932. Then the College started on the north side.

It was all finished in July 1938 to great acclaim: Amongst the many improvements in Cambridge during the past few years there is none more striking than that which has been effected in Sussex Street. Those who recall the dark narrow lane of bygone days, with its overhanging roofs on either side, and its small, ill-lit shops, will hardly recognise the imposing street that has emerged from the builders’ hands

Amongst the early occupants were Rose’s Fashion Centre in the Colonnade. They sold attractive women's clothing at a reasonable price. Their sales attracted large crowds: in July 1953 the pressure of 200 people queuing outside broke one of the shop windows. It was a real family affair, the husbands standing for the wives from the early hours until the woman of the family herself arrived to try and grab some of the bargains such as gabardine suits reduced from seven guineas (£7.35) to 15s (75p) or a grey Melange coat at £1 (original price £8.8s.). Then there was Pigotts hardware shop which sold a wide range of tools, including up to 140 different types of pocket knife.

During a survey of shops in December 1980 the News featured Diane International hairdressers, “flamboyant and avant-garde, an experience in itself” who could create award winning styles with the flick of a comb. Charles Quality Leather had handbags, jewel cases, spirit flasks and gents dressing case while Millers Music Centre supplied televisions, hi-fi and records: “You can buy music for any age. If you do not know what your 13-year-old grandson requires the assistant will help. Although you may not know what ‘heavy metal’ means, Millers will”.

Times have changed, fashions and shops change too, but Sussex Street remains one of the most attractive of Cambridge shopping areas, described by Sir Nikolaus Pevsner as “the best piece of urban planning of the 20th century at Cambridge”

Memories 5th August 2013 by Mike Petty

The present spell of hot weather has made travel by air-conditioned car the most pleasant of activities. It was not a luxury available to Thomas Baskerville in 1681. His experience were recorded in ‘Fenland Notes and Queries’ a wonderful miscellany of articles published between 1889 and 1908

“From Mildenhall we went the bank way through the depth and level of the fens, a great part of the way being by the river side. As we rode along this bank we saw here and there some poor cottages and wretched farms where some poor souls, at a hard rate, do weather out a winter to look after the cattle that feed here”

This was May after a dry winter and scorching dry spring or else it would hardly have been possible to make the journey so early in the year. But “As dry as it was we could hardly get over the rotten bridges with our horses, being glad to alight for fear they should break through and stick in the rotten bogs under them.

“The level from Mildenhall to Ely being nothing but turf or peat it is by its insufferable heat and dryth having exhausted all the moisture out of the ditches it was so suffocating hot by means of the brimstone or sulphury vapours, we could hardly breathe or endure it, so that I generally think it was possible to have set the country on fire, the earth then so dry”.

The peat could indeed catch fire as in 1949 when firemen were called to Barnold crossing, Waterbeach, where the railway embankment had been alight for about a month and a considerable quantity of peat land was smouldering. It was notoriously difficult to extinguish and the firemen were out all night to try and contain it.

It was the combustible quality of the peat that made it a valuable fuel, as described in ‘The Lost Fens’ a new book by Prof Ian Rotherham of Sheffield Halam University. An ecologist and environmental historian, he views the transformation of the fens from wet bog to intensive arable as ‘England’s Greatest Ecological Disaster’. He contrasts various area of fenland across the country, detailing the wildlife and flora, the drainers and the fenland peat cutters

In 1909 there were some 300 men and boys, plus a few women, engaged in the turf industry in Wicken, Burwell and Reach. It was hard work: Men using beackets dug blocks of peat which had to be stacked and dried before they were ready for sale. Boys wheeled barrows loaded with peat along planks over drains. The turf diggers let them know that should they topple into the drain, barrow, turves and all, they would be compelled to buy a gallon of beer for their workmates. It happened quite often and caused fun more than anger, local historian Anthony Day has recorded.

Peat was not only used for burning. Crude dwellings were once made of turves bound in withers with roofs of osiers and reeds. The outer walls would receive a facing of clay to keep the weather out. A cottage pulled down in Lode Lane, Wicken some forty years ago revealed a layer of turves under the roof, each harder than bark.

Peat had a boost in 1921 when a miners’ strike reduced the amount of coal available and in 1935 there was still a demand for peat as fuel in private houses. It sold in Cambridge at a cost of twenty-four shillings for 600 pieces (technically called 1,000) delivered. While not suitable for closed stoves and grates it was very pleasant for the hearth fires found in many houses. It was clean to handle and took up little room when stacked. Orders should be placed as soon as possible not with a coal merchant but with the Cambridgeshire Rural Community Council at Cambridgeshire House, Hills Road

The last of the fenland peat diggers like Bert Bailey, Seth Badcock and Harold Sennitt have ceased to ply their hard trade & now we look to other fuels to keep our homes warm in the future. But perhaps peat could be an answer:

In 1908 James Smith wrote to the News: “The idea of electricity generated by peat gas appeals to residents in the Fen country where peat is so plentiful. The black swamp possesses theoretical heat values not far below coal when thoroughly dried. When economically farmed, stored, dried and made fit for burning by steam boilers or ‘producer gas plants’ it becomes a formidable rival to coal with its ever-fluctuating price”

Who knows: if fenland around Wicken is flooded once more and peat builds up, it may be seen in a century or two as a replacement for ‘fracking’. Doubtless such suggestions would generate as much opposition as energy - not least from the Professor of Environmental Geography at Sheffield University, Ian Rotherham.

Memories 12th August 2013 by Mike Petty

The village pub has been a centre of village life for generations. It has been a debating shop and sports venue as well as a place for entertainment and refreshment. It has been a refuge from the woes of the world, somewhere to be away from the wife and something that has been blamed for the ruin of many a marriage

But what was it like from the other side of the counter? One who knew better than most was Elsie Stowe: her father took over as landlord of the Red Lion Histon in 1912 and she was born there.

Elsie remembered the old days: The tap room was on the left of the front door. This contained two oblong tables and one shaped to fit the bay window. These were scrubbed white by her father. The fireplace was high and the smoke curled round into a square hole in the wall. The floor was plain white bricks, which were scrubbed regularly. An iron spittoon stood beside the iron fender. The wooden chair legs scraping on the brick floor made a very loud noise. Round the walls and in the bay window were fixed wooden seats. A dartboard made of wood was on the wall at the side of the fireplace; this dartboard was regularly soaked in the water butt. Dominoes were played every evening, which she could hear rattling noisily on the wooden table.

The cellar where the beer barrels were stood on racks was down three steps: Her parents' legs must have ached from so many trips up and down the steps with trays of drinks. The ginger beer bottles had a marble in the top which was forced down by a special gadget attached to the spirits serving shelf near the door. Smilax, Robin, Gold Flake, Kensitas, Players and Black Cat cigarettes were in stock with Woodbines sold at 2d for five.

Opposite the cellar door was the door to the 'Little Room', a sort of snug, which should really have been the kitchen as it had a cooking range on which stood a copper kettle. In the winter the kettle was usually on the boil, for hot water to add to tots of rum. There was an ancient red plush settee, which would seat about six people and wooden stick-back chairs formed the rest of the seating. Many a sing song was held in this 'Little Room' as the piano was there,. Elsie and her sisters were taught piano and were expected to play for the customers if needed.

The 'Club Room', which was quite large, housed a large billiard table with a long gas bracket above it. The Share-Out Sick Club held their annual dinners there at Christmas when her mother cooked all the food herself as she did each Whit Monday when the 'Stock Club' dined, though then Matthew Kimpton (a baker on Station Road) roasted the huge joint of beef with accompanying Yorkshire pud in his bake-oven. The preparation of the vegetables for these dinners was a mammoth task and Elsie recalled a copper full of bundles of asparagus.

One of the highlights of summer in Histon was the 'Flower Show and Sports Day'. Masses of people came from miles around and the Red Lion was a hive of activity. Teas were served on long trestle tables in the Club Room: bread and butter and home-made jam or cheese, with a slice of Mother's huge slab cake, plain or fruit, all for about six pence per head, including a cup of tea.

The annual village Feast was also a hectic time. The little snug room was cleared of furniture – the piano was moved to the Club Room for dancing - extra barrels of beer were installed upon racks and crates upon crates of bottled beer and minerals formed the serving counter. Much was served through the window, to people in the yard where there were three or four long wooden tables and forms for seating.

When it was finally time for last orders, once the clearing, counting and other chores had been done, the landlord and his family could finally make their way to bed. But, Elsie recalled, upstairs only had two double bedrooms and one very small one. No bathroom! The family toilet was quite a walk from the house so a three sided lantern was kept at the ready for the dark winter evenings! The lantern was kept on a bamboo 'what-not' in the passage next to the cellar. The lighting in the passage was a gas jet with no mantle, the flame formed a fan shape and gave off quite a roar.

The Red Lion has changed over the years but still provides a centre for refreshment and chat for locals. It is one of several pubs whose story has been told in a carefully-researched well illustrated publication by the Histon and Impington Village Society. It should be essential reading for anyone whose families have imbibed in the establishments or for those who like to discover village hostelryes.

The current controversies surrounding proposals over ‘fracking’ for gas have a reflection in Cambridgeshire’s past. But then it was not gas that was being sought but Coprolite - fossilised "dinosaur dung" which was extracted by the Victorians on a massive scale for use as fertiliser and again during the Great War to be made into explosives.

One man who knows all about this largely forgotten industry is Bernard O’Connor from Gamlingay who has researched its impact on many villages along the Cam. One such was Horningsea where St John’s College owned land deep in the countryside near where Bottisham Lode and the River Cam joined. They were keen to benefit by this new source of income and encouraged their tenant, William Banyard to exploit the buried treasure.

Banyard spent money on new buildings and cottages at the isolated North Hills Farm and iron wash mills, steam engines, sheds and pumps were put in. But the investment paid dividends. By 1857 labourers were working over two acres, raising about 800 tons of coprolite a year. By the autumn of 1867 the workable deposits had been exhausted so Banyard moved on to nearby land owned by King's College whose bursar was delighted to welcome the diggers on to his land

The coprolite was washed and piled into heaps before being carted to the river where it was loaded on to barges near Bottisham Sluice. But in 1862 the sluice was in poor condition and there was a dispute between the Cam Conservators and the South Level Commissioners as to what should be done. Agreement was reached and 18 navigation between Cambridge and Kings Lynn was suspended for three months whilst work took place

This hit trade at the Green Man pub beside the sluice which provided refreshment for bargees and coprolite digger alike. Anglers however were warned in 1855: "the present house is a dog-hole & the arrangement of such a nature that he must be a bold man indeed who, going once, would venture there again". However crowds did gather when public Baptisms were held in the river at this isolated spot.

The coprolite industry led to considerable employment opportunities for local people and even attracted many from outside. Blacksmiths were needed to make and repair iron spades, shovels and crow bars, carpenters cut the planks and built the sheds, carts and barrows while engineers, engine drivers, wheelwrights were also needed.

Many of the labourers came from Waterbeach, but first they had to cross the Cam and the only way was a ferry. In March 1872 eight men packed on the small boat when another man jumped on board; his weight caused the ferry to capsize, throwing them into the water. Although James Beasley, an engineer for the Cam Conservators launched his boat to rescue them one worker was drowned.

This was by no means the only accident:: there had been various incidents when threshing machines or loaded farm carts had got stuck while being ferried across. William Banyard was amongst those who organised a petition for an Act of Parliament enable the construction of a bridge which opened in October 1875.

The Clayhithe Bridge Company also invested in the adjoining public house which had been known for 100 years as the Pike and Eel. It was renamed 'The House of Lords' and then became the 'Bridge Inn'. They improved the grounds making it one of the prettiest places in the county. Soon numerous groups were enjoying river trips from Cambridge.

There were skittles, billiards and swings with dancing on the lawns or ballroom every evening. Then in 1912 the landlord added a Zoological Garden with pythons, boa constrictors, lemurs, apes, baboons, kangaroos and cockatoos together with Shetland ponies for boys and girls to ride. The zoo continued till 1916 when a bear was roasted on a spit and sold in sandwiches in aid of soldiers' comforts.

But there was a problem: those coming from Horningsea had to pay a toll to cross the bridge. This was very narrow and the approach roads were difficult making the County council very reluctant to take it over. However in September 1938 – just 75 years ago, the toll was removed and then in June 1939 a new Clayhithe bridge was formally opened.

Each morning it is busy with commuters making their way through Horningsea into Cambridge, totally unaware of the intense mining activity of a century and a half ago.

For more on the coprolite industry see Bernard O'Connor's excellent website <http://bernardoconnor.org.uk/coprolites.html>

Memories 26th August 2013 by Mike Petty

At a meeting of the Cambridge Instrument Company pensioners recently, memories turned to the Northampton Street area.

Northampton Street used to be one of the busiest routes through Cambridge and was the scene of two 'firsts' in the struggle to keep traffic flowing: the first traffic lights in the city were erected at the junction with Magdalene and Castle Streets in 1930 while Queen's Road saw the first mini roundabout in 1975. Now much of the chronic traffic congestion has gone, but have memories also disappeared?

Writing in 1963 – 50 years ago – Erica Dimock remarked: "There must be fewer people living in Northampton Street at present than at any other time during the last three hundred years. Every other house stands empty. Historically and architecturally it is a street of some interest, yet it is already difficult to find anyone with really deep feeling about it and in the future this is likely to be even more so"

It is a street of two sides, one regularly recorded by artists and photographers, the other largely overlooked.

The south side is more impressive having what Erica described as 'several highly picturesque but insanitary looking buildings of great antiquity'. They include Cory House near the corner of Magdalene Street, a late 16th century range of two storey houses with attics, which still maintain some of their attractive Elizabethan appearance. In the 60's they were home to various businesses including the Castle Aquarium, The Merton Grocery Stores run by members of the Robinson family and the Merton Arms Hotel a popular rendezvous for undergraduates and others who enjoyed a snack lunch.

Standing back are two exceptionally-interesting properties unglimped by most travellers. The School of Pythagoras, the earliest secular building in Cambridge, was home to the first Mayor. But his family lost its wealth and it was sold to Merton College, Oxford, in 1270. For several centuries it was leased to farmers and became a granary until it was acquired by St John's College. Adjacent stands the 15th-century timber-framed Merton Hall, former home to Lord Rothschild and both now part of St John's College.

Almost next door was a building representing the other side of Cambridge life – St Giles' parish workhouse later altered to the Borough Boy public house. In 1911 it consisted of six cottages with two open privies and a large room where the paupers dined together. After the poor law reforms of 1836 the buildings were let to Mr Benjamin Clark for £20 a year, the tenants being allowed the use of the pump and privy. The yard was sometimes called 'Gentle's Yard' from the name of the chief tenant, a tradesman who was coffin maker to the Mill Road Workhouse.

In July 1998 Sally Hatton from Sawston shared with me memories of her grandmother who had lived in a cottage in Gentle's Yard for 50 years. It was one in a cobbled passageway with a toilet across the yard and an outside tap from which she drew buckets of water to carry into her kitchen. Inside there was a single room housing her old gas cooker, a table with a bowl and bar of soap, the black kitchen range and the cupboard under the stairs where she kept the coal – the coalman carrying the sacks in through the one door.

Across the road lanes and alleys ran from the north side of Northampton Street to some of the most densely packed streets in Cambridge. Collins Passage consisted of a number of very dilapidated houses. They had low ceilings, the floor was insecure, there was no ventilation behind and a high brick wall at the front so they got no sun at all except for half-an-hour at the height of summer. In 1906 they were judged unfit for human habitation and cleared. But as old properties were replaced by new houses the landlords demanded higher rents that the former residents could not afford, driving them out and reducing the trade of pubs and shopkeepers.

In 1936 the Corporation acquired properties in the Spotted Cow Yard facing Northampton Street with a quarter of the cost paid by Cambridge Preservation Society and Magdalene College. But the war intervened and the site was a blot on the landscape for many years. Some of the old cottages in Kettle's Yard were bought by Jim Ede and formed the nucleus of the Kettle's Yard gallery. Then in March 1956 the Lord Mayor of London opened a new block of flats for old people at Honey Hill. I have photographs of their opening, but very few that show what was there before – do you have snaps in your files?

There was change almost next door when a new cottage was built for Enid Porter, the Curator of the Cambridge & County Folk Museum. This had opened in the former White Horse Inn on Castle Street to record the everyday life of ordinary folk, a role it continues to this day. Now the renamed 'Museum of Cambridge' are planning to commemorate her lifetime's work by the unveiling of a blue plaque on the site of the building she called home.

Memories 2nd September 2013 by Mike Petty

Jim Neale could have been a Stagecoach driver. He would have been one of a long line of men who have travelled the roads around Cambridge conveying travellers to their chosen destination.

Some have gone down in history. There was Richard Vaughan – known as ‘Hell-Fire-Dick’ whose skill in driving the Cambridge Telegraph was recorded in verse in the ‘Cambridge Portfolio’ in 1838. Or Sir St Vincent Cotton, Baronet, of Madingley Hall whose love of gambling reduced him from an income of £5,000 to penury and saw him making a living driving the Brighton "Age" only to be accused of assaulting the driver of a private coach who when blocked in overtaking at a turnpike gate had subsequently harassed the "Age", passing, slowing and speeding up to the great rage of its aristocratic coachman.

Few have left an account of their life and times, though Thomas Cross who regularly plied the roads between London and King’s Lynn shared his memories in a three-volume Autobiography of a Stage Coach Man in 1904. His ‘Union’ coach was not one of the most favoured on the road: its main income came from carrying Lynn shrimps whose smell advertised the arrival of the stage almost before the sound of the horses’ hooves. Even the down coach, hung round with empty baskets on a sultry day, would emit an effluvium that was very uninviting to the gentry and undergraduates alike. A group of wealthy Ely farmers decided to start a rival coach which they named ‘The Red Rover’, mainly so they could have the fun of driving it. They soon found this was not as easy as they thought. One night the coach nearly overturned as it was travelling through Milton. When the driver investigated he found they’d run over a drunken man who’d been lying in the middle of the road and had crushed both his legs. They had to take him to Addenbrooke’s Hospital, which ruined their timekeeping that night.

But Jim Neale decided that being a Stagecoach man was not for him. His main love was Burwell and District where he started his driving career in 1970, transporting local people to Newmarket, Cambridge or to visit relatives in the next village. When the firm was taken over by Eastern Counties (who in turn became Cambus and later Stagecoach), Jim opted to drive for smaller companies such as Young’s Coaches from Rampton, Burtons of Haverhill and Cambridge-based Premier Travel with occasional shifts on the open-top Guide Friday buses where his love of history was invaluable in giving visitors an introduction to the city and its university.

He later drove for Cambridge Coach Services on routes to Stansted Airport, Worcester or even Bulgaria. Many thousand local folk will have taken one of their holiday breaks and tours enjoying the opportunity to leave the driving to somebody else, somebody who will become a friend and guide on their journey. Regular travellers will get to know the man or woman behind the wheel and Carol Budge, Roger Birch, Paul Crocker, Brian Sellars and Harry Nabai are amongst the drivers depicted in Jim's latest book, 'Cambridge Coach Services from the Driver's Seat'

But few passengers will have given much thought about the vehicle on which they were travelling. Jim Neale knows each individually, be they Paramount 3500-bodied coaches, Leyland Tigers or Volvo Olympian double-deckers with Northern Counties Palatine II bodies. He has driven them, washed them and coached them to their destinations.

But his favourite remains a 47-seater coach, 932 BCE, which was delivered new to Burwell and District in June 1962. It was not the best-looking vehicle but had a door opened by the driver with a long chrome lever that could sometimes be mistaken for the gear lever allowing it to swing open while travelling along the road at the maximum 40 mph. Jim first drove it in August 1970, then rescued it from the scrap yard and took it home with him for restoration when it reached the end of its working life in 1982. It has found its last resting place amongst the exhibits at Burwell's museum.

Burwell Museum has a wealth of other exhibits from Roman pottery to the village's windmill, which can be seen, for free, at their heritage day on Saturday 15th September, noon till 5pm.

Memories 9th September 2013 by Mike Petty

Last week our wanderings took us to that part of Cambridgeshire where the countryside is more rolling and where, in the summer sunshine – or indeed moonlight – the harvested landscape seems peaceful and tranquil.

One evening we journeyed to the small community at Saxon Street, a hamlet of Wood Ditton, deep in the horse-racing country south of Newmarket. Here we met the ladies of the WI, told them of Sherlock Holmes' visit to Cambridge and learned something of life in their community.

The building in which we met was the Methodist Chapel, now bereft of pews. Tucked in a corner was a folder recording the work that had been done to convert it into a space that can be used both for worship and social gatherings.

It included a centenary history, compiled in 1985 which shows that all was far from peaceful at the time the congregation was seeking to establish itself. One of the early ministers, Richard S. Blair, left his version of the story in 'Nailing up the Barn Door', published in 1894.

In it he records: 'Ruffians from three villages used to meet here, and many a time I have seen the people pelted as they went to chapel and when they left it: I have seen the tiles of the roof covered with sticks, stones and cabbage stalks'. Four lads were summoned for snowballing people as they left the chapel; the leader was committed to prison for a month, the rest for fourteen days, which even the Minister felt was somewhat severe.

Saxon Street has hit the headlines at various times: in March 1903 two thatched cottages were destroyed by a spark falling on the roof. While some neighbours removed furniture another fought his way into the blazing building to rescue a 70-year old man confined to his bed following a fall from a stack. Fire struck again in June 1928, this time in a block of five cottages. Newmarket Fire Brigade was called out but it was an inconvenient time as all the firemen were at dinner. Then they had problems finding a motor to pull the fire engine and that, combined with a strong wind, ensured that three cottages were destroyed. A traction engine had passed along the road shortly before and it was thought that a spark from it may have caused the blaze. Then in March 1959 Rutland House, home of the 'Squire', Edgar Cooper-Bland, was struck by lightning; Mr Chapman, a representative of Baldreys, had called at the Reindeer Public House to collect an order when he noticed smoke coming from the roof. He drove to Cheveley where he alerted a policeman on motor cycle patrol, who called the brigade.

A day or so earlier we had been invited to John Lacey's Fulbourn farm to see a record of one soldier's service in the Great War. The small, leather folder contains just the barest of information: Name, Taylor, W.J., Rank – private, Number 762423. He signed up on the 18th September 1916 and was posted to the 1st Company of the 2nd Battalion, Artists' Rifles O.T.C.

This was a unit whose officers had to show credentials as a proper artist — musician, painter, poet, writer etc. (even journalists were regarded to be too vulgar and crass people for selection, unless they were of a very high class). Amongst those that Taylor served alongside was Barnes Wallis later inventor of the Bouncing Bomb, John Nash the Royal Academician, war poet Wilfred Owen & R.C. Sheriff whose play "Journey's End", was based on his experiences in the trenches. There is no emotional description of Taylor's war, just notes of the payments he received – one shilling a day (though sixpence was deducted as expenses), rising twopence when he was promoted Corporal on return from leave in October 1917. Tucked into the back of the little book is a Combined Leave and Railway ticket dated 7th December 1918 for a Third Class journey from France to Victoria Station. His war was over, at least for the time being.

In peacetime he established a successful lawyer's practice, his name living on in Taylor Vinters of Cambridge, London and Singapore.

But when fighting flared again in 1939 Taylor was called upon to play his part once more. On 15th May 1940 he was asked to form a Home Guard Group. Now a Lieut-Col, he commanded the 2nd Cambridgeshire & Suffolk Battalion stretching from Brandon to Brinkley – and including Saxon Street.

It took a while but eventually ammunition and equipment arrived, including a lorry load of Molotov Cocktails that, like the rest, were stored in Taylor's private house in Dullingham Road, Newmarket. He recorded something of his experiences in 'We Also Served', the story of the Home Guard published in 1943. One of the Home Guard contingents was drawn from Saxon Street & Wood Home Guard whose men turned out to ensure their wives and daughters would in the future continue to make their jam in peace.

Hi Mr Petty

I saw your article concerning Mr W.J.Taylor in the Cambridge News (dated 9/9/13) and thought it was very good, especially as the Home Guard of WW2 is of great interest to me.

I decided to do an ancestry search on this man's military records, unfortunately the German Luftwaffe had destroyed William's service papers during WW2, but his Medal index card still survives (see attachment).

This gives his service Nos as 8410 and 762423 (not 752423 as printed in the paper); his Regiment was as you stated the 'Artist Rifles'.

William was commissioned into the 2nd Battalion Hunts Cyclists from the Artists on the 29th of October 1918.

William's full medal entitlement for WW1 was the British War Medal and the Allied Victory Medal, these he applied for on the 13th of December 1925.

Would it be possible for me to obtain a copy (via e-mail) of the photograph used in the article?

Kind regards

Memories 16th September 2013 by Mike Petty

A few weeks ago I was talking to a meeting of the Waddelow Society at Little Downham about various incidents relating to flying machines. We covered balloons and other early flying machines like the Wallbro that was built in a shed off Devonshire Road in Cambridge. It failed to get airborne in 1910, but was later rebuilt and flown by the son of one of the original inventors, the recently-deceased Wing-Commander Ken Wallis.

Towards the end I dealt with one or two of the later incidents including the secret American bomber that crashed at Isleham in October 1949. And then I touched on what happened at Lakenheath on 27th July 1956. I showed a report from the Cambridge Daily News – it didn't make the front page, it was just one of a range of accidents it was covering at the time. At this one of the audience, Gerald Harrison interrupted to say that he could tell me more.

Gerald has lent me a DVD entitled 'As Time Goes By' that was produced on behalf of the Lakenheath Royal British Legion in 2008. On it Len Flack told how he was cutting grass on the airfield when he heard the noise of the six roaring engines of a giant B47 bomber that was practicing take-off and landings. Then something went badly wrong: the plane's starboard wheel burst and the tip of the wing scraped the ground. The pilot managed to lift the machine over a fence but the wing hit an 'Igloo' – one of a number of earth-covered Nissen Huts where bombs were stored - ripping off the top and exposing the buried bombs which were then drenched by blazing jet fuel.

Fred Wootton was a lad playing cricket nearby; he remembered 'All hell broke loose' Ambulances and fire engines raced across the fields, driving through barbed wire fences to get to the scene of the devastation. There was talk that the plane was carrying an Atom Bomb and that it had hit a dump containing 'Fat Boy', the code-name for a device more powerful than the bombs that had devastated Hiroshima and Nagasaki. Later it transpired that the dump struck contained three Mark VI bombs, each containing about 8,000 pounds of TNT and depleted uranium – even had they detonated there would not have been a nuclear reaction just an almighty explosion. But in the heat of the moment nobody knew that at the time. As far as they were concerned East Anglia might any moment be turned into a nuclear desert. None of this was reported at the time – it was too secret to be told.

Since then a top-secret report has been published on the internet. It was a telex from General Walsh, Commander 7th Air Division, South Ruislip, England, to General Curtis Le May, Commander, Strategic Air Command. He reported: "I have just come from wreckage of B47 which ploughed into an Igloo in Lakenheath. The B47 tore apart the Igloo and knocked about three Mark sixes. Aircraft then exploded showering burning fuel over all. Crew perished. Most of the aircraft wreckage pivoted on Igloo and came to rest with aircraft nose just beyond Igloo bank, which kept main fuel outside smashed Igloo. Preliminary exam by bomb disposal officer says a miracle that one Mark Six with exposed detonators didn't go off"

He continues: "Fire fighters extinguished fire around Mark Sixes Fast".

Reports tell how Air Force Master Sgt. L. H. Dunn, the base fire chief riding in the lead truck, moved as close as possible to the building containing the A-bombs and poured flame-suppressing foam on the fire. Dunn, who ignored the four B-47 crew members trapped inside the wreckage on the presumption they were dead, utilized four foam trucks in extinguishing the fire around the storage building. All agree that the near disaster was averted by "tremendous heroism, good fortune and the will of God

But that is not quite the version that Gerald Harrison heard. Gerald was a volunteer member of Brandon Fire Brigade. He joined after this incident, but he worked with the firemen who had driven their engine through the perimeter fence to get onto the airfield. The five men of the crew saw large numbers of US personnel fleeing as the whole base was evacuated. They were themselves told to keep away from the blazing bomb store: the Americans knew what was down there. But they were civilians, not military men.

Sub Officer Frank Kybird had no great concern about the Americans – he was just worried about his friends and neighbours, the residents of Brandon. So his crew stood on top of the blazing dump, pouring water on to the bombs beneath until they were sure the danger had been averted.

Then the Brandon men went back to their day jobs. They'd signed the Official Secrets Act and could not talk about what they'd done. And the American and British authorities had no wish for the news to leak out. Although it made an inside page in the CDN, the Nationals did not cover it till the Omaha World-Herald leaked the story in November 1979. It reported that the incident had been hushed up, as the British people had not been told that nuclear bombs were being kept in the U.K.

That secret telex from 1956 concluded 'Plan investigation to warrant decorating Firemen'. That never happened and for over 50 years Gerald Harrison has striven to have his former Brandon colleagues' heroism acknowledged and the names of Frank Kybird, Ernest Norton, Ben Willet, Jack Riley and Bill Inns remembered.

And that's what Memories is all about

Hi Mike,

Interesting piece last Monday, those local firemen certainly should be remembered. Co-incidentally, the Guardian ran an article on British nuclear accidents last weekend, mentioning the Lakenheath incident.

Just a slight mix-up on the technical detail however. The Mk6 bombs certainly didn't weigh 8,000 tons! They weighed about 8,000 pounds, and contained a couple of hundred pounds of high explosive. They did not contain depleted uranium (U238), that's the non-fissile waste bit. It's enriched uranium (U235) that is used in bombs and nuclear reactors. The fissile material in these bombs however, was plutonium. Whilst uranium is quite nasty, plutonium is far worse. There was no real risk of a nuclear detonation at Lakenheath but there was a very real risk that plutonium could have been spread widely across the countryside. This would have rendered a large area uninhabitable more-or-less for all time. Which makes the actions of the local men all the more heroic.

Best regards,

Tim

Memories 23rd September 2013 by Mike Petty

In Memories of 27th May this year I mentioned that Flora Falanaki from Auckland, New Zealand had emailed me a photo of a group of Officer Cadets that was taken by Thomas Stearn during the Great War. It showed her grandfather, Albert Victor Waitford (later changed to Waetford) on the 3rd row down, looking to his left. On the lower right-hand side he had jotted a handwritten note to his parents dated 5.7.1917.

Albert was part of the Maori Pioneer Battalion and later described his wartime experiences in his local paper. But what he did not record is just where he received his Cambridge education. Flora was hoping to visit the actual place where it was taken. Thanks to local people, including Sally-Ann Greensmith who is researching the First World War for Cambridgeshire County Council's centenary project Between the Lines, the site was identified

Last Wednesday I met Flora and David Falanaki under the clock of Great St Mary's. It was a scene Albert would have recognised and we retraced some of his footsteps. The stones of the interior of the chapel of King's College still reflect the varying colours of the great stained glass windows as they did in the dark days of war, Clare College bridge still span a peaceful Cam. It was only when we crossed Queen's Road that the illusion that nothing had changed was shattered. For where the Clare College Memorial Court now stands Albert would have seen rows and rows of huts occupied by the First Eastern General Hospital where wounded young men – like him – were being patched up and made fit to be sent back to the Front.

Finally it was time for the highlight of the trip – the reason they had journeyed from New Zealand. For at Queens' College they were welcomed by the Rev Dr Jonathan Holmes who led them through the college courts till they gazed at the north wall of the Chapel, against which Albert and his New Zealand comrades had posed.

But that was not the end: for when Flora carefully unwrapped the original photograph she'd brought halfway round the world, Dr Holmes produced a second. At first they seemed identical – but no. For in Flora's picture Albert is facing to left, in this one he was looking directly at the camera. That second photograph is now heading off to the far side of the globe

But there was yet more excitement. For on a table in Dr Holmes' college rooms was a tatty, coverless, set of pages. It was the souvenir magazine produced by the trainee officers all those years ago. And there, amongst the list of men was Albert's name, together with just a few lines about him that had been penned by his colleagues. The only thing was the date: for that particular Officer Training Corps had been based at Queens' between January and May 1918 – it seems as if Albert had got his year wrong! For Flora and David it made the long, long journey so worthwhile.

But others are also seeking to recall wartime education; this time at another Cambridge College. St John's Choir School was never a very large institution. Until 1954 it comprised one main schoolroom approached from a blue door in All Saint's Passage. Usually the pupils were dayboys who went home for their lunch. Each Ascension Day they climbed to the roof of the College chapel to sing at a Carol at mid-morning, a tradition that continues to this day

The uniform consisted of Eton suits with their short jackets and uncomfortable white starched collars to which top hats and gowns were added on service days and covered with a white surplice when in chapel. Boys stayed on at the school until their voices broke; then went on to the Perse or County High School.

Some ex-pupils have recorded their memories: Cecil Longley attended during the Great War – perhaps he bumped into Albert. He remembered his Headmaster: "Mr Senior was a real character. He was neat and fastidious to a degree – never must a book or pen be out of place, nor a picture the least bit askew. Boys always referred to him by his real name, Sam. He could be jovial, but very strict, and the cane was never far from his reach" (something John Lacey can testify to). John was no scholar but he learned three essentials from his old headmaster: to say 'Please' and 'Thank You' and 'May I'. They have served him well.

If you attended St John's College Choir School under Senior's guidance you would be very welcome to meet with fellow pupils once again at a gathering on 25th October. Phone John Lacey or 01223 880385 or John Bull on 01440 702099. And if your ancestor learned to fight alongside the New Zealanders way back in 1918 then drop me a line. Flora and David would be delighted to hear from you.

A single sheet of paper has revived memories of a pioneering firm of Cambridge builders whose Railway Building Works were based at Devonshire Road; but does anybody remember them?

William Saint was born in St Ives and came to Cambridge at the age of 30, starting as a builder in Hooper Street. His first job was to construct two villas on Mill Road into one of which he moved. Others houses followed, including 20 in Mawson Road for which he gained approval in 1894. His firm won contracts from the Cambridge Improvement Commissioners for the Infectious Diseases Hospital in Romsey Town in 1884 and from the Town Council for a the new Cattle Market the following year. As business boomed he established the 'Railway Building Works' in 1888.

From December 1890 William Saint insisted that all of his employees join up to a Sick Fund, paying twopence per week contribution, though apprentices and those earning less than eight shillings paid half. Then in the event of illness they would receive eight shillings a week for the first month with decreasing amounts thereafter.

For building work could be dangerous: in May 1897 a labourer working at Saint's brick kilns in Needingworth was feeding lumps of clay into the brick moulding machine when he got his foot caught in the works, his right leg and thigh were torn off. Perhaps the bricks were intended for the new St Barnabas Institute where during work digging out foundations the sides of a trench collapsed sending a horse and cart tumbling into the hole. The horse was hauled out by ropes, little the worse for its adventure.

In 1900 Saint took on his largest job, the construction of Westminster College, which gained the firm a reputation for quality. This was down to the quality of the men who worked for them, William was quick to acknowledge at a dinner to 170 of his employees at the Lion Hotel at Christmas 1907. Builders could make or mar the work of the architects and they had good foremen who got on with the men. When men worked together the work went on smoothly and any grievances were speedily settled. By then some of their larger contracts were finishing but he looked forward with hope and confidence that they would be able to replace them with others equally large. One of these was the new parish hall at Trumpington. In 1909 they were featured in the Gentleman's Journal guide to local shopping in Cambridge..

Two sons joined the business and the firm expanded. Even during the pre-war depression in the building trade the Cambridge Railway Works employed more men than at any other time. They carried out contracts in the South of England & in the Midlands and hoped to conquer the North and West.

They also hoped to conquer nearer home and in 1913 formed their own Railway Works Football Club, playing in colours of green and blue. They beat teams from Heffer's Printing Works, Old Cherry Hinton and Duxford before thumping St Peter's six – nil in a match on Midsummer Common.

The firm also encouraged their men to learn to fight, forming their own section of the Volunteer Corps with Saint's son Edward as Lieutenant. But when the real war came Edward, then officer commanding the 1st Battalion of the Cambridgeshire Regiment, was killed and another son also perished. During that time William devoted his time to serving his neighbours, representing Petersfield on both the Board of Guardians and Cambridge Borough Council.

In 1918 his business was turned into a limited company but in the days of depression that followed work was harder to find. They built a new chapel at All Saints Church in memory of the late Alderman William Potter Spalding, one-time mayor of Cambridge. But in 1924 came a building strike which had a serious effect on William Saint, a man who had always cherished the importance of a bond between master and man. He died at his residence in Devonshire Road and was buried at St Barnabas church, where he had been churchwarden for 40 years. A tablet commemorates his memory.

His firm could not survive the great depression. One of their employees was Jack Lowe who learned his trade as a plumber with them. After it collapsed Jack set up his own plumbing business in 1936, then opened a tool shop in Mill Road before starting one of the first D-I-Y shops in the city.

The story of the Railway Building Works is incomplete: can you add something to my knowledge of this important building firm?

The headlines were dramatic after fire broke out in one of Cambridge's most important hotels. Smoke poured from the upper windows in such volume that in a few moments part of St Andrew's Street was almost completely obscured with a great cloud of exceptional blackness and density. People groped through it as though a fog, gasping and choking at its pungency. Fortunately the efforts of the Fire Brigade were successful in preventing the flames spreading to the more modern part of the building including the saloon bar, large dining hall and at least 30 bedrooms

Not extracts from last Wednesday's News about the blaze at the University Arms, but a report from August 1934 of a much more serious outbreak just across the road

'Ye Olde Castel Hotel' was precisely what tourists dream of. Obviously old with a view across to Emmanuel, one of the famous Cambridge colleges, yet on the main tram route from the station. It was one of the rarest of places: a hotel whose story was told in its architecture, comfort without glitter and a generous table where soup was followed by cod, turkey & sausages or sirloin cooked to perfection by a chef trained at Queens' college, with baked apples & cream for dessert, then Stilton & port.

Yet all this paled into insignificance compared to the company that gathered around the blazing log fire afterwards:: the doctor of medicine full of good stories of the countryside, the vet who looked as if he could ride horses as well as cure them, the traveller from Leeds and an electioneer drinking gin were all to be found deep in conversation.

This was the picture painted by Herbert Railton in The English Illustrated Magazine of May 1904. The Castel ranked as one of the oldest inns in Cambridge, dating back to the 13th century. It was reconstructed about 1620 and the last extensive additions were in 1891.

But in August 1934 later disaster struck. Firemen were quickly on the scene – their station was almost next door – and every available policeman was withdrawn from other duties to play their part. Together they fought the ever-increasing blaze. Although hindered at first by a shortage of water, eventually the powerful jets of the brigade's two motor fire engines began to win the battle.

Dozens of volunteers rescued furniture as ancient tiles showered down from the crumbling roof. They also carefully removed crates of beer from the bar, though bottles of liquor were heard breaking in the intense heat. One room that attracted their attention was that in which Oliver Cromwell was said to have slept, still containing furniture from that period.

Despite their efforts the front of the old gabled inn was destroyed along with the bars and 14 bedrooms above. A large dining room and about 30 bedrooms in the more recent extension survived. Plans were made to rebuild but the damage was just too great and the hotel was demolished in January 1936 to make way for a new Regal Cinema, now once more a place where people gather to eat and drink. Its name however lives on in the pub nearby

It was not however the only time that a Cambridge hotel has caught fire.

In January 1904 considerable damage was caused to the Rose Hotel in Rose Crescent by a fire that started in the attic. Although the devastation was confined to a comparatively small area every room in the hotel suffered from the effects of water which saturated the ceilings. Fortunately none of the bedrooms were occupied at the time

Then in February 1958 fire seriously damaged the Garden House hotel; part of the roof and several bedrooms were affected. Hundreds of people lined the banks of the Granta watching while thick white smoke gushed from under the roof. More serious was the blaze in April 1972 when despite the efforts of fifty firemen much of the older part of the hotel was destroyed and although most of the guests escaped in their nightclothes, tragically two ladies did not.

Last week guests at the University Arms joined the crowds watching as one of Cambridge's major hotels again gushed smoke. They were seeing history repeat itself, but they probably did not appreciate it.

Memories 14 October 2013 by Mike Petty

Nearly fifty years ago, in early November 1963, Deborah Broadstock from Cottenham met the Queen Mother. She did not have to travel to Buckingham Palace – the Queen came to her village to open the new Village College. Her Majesty spoke of the 'faith and vision' which had seen the creation of this, the tenth in a series of such colleges providing opportunities for both young and old who were not seeking for higher qualifications but wanted to develop their interests and broaden their understanding.

Twenty five years later in October 1988, Cambridgeshire County Councillors considered whether to erect a statue to commemorate the centenary of the birth of the man whose vision had revolutionised educational thinking around the world. They said no.

But then Henry Morris was always a controversial figure.

In 1922 he'd inherited responsibility for education in the second poorest authority in the country with some 150 run-down elementary buildings which pupils left at the age of fourteen. Three years later he set out his ideas for a series of countryman's colleges with facilities for the whole community, with workshops used by the children during the day and their parents at night. It would include a hall for religious assembly – an essential part of education – but also amateur dramatics.

How was it to be achieved in the depression of the inter-war years when money was tight? Henry was not one to butter-up councillors; indeed he was a snob, rude, self-opinionated and insufferable to work with. He was also homosexual.

Big ideas needed big money, and that was in America. So Henry borrowed the cash for a ticket on a liner and came back with a cheque for £45,000. He also returned with a new passion - the young steward in the Tourist Class lounge. Henry, anxious to further that lad's education, arranged for him to study at St John's College, and to save money on lodgings by sharing his flat. The lad never completed his degree, returning shortly afterwards.

Henry returned to America on various occasions, being invited to advise the President on rural education. He travelled to West Africa to advise on new institutes in Nigeria and the Gold Coast. He was regarded as a senior national figure, but Cambridgeshire councillors complained he was spending too much time away from his desk.

Once he had funding for his first 'Village College' Henry got the site and a donation towards the building from a prosperous Sawston paper magnate, H.G. Spicer. In return, Spicer could put on cinema films for local people in the new College hall, he promised. But once it was up, the films were banned, leading to a major dispute.

The Sawston college needed to be properly opened, and who better to do so than the future King Edward VIII, then Prince of Wales, in October 1930. Yet here too there was controversy – the Prince had been expecting to open a new Cambridge University College and not 'just a bloody school'. But such 'misunderstandings' were more than compensated for by an article in The Times – which some thought Henry himself has written.

More colleges were to follow. The Chivers family gave an Elizabethan Hall at Impington to be the warden's house for their village's new college. But this was not to the liking of the most famous architect in the world, Walter Gropius, who designed what was considered the best building of its age in England. It was to be graced by a statue of 'The Family' by one of the finest sculptors, Henry Moore – but councillors refused to fork out the modest fee he requested. They also blocked payment for a mural by the distinguished artist, Graham Sutherland. It was not that they did not appreciate art – they did not appreciate the hectoring style of their Chief Education Officer.

However Impington did have a garden where vegetable and fruit was grown pigs and poultry fed. There was a workshop where boys and girls made real things for the home and classes in cookery, housewifery and infant welfare. Pupils dined together with their teachers, the meal commencing with a sung Grace and concluding with a reading. A child who had sat through these meals for four or five years would acquire sound food habits for life and a fund of good manners, Henry believed.

Things have changed since then, laments David Rooney, former Warden of Swavesey Village College where the drama group was priced out by new charges for such community activities. His most thought-provoking account of Henry Morris and his ideals was launched at the unveiling of a blue plaque at Darwin College where Morris once had a flat.

David Rooney will be speaking about Henry Morris at the 'Fenland History on Friday' meeting at Ely Library on 15th November, 10.30-noon.

"Henry Morris, the Cambridgeshire village colleges and community education" by David Rooney costs £10 from Village Colleges and the Cambridgeshire Collection, Lion Yard Library. All income from the sales will go to the Henry Morris Memorial Trust, funding opportunities for local youngsters to explore areas outside the flatlands of Cambridgeshire.

Shirley Brown started her passion for compiling books on Trumpington back in 1985 when she visited to the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard library to start her researches for 'Trumpington in Old Picture Postcards' which was published by the European Library from the Netherlands the following year.

In the introduction Shirley wrote 'There has been more written about Trumpington than I imagined ... identifying the buildings and tracing the people on some of the pictures has been as exciting as trying to solve a mystery'. She turned for help to members of the senior citizens, encouraging them to sift through their photo albums for snaps of otherwise unrecorded corners.

Since then she has added to these columns on various occasions. In July 2000 it was about the prisoner of war camp on Hauxton Road, in May 2001 she appealed for information about Gilmerton, a large house at the junction of Long Road – next month she was telling us that she'd tracked down one of the people who'd worked there. Another year passed and she was researching the Manor House and the Dove Garden, in 2003 she had another new book.

Now, a decade later, Shirley's done it again. Only this time she's excelled herself. For now as well as identifying fascinating old snaps she and her husband have taken modern equivalents in colour.

One of the prominent local photographers of the 1920s was Ted Mott who concentrated on areas such as Chesterton, Shelford and Trumpington. His glass negatives were preserved by Ken Humphries of Milton and passed on to the Cambridgeshire Collection. One shows Trumpington High Street with a splendid array of advertisement on the side of Harvey's Stores which then sold a wide assortment of goods. It was succeeded by 'Sybil' selling wool, haberdashery and underwear, then became the Post Office, now it's 'Granite Transformations'. Next door the former Holmlea Hand Laundry is now home to 'Mandarin Stone'. It's hard enough these days to snatch a picture during a gap in the traffic but Shirley also wanted a bus to match up to the Ortona open-top double-decker that Ted photographed. Eventually she got one in – nearly – the exact spot.

But a community is not just buildings, it's people too.

One page features a painting of a skating match on Lingay Fen in neighbouring Grantchester where the National Ice Skating Championships were held. Costing only one penny it was a very popular venue for Trumpington families in the 1930s and 1940s when most of them had their own skates. During the Second World War evacuees were allowed to skate free. But how could Shirley find an equivalent? Easy, she just got skateboarder Niall Meehan to stand still for an instant. It's a snap for his grandchildren to treasure in the distant future. Perhaps it will start them researching local history

As I work my way through the files of the News of October 1938 for my 'Looking Back' column I am discovering articles describing the preparation for air attack with instructions on how to construct your own shelter. One who did so was Cecil Galley who dug down into his garden at 71 Alpha Terrace. He paused just long enough to be photographed with his children, Ann & John. Today his shelter still survives and Shirley has persuaded the children of current owners Neil and Sarah Stepney to recreate the scene.

Postal services are very much in the news at present and the delivery man is a feature of local life. However back in the 1920s the post came not on two wheels but by donkey – as is shown in a glass lantern slide taken by the schoolmaster P.R. Robinson to illustrate a lecture in Trumpington Village Hall in February 1931. His pictures have survived but how many similar snaps are tucked away in attics or cupboards. If you discover such items, don't let them be destroyed. The Cambridgeshire Collection at Cambridge Central Library would be pleased to offer them a home where people like Shirley – and you – can appreciate them.

Memories 28 October 2013 by Mike Petty

Prince George was the focus of attention, “Oh, he’s lovely” was the general verdict and every detail of his dress, appearance and manner have furnished a fruitful topic of conversation in Cambridge homes. So the News reported back in November 1932, adding that the girls were especially enthusiastic.

They were covering the first Royal visit to a factory engaged in Britain’s newest and most progressive industry. HRH (later Duke of Kent) was not the only one to be impressed. When Pye Radio invited people to inspect their works in St Andrew’s Road Chesterton queues five or six deep stretched halfway up Haig Road. “It is amazing that a non-industrial town should have such fine works and few realised that we in Cambridge had such an important and highly organised industry in our midst. In these times of depression it is a novelty to find a works which is really flourishing”, the News commented. Pye became the first company to be granted its own Armorial Bearings; today its supporters are having difficulty getting permission to put up a Blue Plaque.

Last week scores of former Pye men and women made their way to a shed in the grounds of an old sewage pumping station just across the river from that old factory. They gazed fondly at obsolete equipment which was in its time the most up-to-date in the world.

On Coronation Day in 1953 many people had seen television for the first time. Memories of small black-and-white pictures flickering from large wooden cabinets are etched on their minds. But Pye were several steps further down the line, operating the first colour television outside broadcast ever seen in this country with three colour cameras sited on top of Government buildings facing Parliament Square and Whitehall. In Cambridge hundreds of people assembled in the Guildhall to watch the latest television screens. The picture was clear and precise but there was no control over the usual interference from electrical appliances which all TV owners are forced to suffer in silence, the paper reported. Six domestic TV sets were also installed in the Corn Exchange where because of the bright light, shields were fitted around the screens to enhance the image

In 1956 the Pye boss, C.O. Stanley, had prophesied that telephones for the use of the travelling public in aeroplanes, railways and road services were a possibility. Last week his former employees took pictures on their mobile phones of heavy metal boxes packed with valves, resistors and wires that had been built into motor cars to allow taxi drivers or policemen to communicate with their bases. Some remembered how they had worked with hot metal to fashion cases for mobile radios, then learned to do the same with plastic as technology evolved, transistors came in and the size of devices shrank.

Others had worked in the various factories scattered around the region, some making televisions, others military components such as the proximity fuse that was devised during the second world war to allow anti-aircraft shells to explode around enemy bombers – a device whose robustness was tested by dropping it down the lift shaft of the University Library.

There were more memories: of husbands whose work on Pye's mobile television studios had taken them far away to Africa, leaving the wife to look after the home and children – not an easy task when all went down with the 'flu. A former Mayor of Cambridge recalled working with the girls on the assembly line at Ditton Walk – but refrained from disclosing quite what she'd learned from them, preferring instead to pay tribute to the technical brilliance of other colleagues. There were speeches reflecting on the significance of Pye in the growth of the Cambridge Phenomenon and sadness that such an important part of the city's manufacturing heritage is now just history.

"Did you ever build a television station, or a radio-telephone, or equipment for an atomic reactor? And have you ever been involved in helping ships at sea, providing entertainment for the home – or bouncing speech off the moon?" Again a snippet from the past, this time the CDN of 6th November 1959. Some of those who read that article over 50 years are still around and now a team of volunteers, armed with the latest digital recording devices – which once would have carried the Pye logo – are recording similar recollections of more recent times.

One day, it is hoped, their voices will be heard coming from the speakers of polished-wooden wireless sets decorated with the trademark Rising Sun fronts that were crafted in the firm's woodworking shop. It will be part of an exhibition paying testimony to the legacy of Herbert George Pye who learned his skills at the Cambridge Scientific Instrument Company, then diversified into wireless. His company took Cambridge expertise into space ... the story is so vast it needs its own Museum.

And that is what the event was all about. If you can add to their files, if you have copies of Pye newsletters, snaps of sports days or Christmas gatherings, a technical manual for a guided missile, or indeed one of the early round-tube televisions, they would be pleased to hear from you.

But most of all, if you were part of the Pye story don't wait to be approached. Record your memories, if necessary on one of those open-spool tape recorders that were once the latest devices.

As the gathering broke up, people emerged to the shadow of the massive chimney of the Cheddars Lane Pumping Station, now the Cambridge Museum of Technology which may one day be the base for the telling of the Pye Story.

Memories 4th November 2013 by Mike Petty

It is 25 years since the eyes of the world were trained on a sporting event in Cambridge. Not for a cycle race but for a run round the Great Court of Trinity College whilst the clock struck 24 – twelve times for Trinity, twelve more on a diminutive bell for its neighbours, St Johns.

Two top Olympic athletes took part, Sebastian Coe and Steve Cram, the former being the victor, though the shouts of the crowd were so loud that he was unable to hear the chimes he was racing. They were repeating an event portrayed in a film entitled ‘Chariots of Fire’. But what was a ‘Chariot of Fire’?

It was a Cambridge hansom cab, commandeered by undergraduates as part of their Bonfire Night celebrations in 1920 and 1921. The vehicle was set on fire and then sent careering round and round Market Hill, being pulled of course by a most frightened horse! The cabman was handsomely compensated for the loss of his vehicle – in fact some say that they jostled to get their most decrepit conveyance taken off their hands – but I’m not aware anybody asked the horse’s opinion!

Numerous newspaper reports have chronicled battles between ‘Town and Gown. By 1860 attempts were being made to get the custom banned: Undergraduates have come to the conclusion they have something better to do than senselessly parade the streets followed by hooting Barnwell roughs and this year abstained from exciting the mischievous propensities of the hobbledehoy population by appearing in any numbers. Boys had crackers & squibs to themselves. One or two started a fire on Market Hill but was put out by police.

Even then things were not what they once had been: The Guy of former years was a figure dressed in modern but seedy clothes, supported on the back of a donkey by some partner of his saddless seat, his arms outstretched to denote the intensity of the torture he had undergone, his gloved hands bearing brimstone matches spread out fanwise to show his diabolical intent; his face red and apoplectic with no nose to speak of, eyes fixed and expressionless complexion highlighted by a large white frill and gigantic paper collar. The Cambridge guy this year was a hollow mockery, attired in a top coat of green paper copiously bedecked with spangles somewhat like a Chinese mandarin and borne on a stretcher, the Cambridge Chronicle reported on 10 November 1860

The classic picture of an old-time Guy was taken by a News photographers in 1932 It showed a gaggle of children outside number 39 Cam Road, Cambridge. They included Eric Ives, Paddy Bull and Ken Thorn – who later wrote in from California to add his memories.

“Bonfire Night damage worse than Enemy Action during the War” was how student magazine Varsity headlined the events of 1948. There were serious disturbances with a large crowd on Market Square including undergraduate women wearing gowns for the first time on bonfire night. Lamp standards had been bound with greasy tape to prevent climbers extinguishing the lights – but were themselves set on fire. Scores of fireworks and smoke bombs were thrown while rockets were aimed at the Guildhall clock. The interior of the Senate House was severely damaged by an explosive charge and 70 panes of glass broken. The priceless medieval glass of King's College Chapel narrowly escaped destruction. Three motor vehicles were damaged and four constables and at least four civilians were injured.

The old bonfire nights were 'fun' for some, but terrifying for others, Judi Pollard (nee Moore) recalled in Memories for November 5th 1999: "Living most of our childhood in Sidney Street I remember that when we were young my father used to take us to a friend's house in Chesterton to share their celebrations. But inevitably we would return home to find Sidney Street blocked off by the police to avoid the Market Square crowd rampaging. On one such occasion my mother, who had stayed in the flat, was bombarded by fireworks being thrown up against our windows. I can remember when in my teens my boyfriend and I crammed on to Market Hill with a few hundred others. Somebody let off something – probably home made – because it was the loudest bang I'd ever heard and the ground actually shook. As a finale to that evening we were then pelted with bags of flour by the people residing in flats over the Milk Bar and other premises on that side of the Square"

It reads like some reports of Halloween! Hopefully this year things will be somewhat quieter.

Memories 11th November 2013 by Mike Petty

Over the weekend communities throughout Cambridgeshire have gathered to 'Remember' people they have never known. The names engraved on village memorials commemorate those who fought and died in battle, for many of whom there is no other memorial.

In 1915 Arthur C. Benson, Master of Magdalene College, wrote "There is a little village near Cambridge the homely, summer-sounding name of which is Haslingfield. It is a straggling hamlet of white-walled, straw-thatched cottages, among orchards and old elms, full of closes of meadow-grass, and farmsteads with ricks and big-timbered barns. It has a solid, upstanding Tudor church, with rather a grand tower, and four solid corner turrets. Here Queen Elizabeth once spent a night". He does not note that before her father's dissolution of religious houses thousands of men, like himself, had made a pilgrimage there. Perhaps he never knew.

Benson was writing during the Great War when many Haslingfield men enlisted – or were sent unwillingly - to fight the foe. A sketch by William West depicts the scene in the Bushel and Strike where an old man sadly reflects that signs calling for volunteers are no good – nothing but 'scriptshun will save the country.

However men had left that village centuries before; one such was Lord Thomas Scales. Thomas had fought against the French army of Joan of Arc but been captured and imprisoned in 1429. Locked up in his cell he prayed to Our Lady and his prayers – and a ransom - proved successful. On his return home he brought back the shackles in which he had been chained – or was it the hinge from his cell door. He carried them to the top of the hill overlooking Haslingfield where he placed them in a little chapel that contained a statue of the Virgin Mary adorned with costly ornaments. The story of his deliverance by divine help spread far and wide, attracting thousands of pilgrims. None came empty handed, which enriched the priests and yielded benefits to the residents for every year at the feast of Easter, the whole village was packed

But the very existence of the chapel on the White Hill might have been forgotten were it not for a Shepreth antiquarian. John Layer, the son of a successful grocer in Cheapside London, settled in the village on his marriage in 1611. With no need to earn a living, he devoted himself to local history; transcribing manorial documents and compiling family pedigrees. Layer stored his notes in wicker hampers in the attic of his manor house, hoping one day to publish them. But that never happened and on his death his papers were dispersed, some being sold as waste paper at an apothecary's shop at Royston. Later antiquarians managed to reassemble the bulk of his manuscript whose importance was recognised by William Cole of Milton, Dr William Mortlock Palmer of Linton and the Rev J.W.E. Conybeare, vicar of Barrington, all of whom drew on his notes to tell the story of the shrine on the White Hill

In the 1930s a Gt Eversden lady, M.S. Gabrielle Breeze, revived the idea of a communal pilgrimage to the former site of the chapel. She planned a pageant, set in 1395 so that Chaucer and his merry pilgrims might be there too. Costumes would be home-made but true to the fashion of that day, there would be heraldic banners and shields, music and dancing, pomp and spectacle. But her timing was unfortunate: the date clashed with the celebrations for King George V's Silver Jubilee in 1935. It was put off for a year but then never happened. Instead eyes became focussed on the newly-established shrine of Our Lady at Walsingham.

By the 1960s Haslingfield historians were debating amongst themselves as to whether the chapel had really existed. There was however tangible evidence of its existence in the form of a bulla – a thick lead disk - of Pope Martin V said to have been built into the wall

A modern pilgrimage was held in May 1978 when nearly 400 Protestants and Roman Catholics wound their way to the site. They continued for a number of years, ending up with tea in the vicarage garden.

Now Jonathan Spain, like Layer a Shepreth historian, has produced a detailed account of the chapel on the hill. But who knows what more there is to be found – are there more documents tucked away in a chest somewhere. And are there other details to be shared. If you can add to the story email jonathanspain@wordpress.com. Or drop me a line and I'll put you in touch.

Memories 18th November 2013 by Mike Petty

Some weeks just seem more dramatic than others. In early November 1913 the Editor of the Cambridge Independent Press had two special stories to enhance his sales; both featured deaths. One was of a man who had murdered his wife, the other of a man who had dedicated his life to caring for the sick, only to take his own. One man's ending provoked little reaction; the other sparked a riot.

Frederick Seekings had been to Brampton Feast with the woman with whom he had lived, then on to a pub where they started to quarrel. The two left together and were later found lying by the side of the road. The woman was dead with her throat cut. Fred stated that she'd done the deed herself, but the blood-stained knife was found in his pocket. The jury had no doubt it was murder.

So on 4th November 1913 Seekings was awoken at six in the morning in the condemned cell at the County Gaol on Castle Hill, Cambridge. He'd slept well. He breakfasted on mutton chop, tea and bread and butter but did not make any request for beer, spirits or other intoxicant.

During his stay at the gaol he'd slept all by himself always watched by two warders. The Prison Chaplain had also been a regular visitor. He'd done no work, condemned prisoners not being required to do so. He'd taken exercise daily and was allowed to smoke and read any books he fancied. On the Monday he'd been visited for the last time by his brother and uncle and had even joked with them.

The executioner, Thomas Pierrepont, had arrived that night and slept in the prison. He did not need to see the condemned man, just to check his weight to ensure the drop was set right. It was a wise move – during his imprisonment Seekings had put on a stone. The execution took place in a small dun-coloured coach house built in the exercise yard adjoining the main wall of the prison. At the designated time the condemned cell door was opened and Seekings was escorted to the gallows. The hanging was expeditiously carried out, death being instantaneous. Fifteen minutes later a notice was posted on the prison gates.

But outside there was little interest, just a handful of people, chiefly composed of errand boys and youths. The black flag was not hoisted nor was the prison bell tolled, and there was nothing whatever to indicate that anything unusual was taking place, the News reported. They did however give a full report of the inquest that followed.

Dr Horace Dimock's passing was different. In January 1911 an Insurance Act had come into force which enabled the low paid to have free medical treatment and sickness benefit. Although popular with the poor there was considerable opposition from doctors who saw it as a threat to their livelihood. In Wisbech only two had agreed to operate the new panel system so Dr Dimock was appointed to cope with the flood of patients. Aged 32, a Stretham man, Cambridge graduate & former surgeon at Addenbrooke's Hospital & he became highly popular with his patients. But not with other Wisbech doctors. His name plate was pulled off his door and he was frequently called out at night to non-existent calls.

Then other doctors started to receive anonymous offensive postcards and the police staked out postboxes. Then they arrested Dr Dimock. He denied all charges but, tired and depressed returned to his parents' home where he was found dead next morning from an overdose of morphine.

In Stretham blinds were drawn when the funeral procession left his house in Red Lion Street – now known as Chapel Street – towards the church. In the churchyard photographers and cinematographers waited to record the scene, one setting up his apparatus on the table top of a memorial. Dr Dimock had expressed a wish that no flowers should be sent but the coffin was covered in wreaths from Wisbech

The cortege was met at the gate by the Rev Samuel Stitt and the coffin was wheeled on the parish bier into the church packed with mourners. Then it was on to interment in the parish cemetery. The proceedings were orderly except that one Wisbech man gave vent to some strong language referring to the way Dr Dimock had been treated. The police, of whom two were in plain clothes, had an easy task to perform, the reporter noted.

But not so in Wisbech where the news of Dr Dimock's death had sparked protest. A public meeting was held in the Market Place to express public grief and indignation. Feelings ran high and a thousand or more people marched to the home of one of the late Doctor's chief accusers where stones and bombs were thrown and windows broken – including that of a jeweller. Police reinforcements were called in from Kings Lynn and Peterborough, the Mayor read the Riot Act and constables charged the crowd, truncheons drawn. The riots lasted several days with every doctor's house guarded - except the two who had joined the scheme. Gradually all the others joined and peace reigned once more

Meanwhile in Brampton and Stretham two families were left to mourn their dead.

Memories 25th November 2013, by Mike Petty

It was in 1943 that John O'Donoghue left County Kerry and found work building a bomber station just outside Ely

The transport took him to the gates of a muddy field where in hard frost and thickening fog he waited to be assigned to a task. He tried to make some sense of the babble of voices around him, speaking in accents that varied from Scottish and Welsh to the almost incomprehensible Cockney, as well as the more familiar Irish brogue such as his own.

John was allotted to the gang working the giant cement mixer, shovelling stones and sand into the machine until his arms ached and he felt fit to drop - this was no work for a 43-year-old. Nor did he find pushing the heavy barrow piled high with concrete across narrow planks over deep and wide ditches any more to his liking. And when he tried carrying the bags of cement dust it got into his eyes as it did into every scratch on his hands.

By the end of three days he had had enough and said so in no uncertain manner. He was transferred to a gang of bricklayers but was not prepared to be bullied by the small foreman there and stalked off again. Surely somewhere in the mass of equipment that stretched across the site there must be something suitable for such a one as he. Fortune smiled on him, he was offered a post in the canteen, cleaning ranges, lighting fires, filling the big urns with water, dusting and sweeping. At lunch time he helped serve the plates of food, afterwards he had his fill from what was left. It would have been an ideal world were it not for miss bossy-boots – a local girl - who objected to his friends visiting the kitchen, whilst encouraging others who were in a position to supply her with fully-fashioned stockings.

When his ability to write resulted in a transfer from the kitchen to the camp office John was delighted, he was less pleased when he found that he had to add up columns of figures, and still sadder when he found himself outside again, labouring. He was one of a large gang sweeping the newly constructed runways, singing songs of old Ireland while the large Lancaster bombers were flying in to take their places in the big black hangers that he had helped to construct, when the announcement came that his labour was no longer required. So with not too much regret John once more boarded the train at Ely station and went off to seek his fortune elsewhere

The airfield he helped to build is now fading from memory. Barry Aldridge first discovered it as a lad in 1955 when out on a bicycle trip with school chums. He crossed the abandoned runways, climbed the stairs of the old control tower with its smashed windows and cables dangling down the walls and sensed something of its sadness. Then he left

Nearly 40 years later a visitor to Ely Museum asked whether there was anything about Witchford Airfield. No, they replied. But the assistant, Barry's wife Sue, knew that they had some photos at home. So it was that Barry met his first rear gunner.

Since then he has met hundreds of men and women for whom RAF Witchford holds indelible memories. Some husbands and dads had travelled half-way round the world from New Zealand to play their part in the war. Some had perished over occupied Europe, some drowned when their damaged planes crashed in the channel and some had got home to Witchford, only to be shot out of the sky by an enemy fighter.

Barry was one of a team that located the wreckage in a fenland field and excavated the engine of the giant Lancaster bomber. It was unveiled during a reunion visit of 100 former members of 115 Squadron who'd been based there. In 1996 the News photographed that engine with Barry, Terry Strawson, Graham Austin and Christopher Tooth of Grovemere Developments who have generously allowed space in their office building on the old airfield for a display paying tribute to the men and women who served at Witchford and its neighbour, Mepal.

Each item has a personal story and Barry wanted to set it all down, to ensure the memories did not fade away, as sadly his own have now done. But with the help of Sue and a dedicated team of helpers that ambition has been fulfilled with the publication of a 460-page book detailing something of the story of the men, women and aircraft that collectively formed RAF Witchford.

It was launched at the magnificent collection of memorabilia housed on the Lancaster Way Business Park just outside Witchford. Today the old airfield is home to knowledge-based businesses complementing established agricultural, manufacturing and distribution companies.

But many of the now fading eyes of the visitors on Sunday still saw the hangars where bombers were housed, the Nissen huts, canteen, stores and bomb dumps that John O'Donoghue helped to construct.

Thanks to Barry Aldridge they will not be forgotten.

Memories 2nd December 2013 by Mike Petty

Photography arrived in Cambridge about 170 years ago. "People fancy that everything which is got in London is better than the same thing in the country; but prima facie a photographic portrait taken by the action of light will be more perfect when the plate is acknowledged up in the clear atmosphere of Cambridge than in the pea soup affair which Londoners breath", the Cambridge Chronicle reported in August 1844.

Now the new "Beard's patent Daguerre type or photographic portraits (taken solely by the action of light)" was available to both town and gown from William Nichols' premises in St Mary's Passage. Although readers were informed that "photography is no flatterer, it paints us as we are, with every wrinkle and every stray hair plainly marked" the paper was confident that "success will attend upon the enterprise in this interesting branch of science". And so it proved, leaving a legacy of faces and a record of places that has captured the changing life of Cambridge even since.

One of the earliest exterior photographs shows Hobson's Conduit on Market Hill, from which it moved in 1856, although whether this was taken by William Nichols or by his more famous near-namesake Arthur Nicholls is not yet proven.

Certainly it is Arthur who is credited with the now classic photographs of Market Hill with its stalls, cobbles and onlookers turning their full attention to the camera which was recording them for posterity.

The 1860s saw Cambridge undergoing radical change particularly in Trinity and St John's Streets where three major building projects were under way. Trinity College constructed Whewell's court opposite its Great Gate, St John's demolished and rebuilt its Chapel and, in between, the old All Saints' Church was demolished.

These alterations were recorded by Arthur Nicholls who took photographs before, during and after the changes which were taking place only a few feet away from his studio at 5 All Saints Passage. Perhaps it may have been this disruption which caused his removal in about 1867 to Post Office Terrace, a small lane off St Andrew's Street. Once again he found himself in an area of change and Corpus Christi College commissioned him to take a photographic record of the Red Hart Yard in Petty Cury that was to be redeveloped as Alexandra Street

Later other photographers moved into the studios. They included John Palmer Clarke, Helen Ramsey and Lettice Muspratt and finally Peter Lofts. Each acquired the files of negatives stored in the ramshackled outbuildings. They include thousands of portraits, pictures of the Corn Exchange decorated for dances and a wonderful record of the hospital that coped with First World War casualties.

The cream of the collection however remain the street scenes recorded on glass plate negatives in the earliest days of photography. They have been reproduced ever since.

But there have always been difficulties to be overcome in the darkroom due to the length of time needed to expose the original plate. While men would be content to stand stock still as the shutter took its time to snap, ladies would not. The movement of their frocks left a blurred image which had to be corrected through skilfully touching up each print.

But a new exhibition of these old photographs by Peter Lofts has taken the art of improvement to an extra level. It is most apparent in the sky for now there are dramatic cloudscape that give the pictures a new dimension. And Peter has not stopped there; he has carefully enhanced the lighting on some of the buildings, bringing out detail that has never before been obvious. And he has even added colour to the clothes of the people waiting for their turn to buy from a Cambridge market stall.

The pictures are on show on the third floor of Cambridge Central Library for the next fortnight and are featured on Peter's website - <http://www.loftyimages.co.uk/> alongside other examples of the work of photographers of Post Office Terrace, the vast majority of whose negatives are now housed in the Cambridgeshire Collection together with detailed indexes recording the name of each sitter.

Memories December 9th 2013 by Mike Petty

Last week the Mayor of Cambridge joined local residents for the launch of a Cambridge Calendar with pictures looking back on their area of the city over the years

But there were no views of King's College Chapel; for this concentrated on another 'Royal' area of Cambridge – King's Hedges, to the north of the Arbury Road.

Now rapidly developing with new Orchard Park houses extending up to the Northern Bypass, it was one of the earliest areas to be settled, as archaeologists discovered during the postwar housing development that spread across the open fields

It included a Roman coffin hewn out of solid stone that was discovered by Mr C. Taylor when excavating a trench for a new sewage system in August 1952. He had lifted the lid, weighing many hundredweight, and there, completely enclosed in a lead lining was a complete skeleton. Nearby was another, also in good condition. It seems possible this was the burial place of an important Roman family, archaeologists speculated, as the stone must have been imported and the coffin was enclosed in a layer of chalk. Others recalled how a similar coffin had been found centuries earlier and been carried by the Monks to Ely as a more fitting resting place for Saint Etheldreda than the simple wooden box in which she'd been buried.

All that was too far back for those gathered at the Buchan Street Community Centre; nor did their memories stretch to the whippet races that had taken place off Arbury Road in the 1920s. In those days King's Hedges was a narrow country lane but then a Cambridge Town Planning Scheme envisaged the construction of a ring road and houses replaced hedges, some of which were prefabricated using innovative building methods to meet the desperate need for houses.

More plans followed in the 1950s and since then the fields north of Arbury Road have become full of homes. Some folk could still recall corn growing where Campkin Road now runs and the shops that had opened in 1963, providing residents of the then new estate with greatly needed facilities including a newsagent, greengrocer, butcher and general provisions store. Today just two shops remain, a takeaway and a Tesco Express. It was a useful supplement to Arbury Court with its mixture of facilities including the much-appreciated Branch Library, recently saved from closure by its Friends, and a pub named the SnoCat after the tracked vehicles that had carried Cambridge explorer Sir Vivian Fuchs across Antarctica in 1958.

But people needed more than homes, food and drink; they needed an opportunity to meet together. The foundation stone for a new church, the Good Shepherd was laid in the presence of Princess Margaret in 1957 and she returned in 1976 to celebrate its completion. A new Manor School opened in September 1959 with boys and girls educated separately; not until 1970 did it become co-educational and now it has become the North Cambridge Academy. It is not the only centre for education with Cambridge Regional College offering a range of courses while youngsters are taught at King's Hedges School originally built in 1967 but which has expanded with a new school in 1995. There's been a replacement Grove School too, opened in 1985 in place of the 1963 building that was badly damaged by fire on the day before the Arbury Carnival of June 1982

The Carnival itself has been the highlight of the year for youngsters for more than 30 years during which time it has featured a procession and the choosing of a Carnival queen and her princesses. If you were one of these then do share your memories.

But kids have found their entertainment in other ways: the opening of an Arbury Adventure Playground in 1972 gave them the opportunity to build dens and climbing structures while others will recall that glorious period in June 1970 when a freak storm flooded Campkin Road and provided an ideal paddling pool – though parents were less pleased as the wakes of buses ploughing through the water send mini tidal waves that threatened their houses.

Older members of the community also enjoy companionship; many groups use the Arbury Community Centre whose café provides a place to meet and chat while the Buchan Street Neighbourhood Centre has been providing activities such as karate and life drawing since 1990.

For the last decade they have also issued a calendar which this year is packed with pictures and information gathered as part of a project led by the Cambridge & County Folk Museum, now renamed The Museum of Cambridge.

If this is – or was – your part of the city then you will find it stimulating memories you thought you'd forgotten. Contact Binnie Pickard or Rachal Creek, at the Buchan Street Neighbourhood Centre; ring 01223 508149 or email bsnc@cambridge.gov.uk to get your copy.

Memories 2013 December 26

In December 1963, fifty years ago, a Cambridge News reporter overheard a conversation between two young ladies who were discussing the important issues of the day – Mods, Rockers and Mids.

“It makes life very much easier when you can see at a glance which group people belong to” said one. “You know immediately if they are one of you”

“The main thing is whether you think or not. If you do then its odds on you are a Mod. If you don't you're probably a Rocker. A 'Rocker' has long side-burns, leather jacket and tight jeans; drinks beer in half pints and loves to 'ton-up' on his motorbike without a crash helmet. He likes vintage rock'n'roll – early Presley or Buddy Holly. In fact he is rather Conservative – does not like change.

“Now a 'Mod' runs a sports or a scooter and wears Beatle-type jackets and bell-bottom trousers. He always uses a crash helmet and drinks gin and the like. He goes for the Beatles and country and western music in a big way and looks down on Rockers as inferior.”

But there was a third category and defining a 'Mid' proved more difficult.

“I suppose that's everybody who is neither a Rocker nor a Mod. The Don't Knows of the system. Either they don't care or can't decide which group they belong to. Or maybe they have just rejected them both”. She continued: “Take me. I'm a Mid because I can't afford to be a Mod and Rockers don't appeal to me at all.”

The system applied to all, boys or girls, she explained

“Girls come into this as much as boys. But it's the boys who set the pace and we just follow. The girl Rockers have short dresses, lacquered and back combed hair. They are never happier than when they are dancing in a tight circle with other girl Rockers. The boy Rockers are only thought of as a way to get home on the pillion of his motorbike. The funny thing is that girl Rockers marry boy Rockers earlier than the other two groups marry.

“Girl Mods are entirely different. They dance in splendid isolation – almost in a trance with skirts well below the knees and an arrogant stare on their faces. “Girl Mids cannot afford to be either of the other two or are getting into a new class – Respectable.

“Of course the whole thing stems from us young people wanting to be individual. To break away from set conventions. It shows in everything – especially in the way we dress”, she concluded. Her friend nodded in agreement.

But there was another issue occupying the minds of the musical youth: which were the better Beatles.

A few days earlier Cambridge teenagers had gone mad during a visit of John, Paul, George and Ringo. They'd queued for long hours to get tickets to hear them at the Regal, only to have heard nothing but the screams of other fans.

But out in Sweden youngsters were raving over their Scandinavian equivalent – Ken, Cliff, Dave and Robin, collectively known as The Phantoms. They had topped the Swedish hit parade with “Shakin’ All Over”, one of their ten best-selling singles and had also issued an LP. Now, rumour had it, they were each earning up to £70 a week, after expenses - about £1,200 in modern terms. And these rich, talented pop stars were locals.

Ken Leverington, a Pye electrician, had been in various local groups before he formed The Phantoms in June 1960. The group played at dances and cinemas throughout East Anglia and had a large following at Cambridge University, in fact two undergraduates wrote “Phantom Guitar”, which appeared as their first record in 1961 issued by Palette in America and Australia and Pye in England.

The record company's distributor in Norway had asked them to go over and things took off, Ken told the News in December 1963. The Twist had just started and they were such a success after a 14-day tour that they stayed on for two years working in Sweden.

They'd shared equal billing with The Beatles, Gerry and the Pacemakers and Chubby Checker and were due to appear with Cliff Richard and the Shadows, Heinz and Brian Poole and the Tremeloes.

Now Ken Leverington, Cliff Gentle, Dave Cooke and Robin Bailey were back home in Cambridge for Christmas. At least they could go to the Regal without being mobbed like the other pop superstars

But they would be returning for tours of Fenland, Germany and Denmark in the New Year.

So what became of them? And were you a Rocker, Mod or Mid?

Memories 23rd December 2013 by Mike Petty

Another Christmas finds many families separated from loved ones serving their nations in the armed forces. There are hopes that next year they may be home- but such hopes have been expressed before.

Seventy years ago Christmas 1943 was one such. After very dark years there was some hope that the tide of war seemed to be beginning to change. The Russians had repulsed the Germans on the Eastern Front, North Africa had been cleared and the Allied armies were pushing into Italy. The bouncing bomb had destroyed German dams and on Christmas Eve came news that General Dwight D. Eisenhower had been appointed Supreme Commander of Allied Forces with General Bernard Montgomery as his Field Commander.

But at home Christmas 1943 topped all others in the difficulties which had to be surmounted to make it 'merry'. The search for the Christmas dinner had been like the pursuit of a will-o-the-wisp, for never had the turkey - or even the humble goose, duck or chicken - been such a rare bird. Many householders sat down to an ordinary joint of beef or mutton, or possibly even a tin of Spam. Meanwhile nuts, crystallised fruits, tangerines, dates, figs and all the other tempting etceteras would remain merely a tender memory.

As usual every effort was made to provide a Christmas for those in institutions, though even paper decorations were very scarce. But at Addenbrooke's two Christmas Day babies received a set of clothes from Dr Wolf & every baby in the ward got a present due to generosity of other patients. The Mayor and Mayoress of Cambridge, Ald and Mrs. W. L. Briggs, made a particularly full round of calls to hostels and hospitals on both Christmas morning and afternoon, and it was well after tea-time when they made their way back to their own home.

And then there was the great Christmas drought. The landlord who could fill the flowing bowl that year was likely to be trampled to death in the rush of thirsty citizens.

Shopping had been little short of a nightmare, what with the acute shortages of supplies, depleted staffs (still further attenuated by the ravages of flu) and the problems of smuggling presents home when no wrapping paper was allowed. It had indeed been a case of 'he who hesitates is lost' for unless one grabbed a likely gift at first sight it was ten to one it would have vanished a second or so later!

There was however a new source of festive cheer - the Americans. The men had been saving their sweet rations for several months to give to the children whilst, it was rumoured, there would be Father Christmas and even Ice Cream at various parties.

Professor Frank Dobie was one American who recorded his experiences in 'A Texan in England': "On the afternoon of Christmas Eve I went to hear the carols in King's College Chapel, the singing of them by the Chapel choirboys being famous, through the radio, all over the British Commonwealth of Nations". Although the carol service was broadcast those who were present were aware that it was not the same: the interior of the chapel was dark and gloomy as the magnificent stained glass windows had been removed and replaced with wooden boarding for fear of German bombing.

Jack Overhill listened to the broadcast after dinner at the British Restaurant on Mill Road. He'd been woken early that morning by the sound of bombers setting off from local bases: "They kept roaring over ever so low; and then after going to sleep again I was suddenly awakened by a terrific explosion, the blast of which nearly sent the windows in. I guessed what it was: a bomber taking off had crashed bringing death swift and sudden to the crew; for I doubt if any of them survived that", he noted in his diary

That Christmas an Anglo-American services party was held at Cambridge Guildhall. There was a programme of music provided by the Thunderbolts Band with singers from America & the Cambridge Amateur Operatic Society choir followed by impromptu messages from the floor. There were lights, flags of Allied nations and bunches of mistletoe. These were a trap for the unwary amongst the 150 US servicemen & similar number of British women's services present, but not - so far as one could see - used! -or so they reported to the folks back home, for the proceedings were recorded for broadcast both here in and in the States.

At Grantchester the postman was joined on his rounds by the BBC's Gilbert Harding who talked to those who received letters and parcels. And for some folk the best Christmas cheer came when letters arrived from Japanese Prisoner of War camps - from men who at the time they wrote them, many weeks earlier, were still alive. Amongst them were Private Hewerdine who was amongst 20,000 prisoners in camp near Moulmein, Sapper Howard of Gwydir Street, Private Cullum of Darwin Drive and the Turkentine brothers - Sergeant William and Sapper Allan of Albert Street who had last been heard of in February 1942 following the fall of Singapore.

There were hopes and belief that 1943 would see the last wartime Christmas and that the men would soon be back safe and sound. Sadly history was to prove them wrong

Sylvie Short (or Coleman as she was then) moved to Swaffham Prior with her parents in 1954; she attended the village school before moving on to Ely High School then became a teacher, finishing her education as a Head.

But she has always had fond memories of her childhood village and sought for a book which would enable her to learn more of this unique community with its two churches, two windmills and a forge. Sylvie searched bookshops in vain, then decided she should fill the gap in Cambridgeshire's story

So one day in March 2010 she took the road that leads through Upware and along the concrete wartime road through the fen, the car bouncing over the humps and bumps caused by subsidence of the rich black fertile soil now under threat of being lost back to marsh under plans by the National Trust to expand the adjacent Wicken Fen.

On past the old station, now forgotten in trees, and the little stream where she caught sticklebacks in a jam jar, towards the school with its memories of dusty floorboards, trestle tables, dinners delivered in containers that had to be wheeled in from the gate on a trolley and the games of kiss-chase where boys would pursue their choice right into the girl's toilet block to claim their prize. And when ardour cooled there was the old coke stove searingly hot in winter and surrounded by tiny milk bottles whose cardboard tops were forced upwards and balanced on frozen milky columns.

Sylvie noticed the old Rose Cottage where headteacher Mrs Dowdeswell used to live, where pupils would be taken to dig the garden and pull up weeds. And does the tack room of Baldwin Manor still smell of saddle soap like it did when she went for riding lessons there, she wondered. Many of the old houses still stand but now no longer the home of childhood playmates, no longer could she enter so freely

The Red Lion, its walls decorated with old photographs, still provides refreshment for visitors and locals alike as it has for centuries, but the nearby Baptist Chapel has become a house, its congregation now dispersed.

And then there are the two churches that stand high and proud in the shared churchyard – why should there be two when much larger communities made do with just one? Sylvie recalled how sometimes she'd been the only worshipper at the evening service, having run through the frosty streets in her riding mac. Then Father Hicks would ask her to go and kneel with him at the altar and they would say evensong together. There was the old organ that her brother and she used to pump, alleviating the boredom by letting the air almost run out until the notes started to sound squeaky before pumping like mad – and making a horrendous banging sound with the handle. And still at the back of the church were the old parish magazines recalling everyday events of years even longer ago.

Villages once had a bellman who would parade the streets to announce important events and the Swaffham Crier continues to fulfil that role, no longer a person but the village newsletter. Over the years it has been a place where locals have been able to share their own memories. These Sylvie has drawn upon for a fascinating tour around the village telling the story of little cottages and the large Hall which once housed the Land Army Girls who worked to reclaim the once marshy fen and grow food that to eke out the ration. She charts the cricket club, the now long-closed shops, the now-dry pubs, the bakery and those two windmills.

And then there were traditions such as that recalled by Mr R. C. Benstead in 1963, “We children, thirty six years ago, used to black our faces and visit the more well-to-do houses on Plough Monday, and on arrival we would sing:

A sifting of chaff, a bottle of hay,
See the poor crows go carrying away,
Squeak by squeak they wag their tails
Hi nonney! Hi nonney!

“The “Hi” was shouted as loud as we could yell. One farmer would make us come up one by one and present us with a sixpence which, once grasped firmly in the hand, we would turn and run as hard as we could, with the farmer’s hearty laughter and his huge whip cracking at our heels. I don’t remember anyone getting caught by him.”

These traditions were recorded by Enid Porter, former curator of the Cambridge and County Folk Museum, and are now being revived by the modern village children as part of a Lottery-funded project. They will be performing the old dances and telling the old stories for parents and visitors at their primary school on 30th April before entertaining the masses at Reach Fair on 5th May

Sylvie Short has drawn together much of the village’s story a 230-page history ‘Two churches together’. But she would be delighted to learn more; email sylvietoat@tiscali.co.uk or ring 01945 74443

Memories 20 January 2014 by Mike Petty

The name of Joshua Taylor has a proud position in the annals of Cambridge shopping, its shop in Market Street becoming a firm favourite for many people.

But the firm had started in Ely in 1810 at a time when the trade of ready-made clothing was only just beginning. Their shop in Forehill had a sign that read ‘Tailor, Clothier, Hatter, Hosier & General Outfitter. Double-fronted with bow windows, the shop aimed to cater for the working man and its stock included plush forepart sleeve vest, pilot reefers, moleskin jackets, leather buskins and smocks. An assistant served customers with country wines and ales as well as clothing and transactions were chalked up on the counter – in those days a relaxed and genial atmosphere was formed which would become the hallmark of the store

Or so the story went.

But now research by Ely local historian, Pam Blakeman MBE, suggests that the story might not be true.

She has been investigating an ancient ledger from the firm between 1878 to 1881, now preserved in Ely Museum. It lists the customers and what they bought and now Pam has researched the bodies that were covered by their clothes.

Cole Ambrose, the Stuntney farmer bought tan gaiters, George Peck, the ironmonger, purchased flannel trousers, Angora coats and a felt hat, solicitor Harold Archer obtained clothes for his men and the Rev George Hall obtained his clerical coats, a silk hat and trousers for his servant.

But few other clergy patronised the shop. It was mainly used by well-off farmers and the better-off tradesmen such as Thomas Blakeman the currier from Fore Hill who was one of the firm’s best customers, his purchases including lawn tennis hats, cotton shirts and collars.

But why did his brother, Henry, lash out thirteen shillings for tweed trousers and another ten bob for gold studs and solitaires in 1879, when he was aged 22 – and why did he leave Ely shortly afterwards, never to be spoken of by the family again?

Like all history, the more you investigate, the less you know. Amongst the museum’s collections is a billhead showing the Ely shop with a note, ‘Fore Street, Ely – 1810’. But there’s another one from 1898 that reads ‘Established 1851’. So which – if either – is correct?

Pam’s researches find no mention of the firm in local directories before 1851. That year a man named Joshua Taylor, aged 34, was a lodger with Henry and Ann Bailey, eating house keepers where he’s listed as a clothier, hatter etc. He continued to live in the city as in 1865 he told the people compiling the Cambridge voting list he’d only slept in Cambridge six or eight times in the previous six months and had a residence in Ely

His shop was certainly established in Ely by July 1852 when Joshua Taylor appeared in court giving evidence against a man who'd stolen a waistcoat and a pair of stockings – he'd meant to pay for them, the accused claimed after he'd been detected. The magistrate did not believe him and he went to Ely gaol for one month's hard labour.

Sadly it was not just customers who shop-lifted: in April 1867 one of the assistants at the Ely shop stole eleven pairs of trousers and a large quantity of other wearing apparel – it was wholesale robbery. Two years later a manager at the Cambridge shop was accused of taking home two overcoats; he told the court that he was allowed to have goods at cost price and had borrowed a black coat so that he could attend a funeral. He'd intended to return it, but had forgotten to write it down. Joshua Taylor confirmed that it was their policy to take back goods within a reasonable time and exchange them, but they were not a second-hand clothes shop.

The wholesale and retail ready-made clothing warehouse in Cambridge's Sidney Street had been reopened by May 1862, advertising an entire new and well-assorted stock of the most fashionable, ready-made clothing including coats, trousers and vests for gentlemen and Scotch, Knickerbocker and Polka suits for boys. The advertisement thanked customers for the patronage bestowed upon the family for the last fifty years, but it does not say they were in Cambridgeshire all that time: at Whittlesey a draper by the name of Joshua Taylor was declared bankrupt in 1845,

In Ely the firm inspired loyalty in at least one member of its staff : Alfred Hammence spent all his working life at the shop where he had been apprenticed in 1863. Ely Museum has a picture of him standing at the entrance in June 1923 alongside Ernest Robert Taylor, who'd just purchased the business. Some of their garments are hanging outside, but it is a discrete display. Perhaps they'd learned the lesson of their founder, Joshua who had found himself in the dock at Ely in November 1865 accused of obstructing the pavement by hanging up goods outside his shop. He'd been fined eleven shillings and sixpence and had promised never to do it again.

If you can add more to the story of Joshua Taylor in Cambridge or Ely, I'd be delighted to hear from you

Pam Blakeman's 'Notes on the firm of Joshua Taylor in Ely' is published by The Ely Society – ISBN 978-0-903616-31-7 £4.50

Jesus Green footbridge is currently in the news as, owing to repairs, it has been closed for ten weeks forcing people to take a detour via Victoria Bridge or Magdalene Bridge.

It crosses the Cam near Jesus Lock and weir which were constructed in the early 1830s as a replacement for an earlier lock in front of the Fort St George public house on Midsummer Common.

A high wooden bridge was erected over the lock pen in 1851 with a lower one across the rest of the river. In 1860 the High Back section was very dilapidated and unsafe so estimates were sought from Mr S. Hurrell and Mr Headley for erecting an iron bridge to replace it. People would continue to cross, using the sluice keeper's swing bridge in the meantime. However things dragged on and it seems not until 1868 that work started. A correspondent to the Cambridge Chronicle had suggested the new bridge should remain the same height right across the river, making it easier to access from Chesterton Road. This was rejected as being too expensive.

Instead the replacement bridge was wooden and similar to its predecessor, being only inches above the water. This made for an exciting crossing especially in August 1879 when there was extensive flooding after more than three inches of water fell in six hours. The Cambridge Chronicle reported that "the lightning and thunder were awful in grandeur and the downpour of rain and hail terrible". The Cam flooded across Midsummer Common and water lapped within a few yards of Maids Causeway.

By 1892 the High-Back bridge had been condemned – it had long been out of date and frequently dangerous, councillors claimed. It was replaced by the present much higher structure, very similar to the one rejected in 1868.

It is a picturesque spot but has not always been a place to linger: a report from October 1873 expressed concerns about the state of the river which was polluted by the sewage of about 30,000 persons together with a vinegar factory and Ekin's Brewery. It was little better than a huge cesspool whose contents were churned up by the propeller of the Alma Mater pleasure boat, creating a serious nuisance. Other boats have continued to offer river trips into the countryside from near the locks.

Some people haven't needed bridges to cross the river here. In April 1903 Tom Barton, described as the world's champion log roller, entertained several thousands when he made a journey from the University boathouse and through Jesus Lock on a nine-foot long cylinder made of Bovril tins soldered together. A chair was passed to him, then a light table on which was placed a large bottle supposed to contain Bovril. It looked so easy that the challenge to any person to stand on the cylinder for two minutes and win £5 was irresistible – none succeeded!

In February 1913 the Cam Conservators received a petition from 50 regular users complaining about the satisfactory condition of the bridge and its approaches in wet weather. When there was any considerable rainfall the bridge became one huge puddle as there were no openings for the water to pass through, and the steps at either end were dangerous, being worn and sloping. The problem was that when old planking had become worn replacement planks had been nailed over it and water had got between them, rotting the old planks. One solution would be to bore holes right through both, so that the water could drain away – but that would soak people using the lock beneath.

More complaints came in July 1936: the bridge had not been designed for prams; two little children had been trying to push one across when it overturned and the baby was thrown out. However prams were getting less bulky and when one of the heavier ones came along people were not backward in giving a helping hand, councillors felt. A long sloping ramp would be very detrimental to the quaint old lock and increase the danger from cyclists. Instead the Surveyor was instructed to provide two cycle ramps on the steps on Jesus Green side of the bridge

When the bridge needed to be closed for repairs in June 1956 sappers from the Territorial Army were called into erect a temporary replacement using folding boats, road bearers and decking. It was capable of carrying three-ton military lorries but the City Surveyor added additional handrails to keep pedestrians and cyclists safe. This is not an option today and so pedestrians and cyclists need to cross elsewhere

The news that troops have been sent in to assist with the flooding in the Somerset Levels prompts reflections of similar activities in Cambridgeshire following the flooding of February and March of 1947

It had followed an exceptionally cold frost and snow that seemed it would never stop. Then came a quick thaw and heavy rain which filled the streams that flowed into fenland rivers. But there was nowhere for that water to go since a high tide in the Wash prevented its discharge to the sea.

The melted snow that had laid white on the black fen soil could not sink in to ground that was still frozen as hard as concrete. Nor could the ditches drain it away as they were full of ice. And anyway there was nowhere for it to be pumped to: the fenland rivers were already filled from high flood bank to high flood bank.

Then came the gale that brought down chimneypots, sent trees crashing and halted the men who'd been patrolling the banks looking for danger spots. Inevitably some banks gave way or were overtopped and acres went under water. Despite all their struggle the fenmen were beaten.

On 18th March 1947 floods devastated the area. Next day the military was sent in, choosing Bedford House in St Mary's Street, Ely, as their command headquarters.

One priority was to prevent further devastation. Scores of troops were deployed alongside river board workers attempting to keep the banks intact. But they could not stop a burst on the River Wissey near Hilgay. As water flooded towards Southery soldiers sandbagged the edge of the main Ely to King's Lynn Road, hoping to use it as the base of a dam. Their sandbag walls held but a culvert carrying a drain under the road collapsed and the pressure of water rushing through the confined space blew the road apart.

The hole in the road was filled temporally by army sappers who were based at the camp on West Fen Road, Ely. They were equipped with Bailey bridges and transport including 'Ducks' – amphibious craft that could both drive on roads and float on water. These were to prove essential in ferrying men and equipment around the flooded areas and gave many local residents the opportunity to take a voyage to view their flooded homes.

The most serious burst was in the banks of the Great Ouse opposite Bluntisham church where water was thundering through a ninety-foot gap. The breach had been stabilised with the help of German soldiers – now prisoners of war – but it needed to be filled. Sandbags, tarpaulins and men could be got to the battlefield but they were powerless against the strongest force of all – nature. Reinforcements came in the form of nine 20-ton amphibious track vehicles known as Neptunes that were used to form a metal box around the hole, checking the pressure of water and allowing repairs to be made up again.

Then, as now, the use of military might to help civilians made headline news and proved an excellent excuse for a Royal Visit. Pressmen arrived with their cameras to record the scene, the pictures were duly published and for the soldiers this operation came to an end. They moved on to other assignments leaving their Neptunes to be scrapped once the banks were built behind them. Perhaps the Ministry of Defence will sanction similar sacrifices of expensive equipment should rain continue to fall in Somerset.

Meanwhile the Duke and Duchess of Gloucester had headed north to offer encouragement to those troops and fenmen labouring to fill the breaches nearer Denver. They took a Duck along the Wissey but the engine of their craft cut out and they were swept towards the gap in the bank. Soldiers jumped into the freezing water to attach a rope and pull the stricken vessel to safety. This was however not a story that the army wanted to get out, everybody involved was sworn to secrecy. But one picture survives.

It was taken by Walter Martin Lane, an Ely shop manager, who had talked his way into becoming the unofficial army photographer and joined the soldiers on several of their expeditions. He'd been invited to cover 'Operation Neptune' and seen at first hand how the Naafi had provided much-needed refreshment for the soldiers deployed (though it was not a facility he was entitled to use). He'd also waited late into the night to photograph drivers who'd driven long hours bringing pumps from the coalfields to suck water off the fields and push it back into the rivers – just like the recent tv pictures from Somerset. Sadly once he developed his negative he discovered it was slightly out of focus. Like the drivers he'd been so cold he could hardly stop shivering.

Without Lane's pictures, now preserved in the Cambridgeshire Collection, much of the story of the 1947 fenland floods would have been forgotten. Today there is extensive video to ensure the devastation in Somerset is remembered, giving less excuse to forget.

But were you one of the troops deployed in 1947 or do you remember the troops who fought to reclaim the fen?

Memories 10th February 2014 by Mike Petty

Many feel the Cambridgeshire countryside is changing as never before; almost every week it seems that there are plans for new houses, industrial facilities or solar farms that will radically transform the landscape.

But things were much more traumatic a couple of hundred years ago, as Shirley Wittering has discovered.

Following the end of the Napoleonic Wars, agriculture had been badly hit: there was no longer an army and navy to be fed and unemployment was rising.

Some farmers tried to keep their workers throughout the year. Joseph Ellis from Thriplow employed 60 labourers and never turned them off except in cases of gross misconduct. But many others laid off men when they were not needed..

But those in work found they could not make ends meet. At Fowlmere in 1830 labourers went on strike for higher wages refusing to disperse for three days until a troop of mounted constables came out from Royston and read the Riot Act. After skirmishing five men were arrested and sent to Cambridge gaol.

The poor were looked after by the parish overseers, usually the farmers for whom the men worked when there was something for them to do. The relief was funded from the parish rates so officials tried to ensure they got something for their money; the able-bodied poor were set to work maintaining drains and ditches, pulling thistles, or picking up stones from the fields to be used for maintaining the roads.

But there was a major change under way – Enclosure. New farming practices meant it was better for large landowners if all their land holdings were together rather than being scattered across open fields. So they got together to apply for an Act of Parliament to tear up the map of the parish and start again.

The old system of individual strips of land in open fields had led to problems still common to allotment holders: the slovenly operations of one man had serious consequences to his neighbours, everyone was aware of the noxious quality of weeds whose downy and winged seeds are wafted by the wind and deposited upon the lands adjacent to him, officials reported

One of the great concerns was what would happen to the commons where the poor could traditionally keep a cow. However often they were damp moors of little value, being too wet and boggy to be of any value to stock and only suitable for grazing cattle in the summer times. Some parishes, such as Gt Shelford planted trees on them to provide firewood or fruit such as greengages and apples.

At Fowlmere villagers had nearly 200 acres of waste and common land which they could mow for fodder, gather dry manure and turn their cows on. They had another 20 acres as allotments on which they grew potatoes and other crops. They were worried that when the neighbouring parish of Thriplow had been enclosed the poor were left with no land for their use, except a recreation ground, and did not want the same to happen to them.

So the labourers called a meeting at the Black Horse and decided to seek legal advice. The landlord wrote to Samuel Wells, an Ely solicitor. who agreed to support them. He drew up a petition which was presented to Parliament and was successful in ensuring the amount allotted to the poor for spade husbandry was increased to 28 acres. The money raised by rent was also to be used for their benefit. By 1888 the income was £1,200 which was distributed among 90 people.

Fowlmere folk were also granted three acres for a cricket pitch – similar to the amenity land now being set aside during housing developments. But they were not satisfied, complaining that this was not much use and trying to get Wells to intervene to get it changed. However they still had not reimbursed him for his expenses and nothing further happened.

Shirley Wittering describes the ecological impact of enclosure as the new fields were surrounded by hedges to create what is now regarded as the typical South Cambridgeshire landscape increasingly under threat from development.

At Fowlmere, despite improved drainage, lands on The Moor remained wet and attempts to grow arable crops were largely unsuccessful. So in the 1890s an area was dug out to form watercress beds. By the 1930s it was giving full-time work to ten men growing cress that was sent by lorry down to Covent Garden Market in London until the mid 1960s. It was recognised as a site of special scientific interest and is today an RSPB Nature Reserve.

Memories 17 February 2014, by Mike Petty

A bright sunny morning makes it perfect for a stroll along the banks of the Old West.

The river glistens in the sunshine, the boats gently swaying at their moorings while on the land alongside men with machines are busy at work preparing the next crop in the black fertile fields. All seems tranquil.

But look again: those craft are not elegant holiday cruisers but long narrow black boats with signs in the windows warning of dogs and rubbish piled up on the bank adjacent. And those machines are not planting lettuce or celery but the high metal supports for a mass array of solar panels surrounded by a security fence that seems to go on for ever.

Agriculture is an industry that has diversified over the years. Today for some it is sunlight or wind that provides the best returns. For others it is bed-and-breakfast on a traditional farm, or a working holiday where visitors can recoup the cost of their stay by helping with the harvest.

That idea seems to have started in the 1860s when Richard Bath hired Osborne Farm at Friday Bridge, near Wisbech. By 1895 he had laid down 400 acres of raspberries and strawberries together with 27 acres of currants. At the peak season there was far more work than local pickers could handle so some 1,300 people flocked in, many from the East End of London.

By 1925 it was usual for them to stay for a month – men, women and children of all ages. They lived in tin huts, old stables or converted railway carriages. It was not pleasant, “in dry weather we were plagued by dust and in the wet we waded in mud”, some recalled.

It was not the farmer’s duty to provide amusements for his workers and the only entertainment was in public houses. Mothers brought their children but there was nobody to look after them in the fields and the working conditions produced a host of minor ailments such a sceptic finger. To leave it untended would be dangerous; to go to Wisbech to the doctor would mean a day’s lost pay.

Cambridge University started a ‘Fruiting Campaign’ to cope with such problems. Dons and undergraduates journeyed into the fens to organise canteens, arrange lantern shows, give recitals or teach boxing - and to preach the gospel to the poor whom they thought had been neglected by the churches in their industrial homes.

During the Second World War the workforce included Italian and German Prisoners of War who were housed in a POW camp. By 1968 it was Friday Bridge Agricultural Holiday Camp where board and lodging for the week cost £6 for men, £5 for women. Packed lunches were provided and sheets, blankets and pillows supplied. But guests had to bring their own Wellington boots and thick gloves if coming in June or July. That year they expected between 400 and 500 visitors during the peak holiday/harvest season.

But by 1968 the Friday Bridge camp had discotheques and television, billiards and table tennis, even a swimming pool. It was for a while the most popular entertainment place in the Wisbech area with local folk packed six deep at the bar.

However it was far from luxurious as John Mallon found when he arrived in June 1980. He paid £29 for his first week’s stay, collected sheets and pillow cases and made his way to a hut containing twelve beds. The mattresses were urine-stained, the roof leaked and the food unpalatable.

One of his companion campers had earned £19 for a single day’s strawberry picking but John laboured from 7.30am to 3.30pm and didn’t make half that. He was surprised how hard the work was, how much fruit it took to get to a pound in weight and earn himself five-pence halfpenny in cash.

When there was no work to do he deserted the camp with a lad who owned a three-wheel van and found work nearby, sleeping cramped in the vehicle when not moved on by police. They poured themselves a cup of tea from the urn brought out to the fields for other ‘campers’ who smuggled out food for them. And when security was not looking they sneaked back into the camp for a quick shower

John went on to other camps in Greece, Israel, Canada and Australia but regularly returned to Friday Bridge working alongside Latvians, Slovaks and Bulgarians. They sometimes laboured for more than 14 hours a day, seven days a week, picking courgettes or vegetables already frozen in icy fields. Many of them could not believe what they had let themselves in for, returning home impoverished and disillusioned.

But they had no voice to tell what they had experienced. John Mallon does, and he has recorded something of his findings in a book entitled 'Disorderly Fields'. Now he has given up the agricultural labour camps for a less stressful life in his native Wales.

But the crops must be harvested and the prospects of earning money by picking are still there. If you are tempted be warned that a statement from 1925 is still as valid as ever – "Don't come if the mere sight of work makes you go all of a tremble. We can guarantee plenty of work and we don't want you if you don't care about doing it" to me

I saw your article in today's Cambridge News (Feb 17) about fruit pickers, including an account from 1980. Terrifying what is history now, isn't it! It brought back memories for me. I had a fruit picking holiday as a student in the early 1970's, and I wondered if you'd be interested in an account of it. Feel free to use any of it in an article if you wish, but I realise that it might be a bit dull or repetitive.

I was a student at Cambridge, and I wanted a holiday job in 1972. So I got a job for three weeks at Tiptree, the jam people, in Essex. This job was directed at students, mostly foreign ones. The conditions were much better than described in your article. The board and lodging was £5. There were bunk-beds, with four of us to a room, and the bedding was included in the price. I assume that it was clean and comfortable, since it didn't register at all! The food was plain, but certainly edible, and there was plenty of it. We worked during the day, a normal day, and there was sometimes overtime in the evenings if we wished - that wasn't compulsory. One day a week, there was a coach trip to London for anyone who wanted to go. The foreign students were using this job as a means of seeing Britain, so naturally they all enjoyed these outings, but the British students (there were a few of us) stayed behind and put in an extra day's work. There was a disco in the evening one day a week. I can't remember the other entertainment - I think we just hung around and chatted to each other. It was certainly a wonderful opportunity to meet people from round Europe. I remember Danes, Turks, Hungarians.

I didn't find the work too hard, despite not being used to manual work. I aimed at getting £15 a week above my board and lodging (that would be £20 earned) and managed that with some extra. I remember using the extra to buy a traditional Yugoslav tunic from a student who was short of money. I did ask her if it was OK for her to sell it, but she said that she'd get another one when she got home. However, while I could earn £20+ a week, there were some foreign students who were shocked that I was working there to get a bit of cash. They said that they couldn't cover their board and lodging! There was also a row because we were paid per basket of fruit picked, not per pound, and some of the students had filled the bottom of their baskets with earth, putting strawberries on top to hide it. I gather that there had been a strike the week before I came to get the price of fruit picked raised. They got their extra price, but one of the farm workers told me that was because the height of the season was over, and it was getting harder to pick enough strawberries, so they always raised the price at that point!

The fruit was strawberries, raspberries and currants. Most of the strawberries were large strawberries, good for jam. We were allowed to eat as many as we wanted, but somehow after a bit, you didn't want to. At night, trying to get to sleep, when I closed my eyes, all I could see were images of strawberries, waiting to be picked! There were also Little Scarlets, the small strawberries used for the famous Tiptree jam. Those were very fiddly to pick, and we were paid by the pound rather than the basket. And we were NOT allowed to eat those!

The relationship between the farm workers and the foreign students weren't too good. I can remember that the Turks were communist, and they asked the farm foreman whether he was rich. He indignantly denied this, naturally. Then they said he must be a communist, and he was furious! Generally the farm workers seemed to think that the British students worked harder (and we probably did, as we were working for money rather than to visit a foreign country), but the farm workers also said that the best workers were another group of foreign workers, who were real farm workers, not students. So it wasn't just xenophobia.

Despite being a privileged Middle Class girl, at a famous university, I thoroughly enjoyed myself, and the work. I was proud that I could earn some money at a manual job, if only for a short time, and even that I could work harder than other people, and men - at that! Other times, other attitudes... Would any student want to prove their worth by doing a manual job now? Or a girl try to out-compete the men, because she was so fed up with being patronised? I realise that someone working on the land for a living would have a different experience, since we were working in the summer, and only for a short time. Still, even at the time, I knew that, and respected the 'real' farm workers.

My best memory is picking strawberries with a line of other students, and suddenly we started singing Beatles songs. Privately I felt that 'Strawberry Fields for ever' would be appropriate. But they didn't know that. So we all sung 'Yesterday', note perfect, word perfect - and I swear that there was even a hint of a Liverpudlian accent! Sung by people whose English wasn't that good. Beautiful.

Memories 24 February 2014 by Mike Petty

Its just 100 years that horse trams ran for the last time in Cambridge.

They had been part of the transport scene since 1880.. There was no doubt that they were too slow, and served too few places – plodding from the Railway Station down Hills Road either to St Andrew's Street or the Market Hill via Lensfield Road, Trumpington Street and King's Parade before finally returning to their tram shed on East Road for the night.

Back in 1904 there had been plans to electrify them - no smelly piles of horse droppings, no motor fumes. A new Cambridge Electric Tramways Syndicate came up with radical proposals for extra tramlines down Victoria Avenue to Chesterton, along East Road to Newmarket Road, down Mill Road to Romsey and Hills Road to Blinco Grove. There would be a service to Castle Hill and along Victoria Road as far as Garden Walk, they promised. But to break out from the town centre meant using Silver Street and that was already too narrow for the existing traffic. Then there were the overhead power lines which would be unsightly. The electrification scheme was scrapped.

The horse trams proprietors were jubilant, even their rivals, the horse omnibuses had gone out of business. But there was already talk of a new form of conveyance – the motor bus. They arrived in 1905 when not one but two companies started up, competing for the same passengers, racing each other to bus stops. However they proved too noisy & too unreliable. Within a year both companies' buses had been banned and the old horse trams, now renovated and repainted, reigned supreme. It was not to last; in 1907 J.B. Walford introduced the Ortona motor buses and competition resumed.

The motor buses were not restricted by tram lines, nor did that company have to pay a hefty annual charge to the Council to cover the cost of maintaining the roads. As the Street Tramways Company's funds ran out, the Corporation petitioned for them to be wound up.

On 18th February 1914 the horses were hitched to the trams for the final time. People were encouraged to take their children for a ride, something they would remember forever. When veteran driver Ephraim Skinner left Cambridge station he was joined by two of the town's prominent citizens, Dr George Cunningham and Alderman A.S. Campkin who were intent on making a last journey to the Market Hill. They never arrived, for when the tram reached Hyde Park Corner it turned right and trundled alongside Parker's Piece to the depot.

Also on board was a member of the Cambridge Constabulary, for there was little doubt that undergraduates would not allow such a momentous event to pass without a 'rag'. About twenty of them climbed to the upper deck of the last vehicle to leave the St Andrew's Street terminus for the station. Some carried musical instruments – a euphonium, bugle and trombone - on which they accompanied the chant 'The Cambridge trams lie mould'ring in the grave' to the tune of 'John Brown's Body'. Others followed on foot behind ensuring that the journey was a decidedly lively one.

But they got off at the Catholic Church and transferred to another tram making its way to East Road. The trumpets brayed, the men shouted and cheered, then started whacking the metal advertisement plates on the side of the vehicle. The din startled the horse out of its usual sober pace to something approaching a gallop. Fortunately as it neared the junction with Mill Road it was met by P.C. Dilley and other members of the Force who brought it to a halt and turned the 'raggers' off.

Soon the tram was safely inside the depot alongside the other vehicles under police guard. Then it was that some of the younger drivers indulged in a farewell cakewalk on East Road before joining the grand procession of undergraduates as they made their way back to the Post Office terminus where they formed a large circle, joined hands and sang 'Should Cambridge Tramways be forgot?' to the tune of Auld Lang Syne. Disturbances continued into the evening culminating with a final attack on the tram depot which was well protected by the boys in blue.

But it was not completely over. A few days later an auction was held of the company's stock. Crowds sat in the single and double-decker trams that were auctioned off.

The vehicles were well made, claimed the auctioneer; they would make good sea-side bungalows, summer-houses or cycle sheds; you could get your money back by charging for admission to see them. It tempted Mr Hunt of Coton to buy a double-decker for £10, Mr Hudson got a pair and the two single-deckers went to Mr Pamplin and Mr Wright of Haddenham.

Several undergraduates had expressed an interest in acquiring one for their college; if broken-down horses could pull it, then fit young men would have no problem in getting it home. There was one snag; it was illegal for them to use the tramlines, they would need to take it on a wagon. So instead grads bid for other mementoes: conductors' leather bag sold for nearly three times the estimated five shillings, drivers' caps made four-and-six.

Then it was the turn of the twenty-four horses which made prices ranging from 40 guineas for a bay down to twelve for ten-year-old 'Tiger'.

Drivers Ephraim Skinner and David Reader retired, others like Ben Sharpe were taken on by their formal rivals, the Ortona Omnibus Company.

The tram's epitaph was written by Will Thomas of the Black and White Concert Party

Who killed the Tramways?
I said the motor bus, for there wasn't room for both of us,
I killed the Tramways.

Although the trams had passed into history, the lines on which they ran remained. Those in St Mary's Street were removed in 1927 though sections have been discovered from time to time during road works.

Memories 3rd March 2014 by Mike Petty

I was recently shown some snaps taken in the centre of Cambridge. Unlike most they did not show the grandeur of the colleges. Instead they featured details on the walls of shops and businesses.

Elsewhere observant explorers might see sundials and initials, reminders of pets and even missing chunks of stone gouged out by the explosion of wartime bombs.

If you look up in Fitzroy Street you will see a bandstand on the roof of a shop.

That shop used to be Laurie and McConnal which opened in 1883 serving mainly people from the surrounding area. In 1900 they almost faced extinction after an employee noticed smoke coming from stacks of brooms, a bag of feathers, a stock of confetti and other material in the cellar, probably caused by a match dropped by a passer-by. Their staff set to work to extinguish the blaze and by dint of the application of water from a line of buckets and from a hose attached to the tap, the fire was practically extinguished before the arrival of the fire brigade.

Three years later they were not so lucky. On Friday 13th February 1903 flames again ripped through the store. Once more the fire fighters rushed to the scene but in those days they had no fire engine they could bring – just six hose reel carts stationed at various parts of the town. With no pumping equipment they relied entirely on the poor mains water pressure and quite expected the whole of Fitzroy Street to be devastated. In the event the street was saved, though the shop was left just a mass of blackened ruins.

But Mr McConnal was not one to accept defeat. He moved some of the salvaged stock to the garden of the house in which he was lodging, opened a temporary shop in Fair Street, accepted an insurance settlement and set to work constructing a magnificent new building.

They even had a roof garden specialising in sixpenny ham teas. It was most pleasant in the hot summers when ices were served to patrons lounging on deck or cane chairs at small tables surmounted by large striped parasols. Tubs of flowers dotted the roof and patrons enjoyed a really wonderful view of Cambridge as they listened to the music of a violinist

Then in December the shop would engage eight instrumentalists from the Cambridge Town Band to play carols on the two or three Saturdays running up to Christmas. One of those who performed there was Robert Austin, president of the East Anglian Band Association who shared his reminiscences in the News fifty years ago.

“I was very much the junior of the Town Band and it was probably because of the difficulty of getting senior bandsmen away from work on Saturdays in those days, that I was included to make up the number. It was, on occasions, intensely cold up there, so much so, I remember, that one particular night the trombone player had to pack up because his slide refused to ‘shift’. My share of the ‘spoils’ was four shillings per Saturday which, having in mind my tender years and the then value of money, made me a temporary millionaire”

It was not an easy place to get to: he had to climb three flights of stairs, borrow a ladder, open two fanlights, climb a railing and walk across the roof of the store, 100 feet above shoppers

“The immediate view below was also interesting. Fitzroy Street was a very busy market place in those days with shops open until, 9, 10 or 11 p.m. on Saturdays. Each side of the street was lined with costermongers’ barrows and both footpaths and the whole roadway was chock a block with pedestrians. The sight of hundreds of white faces staring up at the bandstand was, from the latter point of vantage, one really worth seeing”

It was an idea reprised in June 1975 when the Kite Community Action Group arranged for eight members of a local jazz group to revive the tradition, but by then there was precious little to sing about.

Throughout the century Lauries had expanded until it occupied much of their side of the street. In 1950 a planning report suggested that the Fitzroy Street should be reconstructed as a valuable relief for shopping pressure in the historic centre. The debate dragged on for over 25 years blighting other developments. Eventually Laurie & McConnal announced their closure, blaming planning indecision. In January 1978 the store reopened for the last time as the auctioneers moved in to sell off the fixtures and fittings. Between 200-300 people came for one last look, most of them strangers, but a few of the old employees called in to pay their last respects as a giant of the Cambridge shopping scene passed into history.

Since then other shops have traded from the old building and the bandstand on the roof continues to dominate the skyline.

James Reynolds Withers was born at Weston Colville, near Newmarket in May 1812.

His father had been village shoemaker but had fallen on bad times so, when the boy was born, he was a less than welcome addition to the family's precarious budget.

There was no money for schooling so the lad was sent out at an early age to pick stones, weed corn and scare birds, gaining what little education he could from his mother as she sat and stitched from morning till night. Writing he never cared for and arithmetic left him cold but he did learn to read the old ballads and broadsheets that found their way into the village.

As he watched the farmer's sheep he read of Robin Hood, Robinson Crusoe and the Pilgrim's Progress. He also absorbed something of the natural life around him, the flowers of the fields and the birds he was employed to keep in the air. When aged 12 he went to work for a market gardener at Fordham, finding more reading matter in the tattered pages from Shakespeare among the waste paper from which he made seed bags.

There was much more reading at Magdalene College, Cambridge. So there he went — not as undergraduate but as under-porter, though he soon felt confined in the bustle of the town and returned once more to his old job and old wage.

Good fortune came his way in the form of a legacy from his deceased grandmother with which he entered into his father's old trade, learning from the man who had succeeded to that business. It was not a success; he returned to Fordham, took a wife, started a family and failed to earn enough to support them. In 1846 in desperation he turned to Newmarket workhouse for relief.

*Two days in the week we've puddings for dinner,
And two we have broth so like water, but thinner.*

All the while he was composing rhymes, though his inability to write made it difficult for him to set them down until a farmer's wife took notice of him and funded his first volume of poetry, published in 1854. Two years later a second volume appeared and Macmillan's Magazine of 1860 hailed him as Cambridgeshire's hedge-side poet.

His fame spread, he travelled to Windsor, Bath and Bristol, and received many letters of encouragement from Charles Dickens, Tom Hughes, author of Tom Brown's Schooldays and Her Majesty Queen Victoria who included a welcome gift of £50.

His output and his income increased but soon his literary friends passed away and his capital was lost in a disastrous investment. Villagers in Fordham rallied round to ensure he could continue to live a thrifty life in his cottage. When he lost his daughter and then his wife one of his remaining admirers built him a house in the north of London, though Withers decided to stay in Cambridgeshire until his death in 1892.

His verses cover many topics, some of them local. Fordham fire brigade ("They all stand ready, full equip'd, against the hour of need"), Wicken ("Going to your church, is like going out of town, Not pleasant at all when the rain is coming down," and his native village of Weston Colville:

*The foot-paths leading through the fields and grove,
Where once a careless boy I loved to rove,
Are overturned by the encroaching plough;
And I should trespass if I walked there now.*

Others deal with the many hardship of life including a complaint to the lady whose cow insisted on eating his flowers, a final frustration for a keen gardener as he grew old

*And when I try to frighten her, and stamp and loudly bawl,
She licks her nose, and coughs, and stares,
And does not mind at all.*

It was in his old cottage by the stream that James Withers finally ended his days. Fellow villagers erected a memorial in the churchyard, and have named a housing complex in his honour. But latterly his fame has somewhat faded from memory

Now a display dedicated to the poet and his work has been established in Fordham church. Copies of his poems are on sale and the writings of the man who was compared to Byron or Burns can be appreciated.

The books of poems have long been out of print, though now if you have a computer connected to the internet you can just enter his names in the Google Books site and download them to your laptop.

The news that Peterhouse, Cambridge University's oldest college, is participating in an innovative Community Land Trust initiative on some of its land at Stretham has echoes of a previous scheme set up in the 1830s just a few miles away at Manea.

There a Methodist Lay Preacher produced plans for a new Garden of Eden for socialists. William Hodson from Brimstone Hill, Upwell, wrote a letter to the Wisbech newspaper 'The Star in the East' announcing his intention to establish a colony for working class people on 200 acres that he owned at Manea.

Initially 50 families would cultivate the land and eventually buy it from him. They would construct their own homes and lead a life of perfect unity and equality, having as their motto 'Each for All'. The houses, built from bricks made on the site, would be heated from a central point to avoid the labour of making 50 fires, the cooking will be done communally and a spacious dining room erected. A school taught by the best available masters would educate the children to a level far superior than the present nobility", William promised in 1838.

There was more: machinery would be introduced, a steam engine for threshing, and a windmill to drain the clay pit and provide power to operate brushes for cleaning knives and boots. They would have a four-hour day and leisure time would be passed in study or sport, in walks along the river bank or trips on the Colony's boat.

This was not all just idle chat - it actually happened. The workers wore their own uniform - men in a Robin-Hood like tunic with straw hats in summer - and they had music whilst they worked in the fields. Money was abolished; instead colonists were given labour tickets and 'he that shall not work, neither shall he eat'.

Of course this was far too far advanced for the Cambridgeshire fen-folk, to understand. Cambridgeshire newspapers would be biased in their reporting so they had their own paper 'The Working Bee' to put their point of view.

William Hodson the prime mover and disciple of socialist idealist Robert Owen, toured the Midlands encouraging more workers to forsake the grimy factories where they had to touch their caps and say 'Sir' to the industrialists and participate in this Utopian experiment. It would only cost them £15 a head to join the community (about £12,000 in today's money).

Hodson also tried to get a union formed between Manea and the other experimental communities then being set up. He failed. What was worse, his wife did not support his ideas and soon great tales of immorality & drunken orgies were spread about him and his famous colony. Some of the early members were not what he would have hoped – they were people 'penniless in pocket and bankrupt of moral qualifications' who gave up and went home, spreading gossip to disguise their own inadequacies. Then his banker friend James Hill of Wisbech went bust.

In February 1841 the Manea Fen venture was abandoned - though there's still a name 'Colony Farm' and one or two reminders of what was once a revolutionary ideal

Thus Manea's third chance for national fame evaporated. The first had been in Roman times when a new town with a massive tower overlooking the fens had been constructed to demonstrate their dominance of an area previously the centre of resistance to their authority. The great Stonea camp disappeared into the peat, only to be rediscovered and excavated centuries later.

Then in the 1600's King Charles I planned to build a new town at Manea to celebrate his achievement in draining the fens. Sadly he found himself in dispute with a fenman named Oliver Cromwell and his grand plans for 'Charlemont' came to nothing except for pile of earth and rubble in the middle of the village. Dubbed "Charlie's Mound" it was levelled to make room for the Co-op. Recently the name has been revived for a housing estate.

Time will tell if the present scheme succeeds in accomplishing what the Romans, Royals and Socialists have failed to achieve.

Stonea Camp – a model of the Roman settlement

Memories 24th March 2014 by Mike Petty

I've been attending Women's Institute meetings for nearly 50 years – usually as speaker.

The first was in a WWI wooden hut on the corner of my village recreation ground when the room was filled with ladies who'd known me all my life. There was the singing of Jerusalem, the business meeting and all the traditional aspects of WI meetings.

Since then there have been many meetings. Probably the most memorable was last year when I travelled out to Somersham to the most scary audience I have met so far. The ladies were welcoming and hospitable. It was just that they had spiders in their hair and had left their black pointed hats on the table. But then it was near Halloween and I had been warned!

So the prospect of a trip out to the village of Caldecote was not especially exciting. The sat-nav told me that it was somewhere near Bourn and, thinking about it, I remembered I'd been there many years ago to visit a gentleman whose name now eludes me. He'd lived in a somewhat unconventional house – but then Caldecote had a large number of such dwellings. I'm told that recent refurbishment has recently revealed an old railway carriage concealed within the structure of what appeared to be a bungalow.

His home appeared to be built of concrete blocks. The main room was full of piled-up furniture with just space to sit on a settee facing the fireplace. Then from somewhere beyond he carried in a large watercolour painting of a local scene, a milkman in a barn. It was followed by another canvas, then another. I was allowed to take them outside to the garden so that I could take colour transparencies for the Cambridgeshire Collection. Doubtless they're still there

The artist was Charles Brock, best-known with his brother Harry for their drawings published in Punch. In 1905 he'd produced a sketch of Cambridge Free Library to mark its 50th birthday, showing dons and undergraduates, old men and schoolboys sharing the wealth of material collected for their use. Ronald Searle had been in that library browsing through the pages of Punch when his eye was caught by a Brock cartoon. The name was familiar as he had often admired his paintings which hung in the Y.M.C.A. Searle decided to write and seek the great man's autograph. Turning to Who's Who he discovered to his surprise that he could deliver the letter by hand, for the address was Storey's Way. Later Brock's work had gone out of fashion and nobody had wanted it - which is why it had been amazing to find so much preserved by a Caldecote enthusiast.

I didn't mention this to the WI ladies. Instead I'd just jotted down some of the stories I'd carried in my daily Looking Back column in the News over the last 18 years.

They didn't seem concerned they were 'living on the edge of a volcano' and might at any time be overtaken by a grave outbreak of disease, as warned in an article in 1948. Then water had been delivered weekly by council water cart as otherwise there was just rain to drink. Today it appears they are on the mains. They also now have electricity – it had arrived just before Christmas in 1952 when WI talk had doubtless been about all those new domestic appliances such as cookers and washing machines that would make their lives easier.

But would they be allowed to stay in their homes? In those days the planners had wanted the Highfields area of the village to be allowed to rot and all the people to drift away. They had banned all permanent development on the smallholdings that made up the community. However this was overruled by the Ministry of Housing in 1954, giving residents the chance to improve their properties. Some of the ladies had first-hand experience of what happened afterwards, recalling the support families been given by Captain Adrian Hudson, a self-confessed 'Colonel Blimp', who'd fought a long battle against bureaucracy, becoming one of the best-known of eccentrics until his death in 1973.

One asset Caldecote did have was a village hall. When it opened in 1931 it had heralded a new era in the social life of the village. Made of timber – the ladies called it a wooden hut - it was tastefully decorated and had a piano. Some had worried it would become a young 'hell on earth' with dances continuing until two in the morning, but several of the members recalled it most fondly.

It seemed I'd spoken there last time I'd come to their WI about ten years ago. This week we met in a grand new modern room complete with electricity and water. Things have obviously changed.

Some things have not. The warmth of their meeting, the companionship that embraced both those born in the community and those who have arrived only recently from far-away places such as Mexico, were in the best tradition of the WI. And as for the cakes ...

Memories 31st March 2014 by Mike Petty

A couple of weeks ago I received a letter from a firm of Cambridge Solicitors to tell me of a bequest. Mr Frederick Stanford had passed away and bequeathed me all his photographs, many of which related to Cambridge.

My first step was to consult Chris Jakes at the Cambridgeshire Collection who refreshed my memory of how Fred Stanford had made a photographic survey of parts of the city in the 1980s after I'd suggested this would be an important project. He'd deposited many of his pictures in the Collection over 25 years ago and Chris confirmed that he'd be pleased to add any others to their files.

So last week I made my way to a terraced house in one of the streets off Mill Road and, with the solicitor, climbed the uncarpeted stairs to the back bedroom that had been Fred's photography laboratory.

Then it was a case of systematically searching, opening suitcases full of clothes and discovering mementoes of a long life. Amongst them were albums and boxes of photographs together with folders of negatives.

Mr Stanford was obviously greatly into things military for he photographed the royal Anglian Regiment march through Cambridge when they received the Freedom of the City in July 1984. He also snapped former members of the Cambridgeshire Regiment parading to Ely Cathedral in June 1992 and various Burma Star Day events in Cambridge and Barkway.

There were photos of the signal box at Waterbeach crossing pulled down on 28th April 1985, of the construction of Elizabeth Bridge and the bus shelter at Drummer Street bus station. There are also copies of pictures of members of his family during the Great War, of J.R. Odell chimney sweeps with their bicycles and of a street party – but which one?

Amongst the albums was one containing a picture of soldiers being photographed in front of a sign that reads 'Bops Line Hakuna Ruska Kurpita Hapa' which seems to relate to Kenya in the 1950s. It continues with snaps of Nairobi, Benghazi and a Pay Corps dance in Lumsden cookhouse. Further into the album are pictures of a garden fete at St James' church Cambridge, probably in 1955, one of which is captioned 'Colin and I running the cub's treasure hunt'. However these were not taken by Fred. For the album comes in a bag labelled 'These photos are the property of Ron the Brake, Young Street, Cambridge'. I'm sure he would wish them to be returned to the family and I'd be happy to do this on Fred's behalf.

However amongst all the pictures there are very few of what I had expected. For Fred had spent a great deal of time walking the streets of Cambridge photographing areas not normally recorded. Yet there are just half-a-dozen such pictures, including one of the Tapei Meal restaurant in Mill Road, snapped on 5th April 1996 and views of Castle Street

But this had been his grand project. Thinking back I recall that the last time I'd seen the photos was about 12 years ago in a second-hand book/antique emporium under the arches of Coldham's Lane railway bridge. I wondered whether they might still be there, so braved the road works to revisit the scene. Now the store has gone.

So what happened to the pictures? Obviously they were Fred's property and he was entitled to dispose of them as he wished. Hopefully somebody who appreciated their significance will have snapped them up. But if they're tucked away in the back of a lockup or stored in an attic then do let me know so they can be reunited with his other photographs and be appreciated by researchers both now and in the future.

to me

Dear Mike

What a surprise to open today news and see photos of two of my friends . They are the Rover Scouts in the photo at Queen Edith School .

I say friends unfortunately I have lost contact with one of them but in regular contact with the other and we both would like to hear from Ron

The two are Colin Chambers (on the left) and Ron Milton . Colin rang me first thing this morning to say had I seen the photo. I said he had beaten me to ringing as I was just about to ring him on the same subject .

Colin cannot remember the actual event and why they were there as they were in the 13th Rover Crew based in Marmora Road .The only explanation he could come up with was that Ron lived in Godwin Way and his Farther play the organ at the church. As Ron and Colin were good friends he assumed that Ron had asked him to come along and give him a hand.

Hope this helps

Memories 7th April 2014 by Mike Petty

Last week I joined a group of children from the Robert Arkenstall School at Haddenham as they made their way on an excursion into the past. With dockey boxes packed we clambered up onto a luxury coach to make a journey to a place I myself had visited for the first time when I was their age.

In those distant days of the 1950s the object of our expedition had been the chapel at King's College Cambridge with its high vaulted roof, walls adorned with magnificent carvings of lions and crowns - though nobody pointed out the graffiti carved by the soldiers who'd used it as stables during the Civil War. It made a tremendous impression on a young fen lad.

But last week we were not going into any of the Colleges. Instead we were heading to what was in my day the Cambridge and County Folk Museum, now renamed the Museum of Cambridge. There the children would learn something about the work of Enid Porter and see some of the objects that she and other curators have amassed recording the fascinating history of county folk.

So we set off, past the site of a museum that had been started by children of their own age and which had gone on to attract worldwide attention, even being featured by Dave Allen on one of his television programmes. Now that Farmland Museum has left its Haddenham roots to find a new home near the ancient Denny Abbey where the Delanoy brother's treasures, many given by Haddenham people, are now displayed beside other farming memorabilia.

The newly opened Methodist chapel tearoom with its home-made cakes was a tempting stopping point. The last time I was there I'd chatted to a carpenter who casually mentioned how he'd restored the woodwork surrounding the grave of the Unknown Warrior in Westminster Abbey, just one of the many commissions he'd undertaken whilst a craftsman at Rattee and Kett. But such a pause could easily take hours, this time there was not the time to spare.

Ahead we spotted the sundial and the high spire of the Baptist Chapel and wondered why Holy Trinity Church did not have one too – was it true that there had been a collection to raise the cash, only for it to go missing at about the same time as the treasurer had emigrated to America?

And there was the pub whose door step stands as high as the top of Ely Cathedral, near where was discovered a mounting block for a horse which on investigation was found to be an memorial stone to Ovin, steward to St Ethedreda. Inside the thatched inn is a hiding hole where Catholic priests could take refuge from fellow clerics stoutly opposed to their preferred method of worship. And there in the ground beyond were the graves of ancient people whose bones had been discovered only recently following excavation work for new homes.

For those on the right there was the fire engine house from which the manual fire engine had been fetched on the February night in February 1939 when a cottage had caught fire just down Hill Row. Sadly when they arrived they did not have enough hose to reach to the hydrant and so had to resort to passing buckets of water from hand to hand. By the time the Cambridge brigade arrived it was too late to save the house or its occupant.

Now those on the left could crane their necks in the hope of a glimpse of the Hinton Hall, once home to the man celebrated for composing the words of the hymn 'Land of Hope and Glory', who would set off on his bicycle down to the village station in Grunty Fen as he returned to the Cambridge college of which he had been Master. That college was Magdalene, just down the road from the museum to which we were journeying.

Across the road was the water tower, erected to replace the roadside pumps where you had to queue to operate the large handle that forced a supply of liquid, often contaminated, into a bucket to be carried on a yolk all the way home to a cottage where running water was something known only when it rained, dripping into the bedroom through the decaying thatch of the roof.

Now the view opened up, the fields sloping steeply away across the old pit which had supplied the clay to make bricks for village homes, examples of which are to be found in the village's magnificent brick museum that has been open at the Blossoms and Bygones celebrations.

The blossoms were to be seen on the remains of the orchards which had formerly spread along the south-facing slopes of the great island in the fens on which Haddenham stands. On those slopes monks once planted vineyards to produce grapes for wine to quench the thirst of pilgrims who passed this way to Ely. For until the late 1700s the main road clambered up from Aldreth and the ancient causeway that led through the mashes to Cambridge. Was this the route defended by Hereward the Wake when the Norman king, William, had attempted to overcome the rebels defying his conquest?

Now the grapes have gone but there's a new crop – acre upon acre of solar panels to harvest the sunshine to turn into electricity. Beyond lurking in the polluted haze was journey's end. But that was still fifteen miles away for we'd just reached the boundaries of their parish. Ahead lay Wilburton with all its mysteries.

And who says history is boring?

Ps the kids finally arrived and had a wonderful time learning about witches, cures and country tales.

The new BBC TV series 'The Crimson Field' features the work of volunteer nurses coping with the casualties of the trenches during the Great War

There were a number of Red Cross VAD hospitals here in Cambridgeshire, continuing the recuperation of soldiers who had been patients at the First Eastern General Hospital in Burrell's Walk

The first opened on 2nd November 1914 for Belgian refugees and patients from the hospitals of Antwerp. Three large empty houses in Cintra Terrace, Hills Road, were placed at the disposal of the Cambridge Women's Voluntary Aid Detachment. Now the volunteers who had been practising since the outbreak of war and had learned the practical side of nursing at Addenbrooke's Hospital had a Hospital of their own. The houses were swept and scrubbed and the girls drove around Cambridge collecting the furniture which had been promised by the Red Cross Society bringing in mattresses, coal scuttles, glasses, dish-cloths and all the other essentials. Despite their efforts Cintra House was old fashioned and inconvenient and lasted only a few months but then other homes for wounded soldiers sprang up.

There were three in Cambridge: St. Chads on Grange Road with lofty sunny rooms facing south, croquet on the lawn and a recreation room with a billiard table, Wordsworth Grove, under the Command of Alex Wood and "Huntly" in Herschel Road.

In surrounding villages accommodation varied as Church Schools, Baptist schoolrooms, Parish Halls, houses and Institutes were pressed into service. One was Mount Blow at Great Shelford which had lovely views and even a chalk pit which was adapted to form a miniature rifle range so the soldiers could practice shooting once again.

At Cottenham the VAD hospital on 14 May 1915 with twenty patients being received at the Baptist chapel schoolroom. A bathroom containing a bath with hot and cold water was added in December 1916 at a time when few houses in the village had such facilities. The Hospital produced its own magazine containing lists of patients with contributions reflecting their feelings – "Oh, Nurse, it's like 'eaven" But in October 1917 the patients were discovered dancing and playing cards in the chapel so the Deacons closed it down. The hospital transferred to the Rectory. When Commandant Cox died she was accorded a military funeral

At Linton the Belgians refugees and wounded soldiers were initially housed in a wing of the Workhouse but in June 1915 the hospital relocated to the Manor House at the corner of Coles Lane and High Street. This had a surgery and five wards containing 39 beds with another 14 men sleeping in tents in the garden. However the patients had to return to the workhouse for baths. Here 25 female and 15 male nurses cared for 648 British and 32 Belgian wounded by the time the war was done

Fulbourn was the fourth VAD hospital in Cambridgeshire when it opened in the former Church School in January 1914 catering for 25-30 wounded soldiers in two wards. During the summer the number of beds was increased by a marquee which soon proved popular with great competition for vacant beds. A kitchen was made in the small classroom of the infants' school and the Working Men's Institute was used as a mess and recreation room complete with billiard tables and piano. The hospital was run by Sister Whitmore who was presented with a silver medal by the King in May 1918 in recognition of four years service.

But like the girls in the television programme, some local ladies left home to nurse in foreign fields. Perhaps the most remarkable of these was Dorothy Nicholls, daughter of the Fulbourn doctor. She started her nursing at the Royal Alexandra Hospital for Children in 1906 before moving to St George's Hospital and then the Women's Hospital in Brighton. She was part of a British Red Cross unit which embarked for Boulogne in October 1914. After six months she volunteered to nurse in a hospital in Petrograd, Russia with six other girls. It was April 1917 before she returned to Fulbourn for a well-earned rest telling tales of her experiences which included coming under fire in the Carpathian Mountains, for which she was awarded the Russian Medal of St George. But Dorothy was not done with war: she soon packed her bags and headed back to nurse in France. Even when peace finally came she was not one to rest at home and in 1921 set off for Estonia to organise and superintend the formation of child welfare centres. When her overseas nursing days were done Dorothy returned to Fulbourn where she took over the running of the village Nursing Association. Later she became a councillor and magistrate, dying in her home village in 1980.

Do you have members of your family who nursed during the Great War, if so please share their experiences

The village of Coveney stands high on a ridge with a magnificent view across the fens to Ely Cathedral. Its farmhouses, school, chapel and church present an image of a peaceful and unchanging way of life. But it also has a pound for straying animals and a lock-up for unruly parishioners which may point to conflict in the past.

It is always interesting to see a community through a visitor's eye. In January 1947 journalist Charles Hamblett was driving through the village when attention was caught by the sight of a man in dungarees chopping wood in his garden. His rough workman's hands showed that he was used to the hard life, his missing eye a result of a machine gun bullet at Dunkirk. He was also Rector of Coveney

Laying aside his axe the Rev Arthur Beale was happy to answer Hamblett's questions and led him into the home he shared with his wife and three daughters, twins and a baby. It was not much fun being a Rector's wife, he learned.

There was no electricity. At night she lit the lamps in the sitting-room, kitchen and study then worked till bedtime, washing dishes, attending to the children, sewing, darning and tidying the large, cold impractical rooms. An expert violinist, she rarely had time to play. Her violin went mouldy after only three months in the damp home that came with her husband's job. She only saved it from complete ruination by keeping it in the living room near the fireplace.

The Rev Beale was frank about his home: "The Rectory was in an appalling condition when we came. Altogether I have spent £180 of my own money on the house and garden during the three years I have had the living". He subsidised the church to the tune of £2 a week from his disability pension, allowances and tax concessions for the three children. The twins attended the village school because he couldn't possibly afford to send them elsewhere. "The present predicament of the clergy is a legacy of the days when parsons came from the leisured classes".

There were other problems: "One of the hardest things to bear is the isolation. We are apart from our people and we are apart from our own brethren. There is undoubtedly a decline in the sense of religion among countrymen as among townfolk"

The Rector outlined the routine of his day and Hamblett noted it down: 'The alarm clock wakens him at 5.15am, he then pours out his shaving water, which is kept hot overnight in a flask. Dressed and shaved, he walks across to the church, lights the lamps, prepares the altar and, at six-thirty, rings the angelus for matins. His reputation for punctuality is highly thought off by those parishioners who depend on his bell to wake them in time for work

'At seven he says Mass, having arranged for at least one person to be present each morning: on Monday his wife, Tuesday the churchwarden's wife, Wednesday schoolchildren, Thursday the schoolmaster, Friday the schoolmaster's wife, Saturday the senior server's wife.

'Having cleared up after the Mass, the rector fetches the milk from the dairyman, 400 yards away, and breakfasts at eight-thirty. Then he spends an hour or so at his desk answering urgent letters, going through accounts and dealing with school and parish business. On Friday he gives religious instruction at the local school. Then he changes in working garb to do the fatigues till lunch when he glances through The Times before spending the remaining short period of winter daylight doing odd jobs or necessary maintenance work. At six he rings the angelus and says evensong.'

The Rev Beale was open: one of the greatest spiritual hardships was that he has to say so many offices alone. He spent an average of two-and-a-half hours daily in prayer 'for the good of my soul', But he welcomed such hardships 'because no man will come into the ministry today unless he has a vocation for it'.

And there were the benefits of the men and women of the parish: men like Tom Woodruffe and Henry Cobbin, who posed with the Rector for a photograph. Hamblett noted: 'They are firm friends, though Tom, known locally as 'The Ranter' preached in the village chapel and Parson Beale's religion would never recognise his type of nonconformity'.

The few pages in one issue of a magazine paint a picture of a parson's life in one small parish as it was nearly 70 years ago. Do you have similar memories?

Until May 1914 visitors to Cambridge could not help but be reminded of misery.

For opposite the great King's College were two shops, side by side. One was that of a plumber and decorator named Henry Greef, the other that of Alfred Sadd. Yet although sad by name, Alfred was a cheerful figure and his shop was filled with curiosities of all kinds.

The Sadd family had been connected with the Parade for over a century. Alfred's grandfather had begun the business as a dealer in antique and a hairdresser in one of a row of old-fashioned houses that stood in front of King's College. When they were pulled down in the 1830s to make way for the present screen, Mr Robert Sadd moved to the shop immediately opposite.

The family preserved various records of the antiquity of their business including an advertisement which had appeared in 1818 announcing that Mr Sadd, described as a "ladies' and gentlemen's Hair Dresser, Puke Maker and Perfumer", had just returned from London with a stock of the latest wigs and materials for the dressing of hair.

In those days hair dressing was a fine art and Mr Sadd had a good deal of custom from the University beaux of that day. He had a room specially built as a hairdressing saloon and brought a man from London to tend to the locks of the fashionable. At one time the premises extended into the adjoining shops, as blocked-up doors testified. This side of the business was given up after men ceased to wear curly wigs, and before ladies took to wearing green hair – as a reporter from 1914 noted.

Sadd was also a dealer in antiques and curiosities such as stuffed birds and rare eggs. He sold revolvers and even a Russian musket, bayonet and sword brought from the Crimean battlefields. Much of his trade was the supply of trophies and plate for sports clubs and as presents to dignitaries, though this was not without its difficulties. In 1847 the Town Council decided to present a handsome snuff box to each of the soldiers who'd fought at the battle of Aliwal in India, where Sir Harry Smith of Whittlesey had made his name. Sadd duly acquired the boxes and made arrangements to engrave the Cambridge coats of arms on them. Sadly the hoped-for subscriptions from the public were slow to materialise, causing some embarrassment to the councillors who'd commissioned them.

In 1851 Sadd decided to advertise by getting a London printer to produce name cards featuring a view of King's College, just across the road. The same engraving was to be sold separately at twopence a sheet to help defray the expense. However when the print was produced it proved of such poor quality that Sadd refused to pay. The case ended up in the courts. But such appearances became an occupational hazard as the company also bought gold and coins from individuals and found itself in trouble on a variety of occasions after an item they'd purchased in all good faith was found to have been stolen.

Inevitably with such an expensive stock they also found themselves the victim of theft. In September 1823 an enterprising robber removed a shutter from the shop window and broke a piece of glass before making off with gold seals, snuff boxes and a French opera glass amongst other things. Then, seventy years later, after a boy had accidentally cracked the window with a stone, some artful fellow pushed his knee through and stole a number of silver coins.

But Sadd took precautions: "I've a sharp dog and two loaded pistols", he told a reporter. He then vanished up the stairs at the back of the shop and presently what appeared to be an Indian picture hanging on a beam near the roof was removed, and Mr Sadd peeped through the aperture. "This is my bedroom up here", he said. "From here I can cover every inch of the shop. If anyone were to get behind the counter I could cover them from here. I had it put here myself for that purpose."

But, to his mind, the greatest villain was his landlord, King's College. Sadd was quite a poet and described the problem in verse:

They raised the rent to such an extent
That he would not stay longer, so out he went.
Then, to speak the next reason we seek,
They made him close Thursday every week.
Then trade was bad – not much to be had.
And he getting old. Now isn't that Sadd

In April 1914 he planned to move his old-established curiosity shop around the corner into St. Edwards Passage. But it never opened. For just before five o'clock on a Monday morning in September Mr Sadd's body was found lying on the gravel path at the West end of King's College Chapel. At the inquest a verdict was reached that he'd died from injuries received by falling from King's College Chapel

Mr Greef was devastated.

It's not that often you get a chance to see the King of England on Cambridge's East Road. And it's not that often that East Road folk get the opportunity to impress their Sovereign.

His Majesty had been to Cambridge in 1912 when he stayed at Trinity College whilst inspecting the great army manoeuvres around Linton. But now, two years later, he would actually be driving down their street to open a new building at the Leys School.

Such a visit was bound to attract large crowds so the Great Eastern Railway laid on two special first and third-class express trains from London and motor buses brought a great many people in from the surrounding area.

Bottisham villagers however had no need to journey to Cambridge: the King came to them. Bugler Bowers, of the Boy Scouts, was been posted some way down the road to give the signal of the Royal approach and schoolchildren assembled by the Vicarage sang the National Anthem as the car slowly drove past giving the occupants time to admire the beautiful decorations on the Swan public house

Quite a number of people from adjacent villages lined the route towards Cambridge. On Newmarket Road crowds began to assemble about 9.30, their gay clothing putting to shame the dullness of the day with its leaden sky and searching wind. They were joined by hundreds of schoolchildren guided to their particular piece of pavement by Boy Scouts positioned to act as right and left markers.

The vice-chairman of the Education Committee rode along the route on his bicycle to see that the children were looking happy and not at all tired. The NSPCC inspector was also on duty. A kindly gentleman was standing outside the Jolly Butchers entertaining the youngsters with a cockatoo. The little ones laughed very heartily as the comical bird flapped its wings and laid down the law with its beak whilst conversing with its master.

Presently a large Daimler car was seen. "Here comes the King" shouted someone and the shrilling cheering and waving of flags told those at Page's Corner that his Majesty had come

East Road was not its normal self: appeals for people to decorate their houses had proved effective and an elaborate display of flags and bunting had been arranged including a tremendous banner inscribed 'Cambridge Working Men's Club' hanging across the road

Many of the side streets had put on good displays with a Union Jack hung from the bedroom window or bunting arranged along the window ledges. But the shops and houses on the Abbey Estate corner of Newmarket Road excelled themselves with rich red friezes fringed with gold-coloured teaselling and shields bearing the royal arms.

St Mary the Less Vicarage sported long streamers from the house to the garden fence but Mayor J.A. Sturton was intent on setting an example: he had decorated his home, Gonville House at Hyde Park Corner, with Union Jacks between the lime trees

But amongst all the patriotism ambushes were being planned.

As the Royal Car turned into Lensfield Road a woman threw something at the vehicle. It struck the top and bounced away. Police were immediately on the alert, for suffragette outrages had been in the news recently. When retrieved it was revealed to be a petition calling for the enfranchisement of women.

The King's progress was unhindered. He arrived safely at his destination where he was greeted by a band and members of the Leys School Governing body. Then it was on to the official part of the day, to inaugurate the new wing and lay the top stone of the new King's archway, visit the Moulton Memorial Chapel and receive a loyal address

Crowds still lined the streets when it was time for the King to depart; this time his motor passed more quickly than before, closely followed by the Chief Constable's car. But again the women were in wait; a second petition was hurled, this one hitting the royal chauffeur in the face. Off the vehicle sped, taking the King back to Newmarket races and leaving the police wondering how security could have been so easily breached. The suffragette activity went largely unreported

Few remember the day King George V came to Cambridge to open the Gateway driven past by thousands of motorists on Trumpington Road. Photographs of the event seem very scarce. Do you have any?

Last weekend windmill enthusiasts celebrated the remaining examples of the structures which have been so important a feature of the landscape for centuries. Inevitably many have now gone: "Windmills are disappearing so fast that in many parts of the country they are a forgotten race. Some day antiquarians will be examining and digging in mounds, having quite forgotten that they were the mounds of old windmills made to raise them a little above the surrounding land." Henry Hughes told members of the Cambridge Antiquarian Society in November 1928

Together with J.H. Bullock and Rex Wailes he set about making a record of the windmills then existing throughout Cambridgeshire and the Isle of Ely. It was not an encouraging task for such enthusiasts. They found the oldest mill at Bourn had been out of commission for some six years, its sails having been smashed in a gale in 1925, finishing its working life. But fears that it would be lost were dispelled when it was acquired by the Cambridge Preservation Society who have continued to care for it.

In Cambridge the windmill that had given Mill Road its name had long gone and the mill at Long Road Trumpington had also disappeared. Miss Moore, the daughter of the last miller, told them it had been built in 1812 and stopped working in the spring of 1887. Photographer R.L. Lord snapped it in its prime. But French's Mill off Victoria Road was still standing (without sails) as was the tower of the windmill in Hurst Park Avenue which was finally demolished in 1957

Out in the surrounding countryside several mills were still working though their number lessened every year. The long irregular hours needed to make the most of windy weather and the long spells of enforced idleness were a great difficulty without some auxiliary power. Some millers, however, were still making wheat flour including Mr Lawrence of Stretham. Sadly he died after being struck by lightning in Grunty Fen and the mill lost its sails during the Second World War when it was taken over by the Royal Observer Corps as a look-out post. Although within recent years the sails have been put back, the machinery has gone for ever.

Madingley windmill is one that disappeared and then came back again. One July night in 1909 the tenant, Mr Charles French, was in bed when he heard the mill creaking ominously under the weight of the millstones and it collapsed. The great oak timbers were so shattered as to make restoration impossible. After standing abandoned it was replaced in 1935 by a post mill from Ellington which Ambrose Harding the Squire of Madingley had moved plank by plank to its present site. Such restoration was expensive and needed specialist skills such as that of the Soham firm of Hunts millwrights whose work was photographed by the antiquarians

In 1932 Philippa Burrell bought a cottage, granary and 20 acres of land together with the windmill at West Wratting for £600. High & isolated she found it a little paradise – and promptly left to study in Paris! She returned in 1934 when she wrote plays and learned about planting and pruning. All the while the windmill was watching her with its broken sails, cap all out, windows rotten and rain going in. It was an unwelcoming part of the property, and one she used to hide in when the bailiffs called. A millwright gave her an estimate of £100 for repair and to raise the money she studied cookery books and made date cakes which she sold from an old pram on Cambridge market, a picture of the mill fixed to the side. It was an immediate sensation and soon she was selling teas to the hundreds of people who journeyed to see the mill, sitting contentedly on rustic tables in the orchard. After two seasons however she closed the business as the mill was restored. It was not the end of the story; she wrote a play 'The wind and the mill' which was performed by the Festival Theatre Company in the fields around the windmill in June 1935.

As well as corn mills, drainage mills were once a very familiar sight in the fens, and the Cambridge Antiquarians took a picture of a group of small mills near Isleham in 1914. There was a large mill at Soham mere, belonging to the Cambridgeshire County Council with the old type of tail beam and old types of sail. "Long may they be preserved by the bodies that own them" Hughes exhorted. Sadly it was not to be. By 1947 the mill was thought to be dangerous and the Council felt that the only answer lay in demolition. Enthusiasts protested at the loss of this rare survival of a large drainage mill but to no avail - it was just too rickety officials claimed. So the demolition men moved in to pull it over with a tractor. They failed.

Undaunted they returned with gunpowder. They failed. So in the end eight charges of gelignite had to be used to topple the "dangerous" structure. Ironically just eight years later another drainage mill, much younger, much less impressive and in a much worse state, was re-built and erected just next door at Wicken Fen, where it is lauded as the last of the fenland wind drainage mills.

The photographs taken by the Cambridge Antiquarians are deposited in the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library alongside many others taken by enthusiasts over the years.

Memories 19th May 2014 by Mike Petty

One of the memories for those who attended the Lacey Family's annual charity lunch at Fulbourn last week was to witness the arrival of the bright yellow Air Ambulance. But this was not an emergency mission, the medics and crew had dropped in to express their appreciation for the magnificent funding these events have provided over more than 25 years with in excess of £200,000 being shared between various local charities.

Although in 2014 we are used to seeing such flying machines, it was interesting to get up close and peep inside. Similar excitement a century ago, in May 1914, prompted crowds to flock to Cherry Hinton Road where Mr Matthews had allowed his Rock Meadow to become a airfield. More than 6,000 paid to watch as Mr Gustav Hamel, the famous airman, gave exhibitions of looping the loop, upside-down flying, tail diving and other sensational feats in his Morane-Saulnier monoplane.

It impressed the News reporter: "Mr Hamel is a wizard of the air. He seemed to be able to do anything he chose with his machine. He swung her up end over end, tilted her sideways, rose and fell in dizzy spirals and plunged hurtling down in headlong dives at 80 miles an hour, until a collision with the ground seemed imminent, almost grazing the ground at the lowest point of his swoop"

Hamel then took passengers on joy rides, one was Mr E, Gee of Beach Farm, Harston – achieving his ambition of becoming the first Cambridgeshire farmer to fly. Another was Mrs Percy Heaton of Stetchworth. But the man who won the lottery for a free flight sold it, deciding that aviation was not for him.

Finally it was time for Mr Hamel to refill the petrol tank and fly back to Hendon. He'd return next week, he promised. It was a promise he'd never keep. The next day he headed to France to collect a new monoplane; he took off to fly back and was never seen again despite extensive searches of the channel by cruisers, torpedo boats and destroyers.

The impact on Cambridge folk was profound – who could have imagined they were the last people to applaud his wondrous feats, that their cheers were the last he would hear before he disappeared into the blue forever. There was talk of a memorial stone to mark the spot where'd he'd left Cambridge soil.

Hamel's death was widely reported, other aviators have perished largely unrecorded. Harry Bye of Ely is one of few who now remember an incident that took place on 8th June 1945 – two days after D-Day. Harry was living near the Shippea Hill station when his wife saw a B17 Flying Fortress heading her way. They were quite used to these giant American planes, but this one was different.

Harry writes: "She witnessed the bomber so low the propellers were cutting the newly-formed ears of wheat and they were spraying both sides of the plane. My son, then nearly two years old, can remember that the silver plane rose over the house as he was in the back yard, then with all its engines running it turned over and spun into a field opposite on Plantation Farm and burst into flames"

Harry, a member of the National Fire Service, and Home Guard Don Thoday went towards the crash, but when the bombs and machine gun bullets started exploding he fell flat on his on the grass field. "There was wreckage spraying all around, some must have passed over my head", he remembers. Once it had quietened down he made for home and his wife was relieved to find he was still was alive. He found: "All the front doors of the houses who had their doors locked, the doors were wide open as the blast had bursted the locks and our fireplace was covered in soot from our chimney". The crew perished and the story stayed largely unreported, but now Harry's memories can be amplified by accounts on the internet.

Last week the yellow helicopter rose from the barley field and, with a wave from the paramedics and crew, ascended into the sky to head off to its next appointment, whatever that might be

Meanwhile, in the Queens Farm marquee, the essential task of fund raising continued long into the afternoon.

Memories 26th May 2014 by Mike Petty

When Kay Pargeter emailed to say she'd found an admission ticket to a celebration on Parker's Piece I thought I knew just what it would be

For in June 1838 15,000 poor folk had been invited to a massive sit-down meal on the Piece to celebrate the coronation of Queen Victoria. It was a never-to-be-forgotten event that had taken weeks to organise – who would cook the meal, who would supply the beer, where would they get the plates and dishes? Tables were erected like spokes in a wheel with in the centre a pagoda from which a band played.

But Kay's ticket was not for that. It was, she said, for a Peace celebration.

So it was on to story number two: how in 1814 an earlier sit-down meal had been held on Parker's Piece to commemorate the end of the Napoleonic War. Only, of course the war had not ended – Napoleon was to escape and continue the fight until the Battle of Waterloo two years later. There is a ticket and an engraving in the Cambridgeshire Collection to record the event.

But it was not that Peace celebration. Now it gets more interesting. It's time to recall how at the end of the Great War in July 1919 a Peace Day Festival was organised: Cambridge presented a gay appearance, all the principal thoroughfares being decorated with flags and streamers while nearly every side-street, too, had its decorations. And the highlight was a huge dinner on the Piece for discharged and demobilised men of the Borough. The arrangements were as near perfect as could be secured and the men seemed thoroughly to enjoy themselves, the News reported. The Cambridgeshire Collection has a number of photographs recording the occasion but this invitation would be particularly interesting.

Except that it wasn't that peace. This ticket was for an event in June 1856 when one of the longest civil wars in England finally came to an end. It was the centuries-long battle between the Town and Gown over who should have power over what, who should licence alehouses and should the Mayor have to swear an oath to uphold University privileges. Following years of debate agreement was finally enshrined in the Cambridge Award Act described as 'the most momentous piece of legislation affecting relations between Town and Gown since 1561, the nearest thing yet to a peace treaty'. It was granted the Royal Assent on 5th June 1856. I had not been aware that such a momentous event had been celebrated on Parker's Piece. And nor it was

For Kay's invitation was to another peace commemoration on that same day. C.H. Cooper in his 'Annals of Cambridge' describes how seven thousand school children were entertained to tea on Parker's Piece. They assembled on the Market Hill and, preceded by the Mayor and Corporation in carriages, paraded through the town with flags and bands of music, passing the central colleges.

However there was no sign of any celebration in the University except for a solitary flag at Corpus. Probably the dons were busy compiling their congratulatory address to the Queen – or minutely analysing the details of that other Peace treaty she'd just signed.

The newspapers reported things in much more detail. They recalled the Victoria Coronation day when 15,000 sat down to dinner, this one was similar – there were Union Jacks, a band and tea and plum cake for all the youngsters. Arrangements had been made to accommodate 5,000 children but an extra 2,000 showed up from surrounding villages "bless their little patriotic hearts". No one under six was to be admitted, but many seem to have grown to six specially for the occasion. The upper age limit was 16 but reporters noticed 'louts' devouring plum cake and many adults also indulging themselves.

So it was not surprising that the mountains of plum cake and piles of sandwiches disappeared leaving some poor little creatures with tears in their eyes. The helpers did their best to replenish stocks but many of the youngsters had to go home hungry

Each received a medal inscribed 'In commemoration of the Treaty of Peace between England, France, Turkey ... and Russia ... Goodwill towards Men'. That Crimean war was over, though the story of the charge of the Light Brigade would live on.

I have a copy of the programme, but there was another memento. For William Nichols, the photographer of St Mary's Passage had carried his camera to the top of the gate of the Town Gaol, from which he took a picture showing the layout of the tables. Later he took another of the afternoon's proceedings showing the children partaking of tea and the multitude of onlookers. These echoed similar scenes drawn in 1838. "The views are very good and cheap", the News reported. They were also some of the earliest photographs to be taken of Cambridge. But I've never seen them

Do you have the snaps amongst your family papers or can you add more to the story of this or the other celebrations on Parker's Piece?

Where do footballers go in the summer time?

Doubtless the current stars at Cambridge United will be basking in their double Wembley successes by relaxing on a remote tropical island until it is time to don their boots once more.

But 50 years ago it was different, as the News reported on 17th June 1964

With the 1963/64 season behind them the professional footballers of the two then Cambridge Southern League Clubs, City and United, were turning to everyday jobs to earn a little extra cash, keep their minds active and – most importantly – to keep their muscles in trim.

United Forwards Matt McVittie, Graham Atkinson and Jimmy Gibson were employed by a brewery, loading crates and barrels from the stores on to vans and lorries and then delivering them to public houses throughout the county. Working in the summer heat with the heavy barrels and crates was thirsty work and they were offered a pint at every pub they visited. It was a temptation hard to resist, Graham explained: "A little beer does not do any harm but we must not accept too much drink or our aim to keep fit in the summer will be defeated". But working the brewery gave them plenty of exercise and when shifting crates they went through many of the movements they would during training.

Brian Boggis was spending his time decorating the club house in Quainton Close that he'd taken over after his wedding earlier in the month, wallpapering, painting and cleaning, while Dai Jones, the other full-back was employed at a subsidiary company of the Pye group at Sawston.

United's Footballer of the Year, Jackie Scurr was working in a garage while the captain, Bill Kelly, the only member of the playing staff who did not live in Cambridge, was delivering cars and lorries in Luton while the club's only part-time player, Andy Smith was back at his regular job at Marshalls where he was joined by Billie Welsh

Team-mates Graham Lawrence was helping Dudley Arliss with the club pools, delivering tickets to agents throughout the county whereas John Haasz was working for United's Chairman of Directors at Mr Woolley's Abbey Tyre Company in Newmarket Road and Rodney Slack was determined to get back to peak fitness after a leg injury by joining a firm of decorators

Now his players had turned their attention away from football, the United manager, Roy Kirk, was travelling the country looking for new talent to strengthen his squad. He had signed David Finch, a full-back from Rugby, Ray Wiggin, a centre-forward from Walsall and Billy Day, an outside-right, from Peterborough with a great ability to capitalise on the long pass inside the full back Cambridge City players were lucky in that the chairman of directors, Harold Ridgeon could offer five of them a job with his building firm. Goalie Roy Jones, the only amateur in the team, was working on planes in one of the big RAF stations in East Anglia. He was expecting to go overseas in the near future, surrendering his goalkeeping role to Bill Heath. Bill was working for a local tailors, a job he'd obtained almost as soon as he'd signed from Lincoln.

Right-back Tommy Carroll, a tiler was working for himself on a sub-contracting basis and the rest of the City's half-back line was employed by Ridgeons, Alec Moyse as a driver, Alan Gregory as painter whilst Alf Craig had a trade. That left Brendan McNally who was living in Luton

Football aficionados will understand that to me these are just names. But if they mean something to you – or if you are one of those mentioned - then let me know

Memories 9th June 2014 by Mike Petty

Last week my wanderings took me to two small communities, very different in location but sharing a common interest

When the good folk from March Family History Society asked for another tour of Cambridgeshire we decided to head to the high (in fenland terms) chalk lands around Newmarket.

To fortify ourselves there was a pause for coffee in the hospitable Earith tearooms before heading off to Willingham, Wicken and beyond. By the time we'd arrived for our dokey stop the rain showers had drifted away and the group could enjoy their sandwiches on the green at Reach. A few weeks earlier and it would have been filled with all the paraphernalia of Reach Fair where once horses were tethered alongside the Devil's Dyke prior to sale and this year the children from Swaffham Prior school had performed traditional dances.

The visitors explored the attractions of two of the main amenities of any village, the pub and the church. Neither is particularly old though both are successors of much earlier establishments.

The church is said to be the latest of seven have existed from 1375, though this particular building dates back to 1861. It was designed to fulfil the function of school and church, a role it continued until 1909. But then in 1958 the church it was struck by lightning, giving an opportunity for a complete restoration and redesign. Behind it, tucked away and often missed by visitors is the ruined arch of a much earlier chapel dedicated to St Etheldreda which was swept away at the Dissolution of the Monasteries and now stands overlooking surrounding fields.

The March contingent boarded their coach and set off to explore further, leaving Reach to its tranquillity.

Then at the end of the week I found myself passing Earith once more en route to another small community with a welcoming hostelry dispensing food to appreciative diners.

Colne is a parish that I visited some years ago when it was a contender for the 'Best Kept Village' award and its streets contain some magnificent thatched cottages (which would not have scored points) and well-tended gardens (which would). Like Reach it had an ancient custom, an account of which I discovered only recently amongst the files of the Cambridge Independent Press for May 1914.

May Day celebrations had been a tradition in Colne as far back as the oldest inhabitants could remember. In the old times garlands of flowers surrounding a doll were suspended across the streets over which the children threw balls. In more recent years the school children had selected one of their number by ballot to be crowned as Queen and in 1914 an elaborate ceremony took place in the schoolyard.

The paper recorded how the children adorned their Queen, in a white dress, train and veil with a crown and garland of white and pink flowers. Her attendants were equally arrayed with apple blossom and she had a herald suitably attired in a green suit and three-cornered hat. Once the ceremonial parade had been photographed by Stanley Christmas the Queen and her attendants took their seat in a couple of horse-drawn vans which toured Colne itself before visiting the surrounding villages of Somersham, Bluntisham & Earith. They sang May Day songs and collecting money for the 'The Children's Summer Outing Fund', finally arriving back at school with light hearts and heavy money boxes.

Last week I made time to explore the church, standing stately by the village green. But like Reach it is not an ancient structure. For in 1896 the tower had collapsed and a complete new building had been erected on a different site. Memorials inside record that Cambridge University allowed the materials of the old building to be reused in the new, stressing that they no longer took any responsibility for the chancel upkeep. And there is a painting of the now-disappeared ancient building.

Only, like at Reach, it has not entirely disappeared. For down Old Church Lane the ancient porch still stands, now cleared of ivy and brambles that had threatened to choke it. And – had I but known it – whilst I was gazing with stranger's eyes at the new building, the man who knows all about Colne's history was continuing his self-imposed task of caring for the remains of the old.

Adrian Gibbs knows more about his native settlement than anybody else and has shared his knowledge in a village history, proceeds from the sale of which go to Cancer Research. He has kindly lent me some of his pictures of the May Day ceremony.

And if you too have a passion for the past, then make the journey to Fenstanton on Friday or Saturday 20-21 June where another local historian, Jean Ding will be displaying some of her old photographs in the United Reformed Church as part of a weekend of open gardens, demonstrations and exhibitions

Ely’s former magistrates court is back in the news after fresh plans for its future have been announced. Now one wing may become offices for Ely City Council, who bought the building for just one pound when it ceased to be used as a courthouse. The outlook for the rest of the building is still uncertain.

The old Sessions House with its white portico frontage on Lynn Road was designed by Charles Humfrey of Cambridge in 1820. It included ‘a handsome and commodious new court room with wings housing a chapel and the prison infirmary. These survive.

But immediately behind it was a House of Correction intended for the punishment and reform through hard labour of the poor convicted of minor offences. Those owing £10 or above continued to be placed in the Bishop’s gaol – the present Ely Museum almost alongside, where felons would be confined until their trial. But it became a place for the detention of vagrants and people charged with poaching, fathering bastards and various other minor offenders. Whether found guilty or not they were all were herded together with no separation between tried and untried prisoners and debtors.

The prison had 16 single cells for criminals but they were soon overcrowded. There were dormitories for debtors and women as well as four day rooms. These were warmed by stoves in severe weather - though fuel was only supplied to the convicted on Sundays.

The new House of Correction was poorly designed and constructed. In 1827 the Chief Justice described it as one of the most ill contrived and inconvenient places he had ever seen. It was now too late to remedy these evils but it was a great misfortune that the building had been left in its present state, he reported Inspectors noted that the gaoler couldn’t keep order and the prisoners had not the slightest respect for him. There was no discipline, the chaplain never visited, the surgeon came only irregularly and the only other official was his wife who kept watch over the female prisoners. There was no water to wash, no soap or towels and the privies smelt abominably – and this at a time when cholera was raging in the streets of Ely, just the other side of the prison wall.

The prisoners were initially made to pick oakum though soon a tread-mill was installed. It did not actually do anything but they were supposed to work on it eight hours a day. For those too weak to walk there was a hand crank set into the wall which had to be turned usually 20 times a minute. If the prisoner found this too easy the warder would come and tighten the screw to make it harder

By 1842 it was recognised that the gaol was insufficient, inconvenient, and otherwise inadequate. Plans were drawn up for a new one designed by Mr Basevi the architect who also designed the Fitzwilliam Museum. While building work proceeded prisoners were transferred to the by-then disused Bishop's Gaol

The expanded Ely House of Correction was approached from Market Street through massive, spiked, wooden gates which opened into a spacious courtyard. There were four exercise yards and more cells, a chapel and an infirmary which was soon filled to capacity

For the new architect-designed gaol was damp: the doors and windows had to be kept open to allow ventilation and the heating turned off. The surgeon reported "My assistant noticed an unpleasant odour prevailing in the cells but being deprived of the organ of smell myself I could not detect it". On examining the water closets it was found they'd been wrongly constructed. Prisoners became ill and a new diet had to be introduced. There was no lighting so inmates had to sit in the dark for hours at a time.

Perhaps the harsh conditions deterred offenders as by 1846 numbers had fallen so low there were not enough to work the treadmill. Some of those that were imprisoned escaped, leading to the sacking of the long-term governor, who'd run the place for 26 years.

But the cost of maintaining the gaol was too great and the Government decided to close it down, together with the Cambridge Town Gaol overlooking Parker's Piece. Prisoners were transferred to Great Stukely County Prison, Huntingdon or the Cambridge County Gaol on Castle Hill.

Ely House of Correction closed in 1878 and the 18-foot high walls were pulled down. The site is now occupied by the East Cambridgeshire District Council whose planners must vote on the future use of the remaining Sessions House. It will be criminal if it is allowed to stand empty much longer.

Communities across the county are researching the story of the lads who left their village during the Great War, never to return. But few will match the record produced by Eltisle History Society.

You can't forget the sacrifice at Eltisley, for on the village green there are a row of 14 lime trees, each one a memorial to a man who died. They were planted, one by one as news of the deaths became known. Then in March 1919 a Peace Tree was added, planted by four of the soldiers who'd survived.

Four Eltisley lads were already serving as soldiers at the start of the war, twelve sets of brothers fought, three men joined on the same day – only one came home. But there nearly 40 more who left, fought and did return. For them, as they gathered beside the memorial on successive Armistice Sundays the names that were recited were of men they truly would remember, as they themselves grew progressively older.

But of the families of the fallen, only one direct descendant remains, and they live in Canada. They did not know of the activities of their great-grandfather, Martin Riseley until they were contacted by one of the Eltisley researchers. Then they remembered that down in the basement of their home in Toronto there was an old box containing some papers. It had survived a couple of floods but was still quite dry. Inside were a medal, a Memorial Plaque and letters that told of the circumstances of Martin's death – killed in a railway accident on Hatfield railway station.

At Eltisley patient research has enabled the historians to compile detailed biographies of each man his particular part of the carnage that claimed their lives, be it machine gun fire, shrapnel, gas or spotted fever caused by appalling conditions in the trenches.

Such news percolated home, week by week as 1914 turned into 1915, 1915 became 1916, then 1917 and dragged itself, weak and bleeding into 1918. Local papers reported everyday activities amongst the personal tragedies at home and abroad.

Take July 1915; one evening Mrs Paine was making up the fire in the kitchen of her mud-and-plaster cottage near the Green when it was blown apart. Mirrors were smashed and plaster scattered all over the room. As the house filled with dust and sulphur fumes her first thought was for her grandson asleep on a couch. Catching him in her arms she dashed outside, thinking a bomb had exploded – perhaps the result of one of the Zeppelins that were causing such havoc. But no, this was just a lightning strike, a reminder that nature could inflict the sort of damage being caused by man elsewhere. The cottage was still a wreck when a couple of weeks later the village feast was celebrated with cricket match on the green: some things must continue despite war.

Then soldier James Wiles turned up unexpectedly back in his cottage which proved a shock to his wife. Her first act was to introduce him to his new baby son who'd arrived shortly after he'd enlisted. Since then James had been in Belgium, taking part in the retreat from Mons and several bayonet charges. He'd nearly lost his life after falling into a shell hole full of mud and water. It was a brief respite. "Today he leaves for the Front and expects to be in the trenches tonight", the paper reported.

Perhaps he'd had time to meet up with Private Harry Hayden who was also then home on leave recovering from a shrapnel wound in the back. Harry too was soon back in the trenches only to be wounded by shrapnel again. He sent his mother a letter saying he was on the mend and would soon be home on leave once more. But this time he died of pneumonia. One of the trees on the green is dedicated to Harry's memory. Another commemorates his brother, Sidney killed eighteen months later, the last of the men to lay down their lives, but just where his body lays nobody knows.

More would have died without the work of volunteer nurses – there were about 20 of them in the Eltisley and Croxton Red Cross in July 1915. They'd gone to a great deal of trouble to learn first aid and nursing and were ready when part of nearly Caxton workhouse was accepted as a hospital for wounded soldiers. Beds were prepared and stores brought in but then the plans had changed and it was decided not to open it after all. A few of the girls volunteered for work elsewhere but the majority were either over age or married women who could not leave the home.

At least they were there when 15-year-old Sidney Kidman was stung. He'd been helping to cut corn on Mr Russell's farm when the reaper hit a wasps' nest; the wasps stung the horses which started to kick and Sidney fell off under the machine. Before Mr Desborough could stop it the knives of the reaper had cut through both the lad's arms, one being cut right through at the elbow, the other only held on by the skin.

And this in just one month of one year in one small village. And just part of the story now revealed.

Next July, on Saturday 12th, the new book telling the story of their war will be launched at a fete on the village green. There will be displays and an exhibition in the church and, next day, a musical 'Tribute to our Tommies' will be performed.

The few dozen copies of the book will be quickly snapped up – they are too good a record not to.

But, when they are gone, the trees on the green will continue to stand in silent tribute to those lads who did not return from the carnage of war to the (comparative) peace of their home village

Memories 30th June 2014 by Mike Petty

A small branch railway line once ran from Ely to St Ives, crossing the A10 at Little Thetford corner. When it was first constructed in 1866 there was little road traffic to be held up as the locomotive with its few carriages and goods wagons trundled through. The gatekeeper would open the gates and all would remain quiet until it returned from St Ives some two-and-a-half hours later having paused to deposit or collect passengers and goods at Stretham, Wilburton, Haddenham, Sutton, Earith Bridge and Bluntisham en route.

Each station had its own staff, though when passenger traffic ceased in 1931 the porter, office boy and signalman at Wilburton were dispensed with and it became virtually a one-man operation. Life might be quiet but that did not mean it was dull. One night in the autumn of 1940 the stationmaster's son was awakened by a strange noise in the night; something had scraped across the roof of the house. There was nothing to be seen and it was dismissed as a dream. A few weeks later when men were loading a wagon with potatoes they spotted a light-coloured object lying in a field. It was a large piece of cloth that turned out to be a parachute. Whatever or whoever had descended on it had disappeared into the sticky mud. It could not have been a man – it must have been a mine! The military were called and everybody was told to evacuate. But the afternoon train was due and it was too late to stop it. Several trains had already passed without incident but this one came and left extremely gently. Then the family made their way to St Peter's Hall in Wilburton while the bomb was detonated. When they were allowed to return they found the roof of the station had been punctured by falling debris, ceilings had cracked and buried in their settee was a thick piece of shrapnel four inches long. The blast had left a crater that looked large enough to take two of the nearby semi-detached cottages. It remained a reminder of their close encounter with a German bomb until a year later when a gang of Italian Prisoners of War arrived to fill it in.

Beyond Haddenham, Sutton station also suffered damage. This was where the line had originally stopped but when it was extended to St Ives a second station was built. The original station buildings burnt to the ground in 1921 and were not replaced until 1922. These buildings themselves were damaged by arson in January 1966. Now a team of enthusiasts have formed a group to revive awareness of its history and importance as a wildlife area. They have a facebook site and organiser Brian Watson would be delighted to speak to anybody interested in helping or with extra information to add – ring him on 01353 777006.

Memories of that station were recorded by John Humpfreys in 'A Countryman's Year' in 1996. In summer the train bore the heavy responsibility of taking our produce to market, he wrote. It would stand hissing to itself in the station while on the platform stood a cornucopia of punts of strawberries, bundles of chrysanthus, baskets of runner beans and trays of eggs. There were quiet days when there were only the usual four milk churns. But there were also special days when children from the combined Sunday Schools boarded with their buckets and spades for the village trip to the seaside that continued long after regular passenger services had become just a memory.

From Sutton one can follow the trackbed back to Haddenham, but the line to Earith has disappeared. Indeed it is easy to be completely unaware that there was ever a station there, although the buildings still stand on the bank of the Old West for those who have the eyes to see. Here the line turned to run alongside the Great Ouse before crossing the wide river on a viaduct, the pillars of which still remain. It was this bridge that proved crucial following the fen floods of 1947 when Bluntisham station saw its finest hour, as railway wagons loaded with sandbags and tarpaulins arrived to be shunted across that viaduct before their contents were transferred to a track laid along the top of the bank to the gap through which water was pouring into Over fen. It even welcomed a Royal visitor when the Duke of Gloucester came to praise the fight to reclaim the drowned farmland.

From here locomotives chugged the last few miles before journeys end at St Ives station with its links to Cambridge – a link that now forms the route of the guided bus.

Peter Paye is a man who knows more about the Ely & St Ives Railway than anybody. Back in 1982 he produced a 36-page illustrated history crammed with history. Now he has expanded this to over 170 pages of facts, figures, track layouts and photographs of signal boxes, locomotives and station buildings, both active and derelict. But no matter how much one knows, and how long one researches, there is always more to be discovered. So if you can add to the story of this now almost-forgotten line from its opening in 1866 to the closure in July 1964 and right up to the present, he would be delighted to hear from you.

And the enthusiasts at Sutton hope Peter will be able to visit their village to tell them more – and inspect the magnificent work they are doing on what was once their only link to the world beyond the island of Ely.

'The Ely & St Ives Railway' by Peter Paye is published by The Oakwood Press at £14.95

Last Wednesday East Cambridgeshire councillors grappled with the problems of housing. One application was for a cul-de-sac of homes, snugly tucked together within a village but with still room for a little garden space. Another was for a new development spread generously out over open fields.

Both present problems of access. At one residents watched while councillors on their tour of inspection gazed from their bus windows. Then a large brown dog strayed down the main approach road. There was no room for the bus to pass so officials waited until it placidly wandered off. It was a scene right out of the pre poop-bag past

Then I turned to the files of the News for 2nd July 1914, 100 years to the day since that encounter. There was in those distant days a major housing problem. One inquiry heard that at Oakington a small cottage with one lean-to bedroom was occupied by a man and wife and six children. There was also said to be a lodger. Three adjoining houses were extremely old and very dilapidated: the inspector felt almost afraid to walk across the bedroom floor. Another house was occupied by an elderly couple and was one of five that should be condemned. The landlord did not care whether it was closed or not. His tenants did not pay much rent and he would probably use it as stables or warehousing. But it was a serious thing to close five houses in one parish. The people could not find alternative accommodation

A similar inquiry into conditions in Barrington found many cases of insanitary conditions and overcrowding. There were houses which were unfit, but because there were no others to live in they continued to be occupied: poor homes were better than no homes at all.

William Hunt said his wife had to live in one room, and he in another, because they could not get a house. Mr Douglas was living in a cottage that was not big enough for the family but he did not know where to get another one while H. Neve wanted to get married but could find no home. However Barrington parish council reported that there were sufficient houses for local people. But a number of people who worked in Shepreth had moved in as there was no housing there

The cottages they had at present were not large enough for families. But if councils were to build larger cottages they could not provide them at rents people could pay. If they lowered that rent the ratepayers would have to make up the deficiency. But – others argued – if they did build better cottages people who could afford the higher rents would move into them leaving their old smaller houses free for those who could only afford a small rent.

It was not just homes: Mr Conder thought each cottage ought to have a little piece of ground to go with it. People wanted a garden, a fair-sized one where they could grow vegetables. There ought to be a quarter of an acre with every house, and never less.

In 1914 the Government had decided to build 120,000 cottages in rural districts to supply the present shortage. They would be provided with gardens as large as the applicants could cultivate and would be available not only for farm labourers but for town workers as well.

Authorities would be able to purchase the land at a fair market value, to be set by Commissioners. That would bring to an end the extortionate prices which public authorities had been compelled to pay for land in the past.

And they even had a solution to the problems of getting to and from work: cheap transit would be established so that townsmen could travel a few miles to and from their employment at fares they could well afford to pay.

This final debate took place in the open air in the Romsey area of Cambridge in July 1914 until speeches were cut short by the rain. At East Cambs councillors shivered on a hot day thanks to over-efficient air conditioning, despite the heat of the argument

But could the answer lie with a suggestion from 1914. They could build lath and plaster houses cheaper. They would last a couple of hundred years. They were much more comfortable and much drier than brick houses and they would last a sufficient length of time.

After all houses can be modified to meet changing needs, and how many former council homes now stand in unused overgrown gardens. But nobody's growing more good-quality agricultural land any more. We should use brown field not green field sites the Government says. But was that this year, or a century ago?

Memories 14th July 2014 by Mike Petty

A snippet in the Cambridge Independent Press for 10th July 1914 caught my eye. It was just a brief report: "The Chief Constable reported that as there were so few prisoners, the female side of Cambridge Prison had been closed, and in future all commitments of women will have to be made to the prisons at Ipswich and Northampton"

This was the County Gaol on Castle Hill, later to be demolished in September 1930 and replaced by the present Shire Hall. It had been home to numerous women prisoners. One who knew all about conditions inside was Caroline Driver, a 49-year-old Manchester lady, who spent 16 years within its walls. Caroline had never been convicted, indeed she was held in high esteem by all who knew her. For she was a wardress on the female side of the prison who'd died of heart failure one morning in July 1913, just as she was about to go on duty. Amongst the mourners were the gaol's Governor (W. Dobson), the Chaplain (Rev H.R. Whitehead), Miss Woods the Matron and her fellow wardress, Miss Mapston

But in July 1914 there was another death that was making the headlines. Out at Wicken Henry Houghton had spotted something floating in the river. It was a body wrapped up in a white blanket, nightgown and man's coat. He had not seen it earlier but passing barges may have moved it or it could have floated down the river for miles. The baby girl had been born alive and had lived a month. There was nothing to show whether she'd died a natural death or been murdered. It was the third time in a month that the body of a young baby has been found in the Cam.

Even a peaceful canoe trip on the Granta could become life-threatening. Mr Cooke, a visitor from London took his wife for an evening excursion to Grantchester mill pool. But on arrival and without any warning the mill sluice was opened, releasing a torrent of water. The canoe was capsized immediately and the couple thrown into the water. Although the wife could swim the modern fashion in skirts did not allow any freedom of movement and she found herself in difficulties. A butcher's lad waded into the river and drew her to the bank where a passing nurse rendered assistance, taking her pulse and ordering brandy to revive the lady's spirits.

More and more ladies were learning first aid and nursing. That week the Cambridge Voluntary Aid Detachments and Red Cross had held an exercise at Newnham College. It assumed that a hostile force had landed at Cromer where much fighting was taking place and a large number of casualties had been sent to the First Eastern General Hospital at Cambridge. However when another train load of wounded arrived Newnham's Sidgwick Hall was converted into a temporary hospital where eleven beds were provided and patients were treated for crushed hands and fractured tibia.

As the make-believe battle raged the decision was taken to evacuate the Hospital from Cambridge to Bedford. Wounded from a battle near Duxford were taken by field ambulances to a field hospital at Whittlesford Station where the platform was used for refreshment and for re-bandaging the less serious wounded. Temporary wards were erected in the station yard to be filled with the 'wounded', represented by Perse School Boy Scouts who arrived in railway goods van.

Meanwhile other women were fighting to prevent war. In the north of the county Miss Priscilla. Peckover had organised a Wisbech Local Peace Campaign which brought together eight thousand men women and children bound by the declaration that war was contrary to the mind of Christ. She had spent a little fortune in helping the movement, publishing a quarterly magazine, Peace & Goodwill and her beautiful home had long been a place of pilgrimage

Miss Peckover's efforts were to fail and all too soon the nursing practice would be put into operation during the Great War that followed the tranquil days of that last summer.

Further information on the Great Eastern General Hospital, which was based on the site of the present University Library. continues to be discovered and has been incorporated into a revised edition of Philomena Guillebaud's history, 'From Bats to Beds to Books', published by Fern House of Haddenham. ISBN: 9781902702292

The cover photograph on the July issue of Cambridge Magazine is puzzling. It shows a group of people dressed in very strange costumes.

Fortunately the photographer, Martin Bond has included an explanation of what it depicts and how it came to be taken. It was cast members of a production of “A Midsummer Night’s Dream” which was performed on a small island in the Cam last September. Martin had hoped to snap the actors at St John’s College but they got chased away by a porter and finally paused under a tree. But if those notes ever get separated from that photograph it will prove a challenge for future researchers – was it really the way people dressed in 2014.

It is all very similar to another mystery currently occupying the mind of Christina Callinan from Victoria, Australia.

She contacted me about a photograph of her great grandparents Charles Walter Matthews with his wife Jane Emma Matthews (nee Prentice) and their first daughter Beatrice (Beattie). It was taken by Gates & Starr of Mill Road Cambridge just before they left to emigrate to Australia aboard the Habsburg bound for Freemantle in January 1890.

Various other local folk were making the long voyage at that time and doubtless their family’s eyes scanned the columns of local newspapers during the journey. They would have been horrified to read a report in the Cambridge Independent Press of 17th May 1890 recounting how over fifty crew and passengers of a schooner had been killed, roasted alive and eaten by cannibals after their boat had been driven onto reefs on Mallicolo, a large island in the New Hebrides. Fortunately the Matthews family arrived safely

Charles had been born in Saxon Street in the New Town area of Cambridge in 1866 and had wed Jane in January 1888. His father was a snob – the local term for a skilled shoemaker.

At his marriage Charles was a hairdresser, perhaps employed by Harry Mathews who had a barber’s shop in Fitzroy Street. Once he arrived in Australia Charles set up his own hairdressing business in Beechworth, Victoria.

That they know. But Christina’s files also include a photograph of Charles proudly posing in a university gown and holding a book, apparently after a graduation ceremony. So how did a hairdresser obtain a degree at Cambridge University?

Members of the family have made enquiries with University authorities and come up with the answer. He didn’t! The photograph was a fake. It seems Charles had borrowed graduation robes and cap for a jape. Alongside him is seated an older academic holding what appears to be a scroll – though it could equally well be just a rolled up piece of paper. (I remember doing the same thing outside the Senate House when I received my Honorary MA back in 1996)

But there’s another mystery. For I have another photograph that seems to show that second figure again in academic dress, complete with waistcoat and mortar board. This time he’s posed nonchalantly with his knee on the edge of a seat occupied by a young lady who is complete with hat and cane. They are not alone for alongside are three other couples, similarly attired, one of whom is standing on a seat with her arm draped around an older man.

Like the first picture, this one is probably not what it appears. Christina has her own ideas. Their poses, arms on shoulders by the women with the men, woman standing on a seat far left and also the difference in both the women’s and men’s ages denotes not young men and women posing for a graduation photo but rather a group escapade, an escape for a few moments in their time but forever in photograph.

The family believes that her Grandad Matthews had been a valet or footman in a large house in Cambridge and wonders if the other servants could be the people in the photo. The woman on the right would look right in a cook’s apron and spoon in her hand and the man on the left side of the photo would make a good groom. The other men might have been butlers and the women housemaids in the big house, she says

But all that is speculation. Can you add anything to the story that's puzzling folk on the other side of the world?

If you can then drop me a line and I'll put you in touch.

Memories 28th July 2014 by Mike Petty

The news that pupils from Whittlesford's William Westley primary school had been involved in a coach accident en route to a seaside trip to Hunstanton made headlines. Fortunately all were securely belted-in to their vehicle and were unhurt despite their slip into the fields

It has been an exciting time for the youngsters, some of whom were a few days earlier to be found dancing around a Maypole at the Farmland Museum, Denny Abbey, in conditions more reminiscent of November rather than balmy July. It was the culmination of their involvement in the Lottery-funded Enid Porter project when, like a number of other schools, they had discovered something of the folklore and traditional customs of Cambridgeshire and learned of the lady whose lifetime had been devoted to ensuring such things have been remembered.

Their seaside excursion took them deep into the area they had been studying. As their convoy of coaches passed Littleport – scene of riots in 1816 at a time when people were having difficulty earning enough to live - a history celebrated in the name of the local Morris troop, the Littleport Riot, whose tunes they have come to appreciate – they had turned alongside the road that clings to the bank of the Great Ouse.

From their elevated position they could see over the great earth bank to the river beyond, down which lines of barges pulled by a horse led by a lad of about their own age, would have trudged all the way from King's Lynn bringing the necessities of life to Cambridge.

It would take little imagination to see other horsemen making their own lonely way deep into the fens along that raised bank and to wonder, like them, on just whose stirrups the distant approaching lights would have been fixed. Would it be a doctor making his way to a patient in an isolated fenland cottage, or a robber returning laden with booty stolen from one of the large farmhouses standing on their own individual islands of clay? And, friend or foe, just who would it be that would need to step aside from the narrow top to allow the other to pass. And would that stranger give a cheery wave or a blow from a cudgel to send you down that steep slope into the river.

The A10 road itself is narrow and was used by a variety of vehicles, including stagecoaches. One was the King's Lynn Union Coach that made the journey to and from London, changing drivers part-way at Cambridge. This was not a prestige vehicle but one avoided by passengers who had the choice. For its principal cargo was shrimps and fish and it could be smelled long before seen. Its driver, Thomas Cross, was an educated man who set down his reminiscences including those of a rival coach company, the Kings Lynn Rover. This was the plaything of a group of wealthy farmers who delighted to take the reigns when weather was clement, leaving the regular driver to make the run when the fen winds blew and the rain trickled down inside the heaviest greatcoat. When one such had encountered the Union along the narrowest stretch of track he had tried to run it off the road until reminded by a less-than gentle swipe across his face from the other's whip. The matter had ended up in court, only for the farmer to lose out once more.

But the Whittlesford scholars had navigated this stretch of their route, they had crossed into Norfolk at Brandon Creek Bridge by the Ship Inn, scene of one of the tales they'd learned of how Irishmen fleeing the slave-labour gangs that had been constructing the riverbanks in the 1600s, had been hanged from a boat moored in the middle of the river. Their ghosts are still said to haunt the area. This was but one of the tales of the fens related by W.H. Barrett and recorded by Enid Porter that they had listened to with such attention when recounted by a storyteller at Denny

They'd covered the stretch of road swept way during the floods of March 1947 when, despite the desperate struggle of an army of men, a bank had burst and the road itself had been blown apart as water surged though the culvert beneath. The involvement of youngsters like themselves was recorded in a story entitled 'The Luck of Sallowby' by Malcolm Saville. It features the theft of Hereward the Wake's battle axe from the Elizabethan Wood Hall at Hilgay. The house can sometimes be glimpsed between the trees in its park beyond Southery where the ruined church stands an eerie reminder of the days when its residents lived literally on the edge of a marsh.

Beyond lay Snore Hall, where Charles I had hidden during the Civil War and from which he'd been led to safety by Mucky Porter, only to be stopped by Cromwell's sentries. Fortunately Mucky had his split grey goose feather, a symbol far more potent than any army orders, which had ensured the soldiers turned away and allowed the fugitive king to escape – another of those Tales from the Fens.

There was more to come – the great new river constructed only 50 years ago to complete the drainage started by Vermuyden, the complexities of the Denver sluices, the ancient port of King's Lynn, the Royal mansion of Sandringham and then the sea

Sadly the youngsters had to turn back before they reached their journey's end. Never can the fenlands have seemed less friendly as they retraced their route home to their own village with its wealth of stories. And never can the sight of their school and their anxious parents have been more welcome.

Memories 4th August 2014 by Mike Petty

For years August Bank Holiday Monday was the date of the Mammoth Show, the biggest entertainment event in the Cambridge Calendar.

It was the day that country folk came into town. In 1914 they included a young Luther Brooks from Isleham fen. He recalled : “At this time August Bank Holiday was the first Monday in August we all went to Cambridge by train from Isleham Station, Mum, Dad, Sissie, Allan, and myself. I was 9 years .old-then”

It wasn't the best show ever: the weather was atrocious but thousands still turned out. The Cambridge Town Band played despite the deluge and Luther could wander round the various displays.

There were British Bull and Old English Sheep dogs along with Sealyhams, Cairns and Irish Terriers. The number of rabbits was higher than expected with some of the specimens having won shows at Tunbridge Wells and Durham while Mrs Western of Sandy's short-hair orange-tabby kitten was the best in the cat tent.

But it was the birds for which the Mammoth excelled. There was keen rivalry between Mr R. Morgan and Mr W. Driver in the young Jacobin pigeon class. Honours were even: one winning for cocks, the other for hens. But Driver also won the best black magpie beating rivals from Fife and Wellingborough

Though the number of vegetables was down, hit by the late frosts followed by a long drought, there were displays of potatoes, gooseberries and onions for Luther to inspect while the roses from Cambridge's Howe House Nurseries won praise in the flower show

The rain came just before the first cycle race, forcing a delay of some four-and-a-half hours. The few spectators in the grandstand were drenched as water poured through the canvas roof but at least the greasy track ensured several accidents to enliven the afternoon. And Sergeant-Major Cooper defied the elements to gave a brilliant display of jumping, his horse clearing a five-barred gate, then leaping over eight men laying on a table

Then for the brave there were trips into the air on a captive balloon. Seasoned aeronaut Alphonso Smith made his fourth ascent when with C. Kidman and J. Rayment he boarded Fred Spencer's 'Right-away' balloon and was last seen heading towards Ely. Earlier Miss Spencer had leapt from a balloon high above Milton Road parachuting gracefully to earth near the level crossing.

Towards the end the donkey races caused amusement though the fireworks were a disappointment – it was something to do with the weather, which matched the general mood of the time

Then it was time for the Brooks family to go back to Isleham fen. Luther recalled: “When we was coming home, on Cambridge Station there were a lot of soldiers all going on the train. This puzzled Dad all the way home”.

Soon even the folk of Isleham fen learned what it was all about. What they had witnessed was the start of mobilisation.

Army reservists, including a dozen members of the police force had received orders to join the colours without delay. About 20 left Cambridge station by the mail train next evening. They received a hearty send off from a crowd of 250 which included a cornet player from the Salisbury Club. The train was a little late and the men had a long wait which was enlivened when the crowd sang patriotic songs. As the train steamed out the crowd sang 'Auld Lang Syne' and cheered till it was out of sight

They were the first of many thousand.

Luther recalled: "What a to do; how terrible. There were four part-time soldiers or men who had done some time in the army living down Isleham Bank. They were Jim, Laws, Isaac Thompson, Charlie Place and his brother William. Of course, they were sent for the .first week.

"Then there was the eighteen year old and upwards to forty-fives; they were Fred Pope, Vernon Place, Albert Human, Clark Human, John Webber, Ernie Griggs. It was a lot of young men for just a small place like Isleham Fen.

"Of these four were killed in action, how terrible. They were Clarke Human, Vernon Place, his brother William, and John Webber, they were about 20 years old. Charlie Place was a bit older, he was taken prisoner at the battle of Mons and was in Germany all the war years. How very sad to lose these young men from Isleham, beside a lot more.

"I don't think there is a day go past but what I remember them"

And now, a hundred years later, we remember them once more. By the time the Mammoth Show was revived in 1922 the world had changed forever.

The speculation at the current Mayor of London, Boris Johnson, might stand be considered as prospective MP for a Cambridgeshire constituency has started the political classes speculating

Of course nomination for what is considered a safe seat is no guarantee of election. But it used to be.

Since the 1600's one of the safest seats was that of Huntingdon where the town elected two Members of Parliament. Both of them were traditionally nominated by the Earl of Sandwich and his Montagu family based at Hinchbrooke House. But in 1818 local solicitor Samuel Wells tried to galvanise voters into action. He could find nobody willing to stand against the Earl's choice, so he nominated a candidate without actually asking him. The proposal was warmly greeted and numerous electors backed the idea. Sadly the selected candidate declined to accept the nomination and embark in what would have been a ruinously expensive contest.

So in 1825 Samuel Wells and Henry Sweeting told the mayor that they intended to stand as candidates. On the morning of the election they turned up with several supporters. One of the Earl's candidates got five votes the other seven. The Mayor then asked for votes for Wells and Sweeting and a much greater number held up their hands. The Mayor consulted with the Town Clerk and pronounced that the Earl's men were duly elected!

This was so clearly irregular that Wells petitioned Parliament for an Inquiry. A Committee of the House of Commons decided that only the Mayor and Corporation – all 13 of them – had the right to vote for the two members of parliament for Huntingdon. Nobody else counted.

Nineteenth-century elections in Cambridge were somewhat more complicated. Here there were two powerful families, one based at Wimpole Hall, the other at Belvoir Castle. But perhaps the most influential figure was Samuel Long. His name comes up time after time in the inquiries that followed election after election. For no sooner had the results been declared than somebody raised the spectre of bribery. And Sam was the acknowledged expert.

On the day of the election voters headed to Parker's Piece where after the four candidates had made speeches the Mayor called for a show of hands in the usual manner. But then someone would demand a poll. So next day they'd erect a hustings and all those with votes turned up to say who they preferred

It was Sam's job to make sure that his party's supporters were crowded in the front of the voting platform to cheer like mad those who voted for them, and boo them that didn't. Meanwhile Sam was making a note of who'd voted, and who had yet to vote. As the day progressed it was time to encourage the dawdlers. Many people felt all politicians were as bad as one another and were happy to accept a ten-pound note, a good drink at the party's expense or a free visit to Berry's 'house for girls'. to influence their choice. And the amount of encouragement increased as the hours ticked away. It was a tricky decision for electors to make: leave it too late and you'd get nothing.

Those who would not be bribed could be kidnapped, or kept well away from the hustings till it was all over. Or their vote would be challenged. In a small electorate Sam would only need to influence 80 folk to ensure victory.

Once the election was over the successful candidates would be paraded through the streets, as in August 1830 when Lord Francis Godolphin Osborne and Henry John Adeane were carried down Sidney Street on decorated chairs preceded by the discordant sound of a band of music comprised of bugles, fife and drum. From windows and rooftops jubilant supporters waved handkerchiefs

It was expensive, Sam knew. Each flag had to be paid for, every flag needed men to carry them – and men need paying. Then every flag needed to be protected – and those men need paying too – five-bob apiece. Somebody had got to find those men – and you're talking about 200 men who know how to handle themselves in an altercation with the opposing party. As well as flags you needed election posters – and that was a good source of income for a printer. You needed men to put the posters up, and night-watchmen to make sure they weren't torn down in the dark. Such men were not the sort of people who'd have a vote – but they'd be recommended for the job by those that did. It was one way that a tradesman could repay a good customer – to promise to put his name forward for a nice little earner.

Of course it's not like that now. Perhaps the turn-out would be greater if it was!

Dr Ian Lawrence has published a detailed study of Cambridge MPs between 1832 and 1885; its title comes from a comment from one of the many inquiries: 'The Notorious Borough of Cambridge' (Tantalus Press ISBN 978-0-9573371-2-1 £12.50)

Alf Peacock was born in Histon. In the mid 1960s he wrote a book about the Littleport riots which was hailed as a valuable piece of social history. He was appointed warden of the York Educational Settlement, where he lived in a house increasingly filled with a mass of recordings, tapes, paper and publications on a wide range of topics. Two in particular fascinated him: the history of the railway and the Great War.

Alf edited a series of publications for the Western Front Association under the title 'Gun Fire', one of which, entitled 'A Rendezvous with Death', was devoted to a remarkable series of letters from the trenches by a Wilburton man, Oliver Hopkin.

Ollie was just an ordinary lad, the son of an agricultural worker – like Alf himself – and when men were needed for the war he made his way to the Cambridge Corn Exchange to enlist. . He wrote his first letter home from the Gog Magog Hills: "Dear Father and Mother i now take the plesure in riteing you a few lines hoping it will find you all well as it leaves me at present".

This was a greeting he was to repeat in letter after letter from far less pleasant surroundings.

In July 1916 he continued: "i am sorry to tell you that i have been wounded ... there is not many of our Battalion left and i don't now nothing about the Wilburton Lads at all i got 4 bullet wounds ... i am pleased i am alive". He recovered and went back to the front. But then in April 1917 the letters from Ollie stopped. The family got another, signed Sergt W. Gilmore. "Sir, These photos & pocket wallet was found by one of my men in a dug-out. The man thinks they belong to the dead Corporal who was in the dug-out, therefore I am sending them to you".

The family kept and treasured the letters that Alf transcribed, annotated and published back in 1986. But then they were stolen.

Alf also spent many hours talking to and tape recording old soldiers. One was Eric Haylock from Newton, who was called to report at Cambridge Corn Exchange, only to find there were sixty there before him. They were all told to go home. But they'd given up their jobs, nobody wanted to go home. So they went and got half a load of straw in the Corn Exchange and lay like a lot of pigs for about a week in their clothes. Later he wished he had gone home when following a massive barrage... "We clambered on to the parapet ... then the Germans come out of their dug outs and got on the machine gun ... men were going down like corn in a field. I looked who was with me and there weren't nobody within the length of a cricket pitch on either side. Then I felt this thing in my leg ... the bullet had exploded and I sat in this hole till 11 o'clock at night ..." After two days crawling he got back to his line, "A few minutes afterwards another boy fell on top of me. Then a shell come and hit the front of the trench and buried the pair of us"

Not all were brave as Alf's own father recalled ... "as we prepared to embark a soldier with several wound stripes stuck his bayonet into his rifle and chased the regimental sergeant major around the parade ground, threatening him. This sergeant was one of the lousiest cowards ever. When we went into the trenches he would get himself into the first dugout and remain there. He was petrified. But when we got further from the line he reverted to type like the parade ground bully he was. He was shouting, swearing cursing when out of the blue sky came a little German aircraft. It flew along the column machine gunning us. And the only person hit was that sergeant major. A bullet went straight through his head". He does not say who shot it.

But Harry Bendall from Cambridge recalled how on 1st July 1916 two young men from the 11th Suffolks refused to go over the top. So the colonel shot them. One had five or six children. The colonel became deranged as a result of the experience.

Charles Minett from Cherry Hinton was shot by a sniper: the bullet went through his arm, broke all his ribs and penetrated his lung. The army said they would not discharge him, but would send him to work on a farm in Suffolk. But why couldn't he work on the farm where his father was a bailiff? "I took out two half crowns and laid them on the table in front of the officer and he picked them up". Charles was away from the war, but the wound took five years to heal.

William Stubbings from Sawston won the DCM for leading his platoon after its commander was killed. As a result he was posted to an Officer Cadet course at Trinity College. Later he recalled how troops had been playing football in a period of calm when they saw a huge green cloud rising high above the trees. They did not know what it was until Algerian soldiers fled towards them, calling out 'Gas'.

Alf's tapes, 200 of them, were deposited at a Cambridge College where they lay largely forgotten in a cupboard for many years. Now York Oral History Society has reclaimed, digitised and transcribed them. Some extracts are included on a CD included as part of a volume full of memories of horses, signallers, medical corps, Royal Flying Corps, prisoners and pacifists, 24 of them from Cambridgeshire men.

The current debate about charging to park-and-ride and the future of Cambridge's Park Street multi-storey car park prompts reflections about a controversial topic – where do you leave your car.

It was an issue back in October 1925

Hark, hark the cars do park
But I am always in the dark
Exactly as to where I can
Station my ancient shandrydan.
How long can I abandon it
Ere constable lays hand on it.
I do not know, I cannot say,
I only know that ev'ry day
Policemen move me on and on,
And further still, until I've gone

Miles from the place where I would be –
Nobody's got any room for me.
I seem to be very unpopular –
Oh, where can I, where can I park my car?

Park Street, once just sufficient for two cars to pass along, was transformed in 1963 by the building of the new multi-storey car park. The increased traffic did not seem to have worried local people unduly: One resident said she thoroughly enjoyed watching the people going in and out of the park: 'It's like Piccadilly on a Saturday morning'

Earlier car parks had attracted controversy. In 1925 the construction of Drummer Street bus station almost prompted a riot as it included parking places for cars on a strip of the adjacent Christ's Pieces. Yet there was no opposition to the opening of the New Square parking place in March 1932. Initially few people used it and one reader launched an appeal for books that the attendant could read while he waited for customers who never came. The park survived until the construction of the Grafton Centre when it returned to grass once more

There were proposals for an underground car park beneath the Market Hill that could be used as an air-raid shelter (1938), or a municipal car park on Midsummer common (September 1949) while in 1957 came suggestions that Cambridge Castle Mound should be used a multi-deck car park with tunnels driven into it to provide space for hundreds of cars. There will no doubt be many objections, the News commented.

Later there was talk of multi-storey parks at Saxon Street, Parkside and Butt Green. The city council wanted one in King Street with space for 260 cars together with a filling station and shops. Motorists were reluctant to use parks away from the city centre as they wanted to get as near as possible to their places of work, an Inquiry was told. The Inspector disagreed.

The Park Street site was selected in April 1957 only to be delayed while proposals were investigated for an underground car park beneath Parker's Piece that would be capable of accommodating about 5,000 vehicles. Even after it opened the City Architect described traffic conditions as 'frightful'. "It will be impossible for everyone to drive into the centre in the future. I am afraid that most people will have to walk in from the outer fringe car parks or travel by shuttle-service public transport", he said in January 1964.

In October 1971 another multi-storey car park came into operation at Queen Anne Terrace, a long stroll across Parker's Piece, followed next year by another in the city centre.

The Lion Hotel in Petty Cury had provided stabling in its yard for guests arriving by horse, then made provision for their motor cars. Over the years adjacent buildings were cleared to provide a waste-land from which parking charges could be taken. The debate had taken 25 years, about the same period that the car park lasted before it was demolished and replaced by the present structure. The initial parking fees of 5p for the first hour rising to 75p for ten were designed to discourage people who work in the city centre

It would be even cheaper to leave the car well outside the centre. An experimental 'Park-and-ride' scheme based the Cattle Market got off to a slow start in November 1976. The concept proved controversial and it was officially scrapped in June 1989, only to be revived later. Since then a ring of parks have been established which are hailed a great success, though numbers using them have fallen recently following the introduction of a parking charge.

But a car park was needed on the West side of the river to help clear Queen's Road and in June 1964 came suggestions for an underground car park at the Backs. Proposals for a tunnel under Queen's Road were floated and sank and in February 1981 Cambridge councillors condemned as 'barbaric' suggestions that a multi-storey a car park either above or below ground, could be built on college gardens, playing fields or open spaces along the Backs. Yet now vehicles nestle beneath the trees on either side of Queen's Road and nobody seems to have noticed.

Instead the all-day parking used by those early-birds working in the city centre has been exchanged for provision for short-stay visitors, allowing tourists to pause, stroll, admire the Backs and drive off without contributing to the city's economy - except the ice-cream vendors and council parking meters.

The front page headlines for the Cambridge Daily News of 1st September 75 years ago summarised events that were to change the world.

Poland invokes treaty with Britain. Full scale attack by German troops. Polish towns bombed from the air. Mobilisation ordered in Britain".

Other reports are headed: "Hitler: 'No choice but force'", "Would seem to mean war"

Similar stories were appearing in papers round the globe. But the CDN brought the news home with a photograph showing children from Ramsden Square, off Milton Road, being issued with gas masks. The few faces that are visible capture the uncertainty of the times.

There's one more headline: "Greatest evacuation begins. Today's scenes in London". It continues: "Britain today began its giant four-day task of evacuating 3,000,000 children, mothers, blind and maimed from the big cities of the land – an exodus on a scale without precedent in human history".

Inside pictures show some of the train loads of children arriving in Cambridge, a town that was supposed to be safe from bombing. Some of them would die when bombs fell on a row of terraced houses just off East Road. But that was in the future. Newmarket council was ready for them, making arrangements to use a disinfection plant to deal with verminous bedding and clothing through the arrival of evacuees.

The main stories have been told time and again, the smaller snippets present a local perspective

Look back a further 25 years to the news of September 1914.

It too reported the arrival of train loads of evacuees, only this time they were British soldiers evacuated from the battle field of Mons, part of the 'Contemptible Little Army' that stopped the Germans breaking through to the channel coast. Rooms on Cambridge's Great Northern platform were converted into temporary wards for the most serious cases.

Outside the station a fleet of motor cars and tradesmen's vans converted to ambulances were ready to ferry the men to the First Eastern Hospital at Trinity College. It was not easy to lift the badly-wounded men out of the carriages but stretchers were placed on luggage trolleys and wheeled slowly along the platform. There were tears in the eyes of onlookers, reporters noticed.

One of those men was Leonard Cornwell of Gwydir Street, who had been the very last to be placed in the train. So within a month of his departure from Cambridge he was back in his own town bearing marks of the terrible conflict.

Other men were unable to return to their homes: they included a number of foreign students who had attended the Cambridge Summer Meetings and were now being found lodgings locally.

Reporters in both 1939 and 1914 considered the impact the war would make on the town

In 1939 shops found their income boosted by the new arrivals & locals, whose travel was restricted, were realising that Cambridge was quite a good shopping centre. There was demand for black-out materials and also higher-priced merchandise such as fur coats. Millers reported a boom in the sale of gramophones and radio sets; they also expected heavy demand for pianos.

In September 1914 too trade prospects were good. Cambridge was full of soldiers: they were camped on commons, billeted in private homes and accommodated in boathouses. The end of the Long Vacation was always a slack time but now the town was busier than usual. Sadly it was not certain Cambridge could rely on the continued presence of troops throughout the war and many firms were unsure how they could keep going.

Men's tailors had sufficient work owing to army orders, but women's outfitting departments reported a shortage of custom. The printing trade had been hit by the stoppage of trade circulars and advertisements and builders reported contracts had been postponed throwing plasterers & stonemasons out of work. Laundries noticed that demand from ordinary householders had dropped and soldiers did their own washing. Two men were convicted of pinching clothes that had been put out to dry on hedges whilst a respectable Chesterton tradesman was spotted by a plain-clothed policeman putting two pairs of thick woollen military underpants into a pillowcase. They had been sold to him by a soldier who had no use for them, he claimed.

Amongst those suffering in 1914 were the lodging house keepers faced with the prospect of far fewer students. Their plight might be overcome by the billeting of officers and the presence of relatives of the men in the hospitals. But they might not get the high rent usually paid by undergraduates.

In 1939 there was little choice: if you had spare rooms you had to take evacuees, they would bring in much-needed income – 10/6 a week (about £30 today) for the first child, 8/6 if you took more than one.

Day by day the stories were published and, day by day, you can read brief summaries in my 'Looking Back' column.

Two stories from the (weekly) Cambridge Independent Press of 4th September

Memories 8th September 2014 by Mike Petty

On 6th September 1939 air raid sirens sound over Cambridge for real for the first time and 200 people ran to the first public air raid shelter in converted wine cellars under Peas Hill, opposite the newly-built Guildhall.

They included shop girls and other workers as well as mothers with babies in arms, Mr R. Smith, the warden in charge, reported. A group of young women from King's Parade came in wearing their gas masks but he'd assured them they were not needed. Even the Chief Constable visited to see how they were coping. By the time the 'All Clear' was sounded shelterers were being supplied with cups of tea from the Central Hotel adjacent.

Down below wooden forms had been installed around the walls of the cavity designed for 400 people. There was electric lighting supplemented by oil lamps in case of emergency and lavatories for both men and women. The shelter was terribly damp when first used but after a few days became quite comfortable. Quite a number of people used it during day-time raids and some slept down there when there was night bombing. 'Roadsters' used them every night.

Nearby, Barclays Bank in Bene't Street had converted two of their strong rooms into air raid shelters and customers could join staff deep down underground. Doubtless people fantasised about what would happen should they survive a near hit only to find that the shock had sprung open the vault doors revealing bag after bag of half-crowns.

The basement under Herbert Robinson's garage in Regent Street provided the largest shelter in Cambridge, capable of accommodating over 700 people. The three steel-reinforced floors above ensured that even if the first or second floors were damaged by a direct hit from a bomb, people sheltering would still be safe.

British Portland Cement constructed an emergency headquarters at the disused Saxon Cement Works in Coldham's Lane. Built by William Sindall it included a complete set of offices, decontamination rooms with gas proof windows and splinter-proof steel shutters. There was an air-filtration plant, central heating and electricity supplied from an accumulator driven by a crude oil engine. The seven bomb-proof dugouts, which were covered with eight inches of reinforced ferro-concrete and two feet of earth, could each accommodate 30 people.

Public shelters were constructed in streets, taking up half the carriageway, below various parts of the town and alongside the river. Those under Parker's Piece were criticised as spoiling the grass. Although they protected against air raids, at least one person died in them. In the shelter under Christ's Pieces a policeman discovered a body of a Dutchman who was lodging in Cambridge. He'd been shot through the head. When they inspected his rooms they discovered a radio transmitter capable of reaching Germany. The news of the death of a spy was hushed up.

Nor did many people realise what was going on in the new luxury flats at St Regis, Chesterton Road. The advertisement for April 1939 had promised buyers a staircase covered with cork, all-metal windows, electric fires, hot water from an Ascot heater above the sink and panelled baths. The flats also boasted a unique feature: the provision of a large air raid shelter built under the garages. It had a concrete roof and would be perfectly safe against all but a direct hit by a heavy bomb. It could also be gas-proofed. This may be why the building became the base for the Regional Commissioner for Civil Defence, Sir Will Spens, the Master of Corpus, from which plans were made on how to cope in the event of invasion.

The News issued a cut-and-keep guide to constructing a refuge room at home. A cellar or basement was the best. The stronger the walls, floor or ceiling the better. If possible the room should be without windows. If this was impossible steps could be taken to lessen the danger of the windows being blown in by blast allowing the entry of gas-laden air. Sandbags or boxes filled with earth should be placed outside them. Otherwise trenches could be dug seven foot deep with at least two entrances and covered with corrugated iron topped with two feet of earth.

Mr P.C. Grimwood built his own shelter in the garden of 44 Chalmers Road. He used a wonderful variety of iron work to strengthen it including a fender, large keys, a sewing machine, part of a bedstead and wire netting. The family never used it as they thought it too shaky and after the war it was left because the cost of demolition was prohibitive. It was finally removed in June 1960 after three days hard drilling with two pneumatic drills, leaving 20 tons of rubble. Workmen said it was well-built and only a direct hit in the doorway would have destroyed it.

When the war was over Cambridge borough council started to demolish the shelters. By May 1947 they'd demolished 175 12-person units, 44 20-person units and 44 50-person units. There were another 42 to go and work should be completed in about eight weeks. That would leave 23 50-person school surface shelters, 95 48-person underground school shelters, 26 static water tanks and 18 wardens' posts.

But do you have memories of sheltering in any of them. Or do you still have a shelter in your garden.

A news survey of shelters

Memories 16th September 2014 by Mike Petty revised

My appeal for memories of air raid shelters in last week's News has brought some interesting recollections.

Rodney Dale grew up in Chesterton. He recalls: 'In the cellar my father built a pillar of tin trunks filled with books to support the ceiling. Later, while others were building Anderson shelters in their gardens, or Morrison shelters under their tables indoors, father tricycled down to the Atlas Stone Company in Coldham's Lane and ordered a reinforced concrete shelter. It was duly erected around the three-piece suite in our sitting room, after the floor had been strengthened. The concrete shelter exuded a dry cold (unlike the cellar's damp cold); its doorway was opposite the fireplace, but we never lit a fire lest some explosion should blast lighted coals into the shelter'.

The postman has brought letters from Pam Ford and Patrick Mills of Cambridge. Both attended Romsey School. Pam was in the infants and girls building and recalls that every time the sirens went the teacher's formed them up into twos to walk in an orderly fashion to the boys' school where the shelters were. It was something she looked forward to for there was a big box of books to keep them quiet. One of them was a Shirley Temple annual that she was always anxious to read. But sadly the all clear sounded before she had chance to finish it.

Patrick started in Romsey boys' school in September 1939 just in time for gas masks and warnings about raids. The lads practiced diving under their desks in case of a very sudden attack but in fact always had a good warning from the sirens. Both remember that at home they had large metal shelters the size of a double bed with a solid steel sheet at the top and metal mesh at the side. Patrick used the top for his model railway layout, his wife's family used it for billiards. They lived in Cherryhinton Road and had a bomb fall in their long back garden; the house was covered in earth and the windows and ceilings damaged but the occupants escaped unhurt

Marion Pocock lived in a house on Maids Causeway. Her shelter was inside the house and situated in the lobby which was in the middle of the semi-basement. It was made with heavy planks of wood to hold the shelter walls up. Whenever the air-raid siren was heard she and her brother had to go into it to sleep in chairs with pillows and blankets. One of Marion's friends lived in Norfolk Street and she had a shelter in her back garden. They used to play there with their dolls and her mother made jam sandwiches when there were no air raids going on.

Marion went to the Brunswick School where Air Raid Shelters were built on the slope of the school grounds. During one of the air-raids the whole school went down to the shelters where they sang songs and played games like 'I Spy'. One of her school pals was aviation historian, Mike Bowyer. He writes: 'A shelter I knew well was at the Brunswick School. We first used it on 18/19 June 1940. Bombs had fallen fairly near and as warden Mr Clover entered the shelter someone called 'Where did they fall?' 'I cannot tell you, it's a military secret'; he replied at which point a fellow rushed in shouting him down with 'They've got Vicarage Terrace.'! I felt quite sorry for Mr Clover...

'In February 1941 we had quite a few cloud cover excursions over the area by Dornier 17s. On one memorable day the siren in Rustat Road wailed an air clear when it should have been a warning. We all sat tight as a Dornier 17 wandered our way. Soon after it passed the alert warning sounded and the school took to the shelters. After about an hour we were wondering what was going to happen because we knew the wrong warning had sounded! The Staff just wouldn't accept that. We missed over three hours of valuable wartime schooling before the matter was resolved. A few minutes after settling to work blow me if a true warning didn't sound again. The right one. But...no one took cover and I was delighted to hear another Dornier purring over in the clouds!

'Mum asked how we'd got on at school. 'Splendid day', I said.'

But it was not always fun. In a private diary Evelyn Ansell recorded a harrowing account of the consequences of one high explosive bomb on a house in Barrow Road on 15th October 1940: "Only heard its final whistling descent then the house rocked and shook, doors blew open or off their hinges, plaster and ceilings fell, panes of glass burst in, pictures and ornaments crashed to the ground".

He noted how their neighbour rushed in, half demented screaming that her husband was buried beneath their house.

"So I out with shovels, observing their house half collapsed and rim of gigantic crater against the part where he was ... then the wrecked house was ablaze, the flames took some two hours to subdue and rescue work was impossible. The poor man's body was recovered next morning, otherwise miraculously no casualties of any kind".

The husband had been playing the piano in the drawing room and was killed outright. His wife survived the bomb damage because she was getting the supper in her strengthened kitchen.

Would a few concrete blocks, planks of wood or trunks full of books made any difference.

Memories 23rd September 2014 by Mike Petty

For nearly 50- years the Best Kept Village Competition was something to be welcomed, or feared, by parish councils. As the day of judgment neared councillors knew that, quietly and without fuss, a couple of strangers would be strolling their streets, peering at their notice boards, pausing at the bus shelters and casting an eye over cottage gardens. They were not looking for the prettiest village, but those with a community pride. At the end of the process would come the unveiling of 'Best-Kept-Village' signs – something else for the hard-pressed parish councils to keep maintained until the next year.

Some villages took the whole competition to heart. In June 1968 Witcham parish councillors set up a working party to trim the playing field hedge and tidy up the bus shelter. But although the village roadman was particularly diligent they still dropped marks on the previous year. They finally achieved the award in 1973 when the sign was unveiled by MP Clement Freud. Three years later it was the turn of their neighbours, Lt Downham.

Manea won in 1985, beating more than 200 others. Judges described it as 'exquisite', 'a gem' and 'a real eye catcher'. Locals had been beavering away for months and had been helped by a poor summer which meant their grass stayed green. Head teacher David Wilson described Manea as 'a tight-knit place where people take interest and pride in their village' and butcher Jim Bent said it was community spirit that won the award.

Wilburton were serial winners: In 1965 they scored 88 points out of 100 to win the Competition for the fourth time in five years. For their first success in 1961 they received £15 with which the parish council bought an electric clock for the parish hall

But inevitably there were disappointed communities.

Grantchester was slated in 1972: The church clock has stood for far too long at ten to three, and had deteriorated with time. "The whole village can only be described as scruffy Its inhabitants seem to be living still on past glories and cannot see that their world-renowned village is but a shadow of what it was" the judges commented..

Some parishes sulked, others responded. In 1974 Melbourn was judged South Cambridgeshire's worst kept village and determined to remove that insulting title from its records. One of the worst spots was village green near the traffic lights. Nearly every evening it was crowded with young people who tended to throw Coca-Cola tins and other litter on the green but the biggest rubbish culprits were people driving through the village.

Longstowe won the 'Best Kept Village' competition in 1976 but life in the community has not always been idyllic. In October 1935 the chairman of the Parish Meeting described conditions: The housing position is scandalous with no working men's cottages built for over 70 years. There were three families living in one house. Two old thatched cottages had been condemned but when the tenant's daughters got married she and her husband moved in with them in the condemned house as they had nowhere else to go

Even if there were homes there were not the facilities to support life. At Longstowe in 1935 part of the parish had to depend on water collected from the cottage roofs. This was inadequate and of unsatisfactory quality. Half the residents had to go half-a-mile for drinking water and mothers complained they were unable to wash their children's clothes. However Hunts Water Company was adamant that the village suffered no special hardship. During the drought the villagers only had to fetch water a matter of 500 yards and improvements would need a new mains.

Water supply was still an issue nearly 20 years later in February 1954. One councillor said: "During this spot of bad weather I was ashamed to see children going along before school early in the morning, carrying sacks containing bottles of water for cooking and for washing. Some are having to walk over a mile". Education was expensive: it cost £26 a year for nine years to educate every child. Yet when they left some could hardly read or write their own name.

Things have changed since then as a display in Longstowe Village hall on Sunday 5th October will demonstrate. Visitors can be assured that water has now been connected so they will be able to enjoy a cup of tea while inspecting the exhibition of photographs, parish registers and school documents.

Part of that change has been as a result of the work of the organisers of the Best Kept Village Award, now known as Cambridgeshire Acre, who today are celebrating their 90th anniversary. When they were set up as the Cambridgeshire Rural Community Council in 1924 agriculture was in crisis, unemployment rife, cottages crumbling, and villagers were moving to the towns to seek work.

In 2014 part of the pressure on the countryside is caused by people moving away from towns and buying up village cottages, pricing locals out. But building more houses would destroy the country community that people enjoy. Many schools, shops, churches, chapels and pubs have closed reducing the opportunity for villagers to meet socially

What is needed is a meeting place and that one of the things Acre has been working to provide from the very start. Today they continue to help communities meet modern challenges at a time of economic difficulties similar to those experienced by the previous generations.

Memories 30th September 2014 by Mike Petty

Its funny how things happen sometimes. At a meeting of Newmarket Gardening Club, in a chapel hall beside a stable, I got talking to a gentleman about petrol stations. He'd run a number of filling stations in the days before self-service pumps.

Next day I was searching issues of the News for 50 years ago, looking for interesting snippets to feature in my Looking Back column. The last one I came across was an article by Rodney Tibbs, this paper's motoring correspondent for many years. In November 1964 he'd written about self-service petrol, reviving memories of experiences I'd almost forgotten. This is what he wrote:

Two musical 'pings' sound in the interior of the filling station as the car rolls to a standstill, the rear pointing to the pump marked 'mixture'. Through the wet and wind a streaking figure approaches the driving side window. The moment of decision has come. Do I get out or do I stay in?

Most men insist on getting out of the car while it is being filled but the majority of women stay put, checking make-up or tidying a hairdo or hat. As always I get out ... "Five gallons please" and stand shivering in the glistening wetness of the forecourt.

The time taken by the average garage pump to transfer a certain volume of motor spirit through a hole in the side of a vehicle can be compressed to a certain degree. What remains is a dreadful microcosm of time during which two perfect strangers must remain strangely, silently and uncomfortably apart or stuff the gap full with suitably polite, meaningless nonsense about the weather as the pump whirrs and a procession of figures and waving lines on its face signify the passing of time.

Inside the car the radio plays to a world of warmth and cigarette smoke. Why am I not there? What is this inner compunction which forces me to stand, chilled and unhappy to undergo this conversational ordeal? Something in me just cannot bring itself to bark an order out of a window at a serf running round in the rain, hand him the cash and then sit in arrogant ease while he returns with the change and the trading stamps.

"Oil and water O.K. sir?" "Yes thanks". "Air?" "A little in that front offside tyre please"

I always follow the attendant to his glass-sided box and wait in hangdog fashion for the change – and the stamps. Why? Its not that I fear I might get a few drops too little. It's just that I like to make certain that the filler cap is correctly screwed on. Or so I justify it to myself.

I'd mentioned petrol pumps only a day or so earlier when speaking at a meeting of Cambridgeshire Acre, which has been helping the community since its formation ninety years ago. They'd been participants in Cambridgeshire's first regional planning report of 1934, when 'petroleum filling stations' had been one of the contentious uses. They should not be detrimental to neighbouring property or cause danger or inconvenience to traffic, the report recommended

Earlier, in October 1922 Cambridge had rejected petrol pumps, to the astonishment of the Mayor. He could not understand objections to the 'putting up of such an appliance, which would fill a car up in one minute, instead of having to run it into a garage and back it out again, taking up certainly five minutes. The petrol pump today was a thing everyone looked for if he motored. He did not know of another town of any size that had not a petrol pump, so it seemed a most extraordinary thing that an enlightened borough like Cambridge still refused to allow a pump to be put up on the footway. In a street like St Andrews-street or Regent-street there did not seem any reason why a pump should not be put up', he'd told councillors.

Others were adamant that petrol pumps were dangerous: Many an "undergrad" would simply love to tear it from the pavement and cart it in triumph to his lodgings, and when he went "down" to take it home and say, "Look, mater, what I did". No, sir, undergraduates' pranks are bad enough at times, and no one desires to see a flaming chariot of burning wood deposited near a petrol pump a correspondent exclaimed.

In June 1925 a new garage opened in Hills Road in front of which was a petrol filling station from which four different kinds of fuel could be obtained at a moment's notice. However councillors were still concerned about the arm of the pump blocking the footpath and causing women with perambulators to go out on to the road.

In December 1977 there was a petrol pump nestling among the rose bushes in a well-kept front garden at Abbotsley. It had been put there before the Second World War when petrol was just 1s.6d a gallon. The proud owner, Mr Harry Smith, told the News he enjoyed a handy supply of petrol on tap. "It is always nice to have petrol, but it still costs us about 79p a gallon, so I suppose there is no real reason for keeping it", he said.

Of course he did not have anyone to pump it for him – but anyway such personal service is now a thing of the past, I suspected.

However on Friday, at a Macmillan Coffee Morning at the Nyton Hotel, Ely, who should I meet but Rodney Tibbs. I told him I'd found his article from 1964 interesting, which promoted him to raise the topic with the ladies on his table, between mouthfuls of cake. And one of them reported that there is still a petrol station at Littleport where attendants still fill her tank

If any of this jogs memories with any of you, I'd be delighted if you'd share them

The Guildhall occupies a prime site in the centre of Cambridge; it is home to the City Council, its Mayor, officers, staff and associated facilities.

Historic engravings of Market Hill show what is generally referred to as the old Guildhall. But it wasn't. The building that fronted on to the Market Hill was the Shire House, built in 1747 for the use of the County justices. It contained two assize courts on the upper floors while underneath was an open colonnade where market stalls were set up. The Town Council had let the County have the site for a peppercorn rent, provided that they could use the building for their business when the courts weren't in session. The town also had the income from the rent of the stalls and the cellars underneath.

Forty years later the Corporation commissioned Cambridge architect James Essex to design them a new building. It opened on 25 May 1784 but did not feature a grand elevation since it was almost invisible behind the Shire House. It can just be glimpsed in the background of one of the old prints.

When a new Assize Court was built on Castle Hill in 1842 the Shire House was handed back to the Corporation who occupied both buildings and bricked in some of the arches to provide extra space for offices.

Then in 1859 the council obtained plans from a number of architects for a new Assembly Room to hold 1,400 people together with a School of Arts and a Free Library. It was completed in 1865. The Library was extended in 1884 with the erection of a Domed Reading Room, now Jamie's Italian restaurant. Further modifications came in 1895 with a wing containing police and county courts together with more offices.

In 1888 a new tier of local government was established: the County Council. They held meetings at the Guildhall and designs were prepared for a new building with a greatly improved entrance, grand staircase, public meeting rooms and an enlarged council chamber. But the proposals were rejected by ratepayers as too extravagant.

The two councils were soon at loggerhead with Cambridge petitioning for County Borough status, allowing them to manage their own affairs (which failed) and seeking to expand its boundaries to include Chesterton and parts of Trumpington, Cherry Hinton and Grantchester (which finally succeeded in 1912). More offices were needed and they came in 1916 with the development of the site of a corn merchant's on the junction of Peas Hill and Wheeler Street that had been destroyed by fire twelve years earlier.

In 1914 the County moved out to a new headquarters in Hobson Street. Their chairman thanked the Town Council for allowing them to use their council chamber and committee rooms for the past 25 years. But the enormous development of administrative business made it essential to bring together departments distributed in all parts of the town. By 1930 that County Hall had become too small so the old Gaol was demolished and a new Shire Hall erected on Castle Hill.

The Borough responded with proposals for a new Guildhall. They debated relocating out of the town centre to the corner of Parkside and East Road but instead decided to rebuild on their old site.

Plans commissioned from C. Cowles-Voysey provoked controversy, with protest meetings attacking the design. But this time there was to be no delay. Work began in 1936 with the demolition of properties on the east side Union Street – now known as Peas Hill. It revealed a building dating back to the Tudor period hidden between a later mock-brick façade which was taken down, beam by beam and re-erected in Long Road. On its site rose a wing of the new Guildhall, dominating the streetscape.

Only then was the old Guildhall flattened and rebuilt to give the building that stands today. From Market Hill you can still see the join between the two stages. It was to have been officially unveiled on 9th October 1939 – just 75 years ago. But it wasn't. The planned ceremony was cancelled because of the war and the building that had been agonised over for so long opened with the first meeting of the Council a few days later.

Cambridge was designated a City in 1951 and welcomed Her Majesty the Queen to their Guildhall in 1954. Since then councillors have continued to struggle to gain independence from their former lodger, the County Council. They have lost out time and again, in 1974 surrendering powers over their library service as part of Local Government Reorganisation.

Now more change is being debated and who knows what will happen on the Guildhall site over the next 75 years

Travellers approaching Foxton do so with some concern for here the road is crossed by a railway line and once the barriers are closed to allow trains to pass through, traffic on the main A10 road grinds to a halt. Some motorists have risked their lives by crossing whilst the barriers are descending.

In 1972 Government announced proposals for a bridge to keep traffic moving. The news was welcomed by the Chairman of the Parish Council. "It has been a black spot for longer than I care to remember, and the only way to stop it is to do away with the crossing, and the only way to do that is to run a road bridge over it", he said. "I am honestly very pleased at the news; it is a major step forward. The next thing will be to get the actual work done"

But that has been the problem.

There had been similar debate back in July 1929 when the County Surveyor reported he had been in negotiations with the LNER who were prepared to erect new crossing gates that were mechanically operated from the signal box for the sum of £600 [about £33,000 at today's prices].

The Minister of Transport was prepared to approve the scheme and pay 60 percent of the cost. But County Councillors vetoed the proposal and pressed for a bridge to bypass the crossing. The issue was still being aired in the first Cambridgeshire Regional Planning report of 1934 which included a photograph of what they described as one of the most obstructive crossings in the county.

Don Challis remembered it. Writing in 1998 he recalled the situation 60 years earlier:

"At that time the station layout was considerably different to the arrangement we see today. Standing as it did then on a cross road, probably the only one in the country, it had a double set of gates, opened and shut by the signalman, an exercise that took several minutes. After negotiating the dozen or so steps down from his box, two sets of gates had to be swung into position, steps re-traced, the gates locked and signals set.

"If that situation pertained today (1998) there would be a queue of traffic a mile long before the train got anywhere near the station. But Mr Funstan and Mr Hale, the signalmen, didn't have to worry about such details; two or three cars at the most would be waiting at their gates when eventually they descended to open them. There were two exceptions however. One was when the Newmarket Specials came through on race days, elegant Pullman trains filled with the landed gentry and prosperous bookmakers en route for a days racing. It would have been unthinkable for their journey to be delayed by a set of gates at an insignificant village in Cambridgeshire, which is why they were opened so long in advance to give the signalman plenty of time to get back to his box and set the signals. On these occasions the traffic would have stretched back to Capt. Martin's cafe! There were times when it would have been even further than that. The sight of such a queue and a uniformed policeman standing at the station could only have meant one thing - the Royal Train was coming through. I saw it several times on its way to Sandringham”

So how did the station get there? It was part of a line from Royston to Shepreth, Foxton and Cambridge that had been proposed by the Great Northern Railway Company. They got as far as Shepreth in 1848 but its continuation into Cambridge was blocked by the Great Eastern Railway Company.. So passengers left the train there and took a forty-minute coach ride for the rest of the way until 1851 when the Great Eastern built a short line from Shelford to Foxton and Shepreth, allowing their rival's trains to complete the journey to Cambridge.

It is not just road users who have faced disruption. On 7th June 1866 several passengers were bruised when a train derailed just after it had passed through Foxton en route to Shepreth. One carriage was turned on its side while another was left hanging over a bank. Seeing the coaches swaying the guard had applied the brakes and the driver reversed his engine, bringing the train to a halt after 480 yards. Inspectors found that the track was in poor condition and that the driver had been going too fast – estimated at 50 mph.

Foxton station was under threat in September 1955 when the British Transport Commission proposed closure. They claimed less than 70 passengers boarded and left the train each week. But the Mr Challis knew the reason – the fares were prohibitive. Some 280 people signed a protest petition claiming a replacement bus services would be inadequate and would increase the drift from the countryside to the town. Today trains still stop and traffic continues to wait

But now archaeologists have revealed that this road may be even older than originally thought. New investigations and analysis of aerial photographs indicates that it formed part of a track dating back to the Iron Age linking Baldock with Cambridge. For part of the way just north of Foxton it followed the line of the present A10. In places they have discovered wheel ruts that had been filled in with sand and chalk to try and keep the road level.

Perhaps this will give motorists something to ponder whilst they wait at the crossing.

The archaeological report on ‘Avenell Way’ is published in the Cambridge Antiquarian Society's Proceedings for 2014. ISSN 0309-3606

The recent statement that the 1871 Pedlars Act which requires travelling salesmen to have a permanent home address and to be of “good character”, is not to be scrapped after all prompts me to delve into my files for information on such hawkers

The most famous of these travelling salespeople is a woman who never lived. 'Zita' was the daughter of a 'Cheap Jack' whose adventures at the time of the Littleport Riots of 1816 formed the basis of a story by Sabine Baring-Gould that was published in 1894. In it he describes their arrival at Ely:

"Very little of the sides of the van was visible, so encrusted were they with brooms, brushes, doormats, tin goods and coal scuttles. Between these articles might be detected the glimmer of the brimstone yellow of the carcase of the shop on wheels. The front of the conveyance was open; it was festooned with crimson plush curtains, drawn back; and deep in its depths could be discerned racks and ranges of shelves stored with goods of the most various and inviting description. The front of the van was so contrived as to fall forward, and in so falling to disengage a pair of supports that sustained it, and temporarily converted it into a platform. On this platform stood the Cheap Jack, a gaunt man with bushy dark hair and sunken cheeks; he was speaking with a voice rendered hoarse by bellowing"

Who were the real pedlars and hawkers? Many appear briefly in the columns of newspapers, accused of various misdemeanours. In 1910 a 58-year-old Chesterton woman told a court she'd earned her living by travelling about the country with a caravan visiting fairs in summer and in winter time hawked coal and coke. She might have passed her life quietly except that a 50-year-old labourer, with whom she was living, cut her brother's throat with a carving knife in a stable in Water Street.

Some have left fuller records. One such was Thomas Holcroft whose 'Memoirs' were published in 1862: "My father was so straightened in his circumstances that my mother agreed to turn pedlar. She hung a basket with pins, needles, tape, garters and other small haberdashery, on her arm, and hawked them round the villages near Cambridge. We passed on to the Isle of Ely, hawking our different wares in every village we came to, always taking care to be present at Wisbech fair"

In Cambridge John Nicholson was a unique sort of pedlar who went his rounds of the University with a moveable stall laden with textbooks calling out "Maps" to attract buyers. However he also allowed free use of his library to poor students unable to pay even the moderate charges he made.

Another was the pedlar-poet James Chambers. In the 1820s his father had been a leather-seller in Soham, earning a fair living by hawking his wares around the surrounding villages. He discovered that having a young handsome boy as his companion was no bad way of winning the support of the ladies of the grand houses he visited. Soon James believed he had learned the knack of selling so he left home to earn a living as a pedlar only to find that country housewives wanted little to do with an increasingly scruffy and smelly urchin hawking increasingly tattered goods.

My stockings are torn as I walk in the dirt,
And some months I've existed without any shirt.
My feet they go wet, and my neck takes much cold,
And rustics despise me 'cause mean and old;

Barns were his favourite sleeping places but farmers were disinclined to let him stay there for fear he would contaminate the other animals. So he slept in sheds, pigsties, in the open fields, under hedges or in the shelter of haystacks. He would often wake in the morning covered with snow, his limb so numbed that he could not feel them.

At last his luck changed; he was befriended by a Suffolk gentleman who took him to his mansion. There he was cleaned and clothed and introduced into polite society. A cottage was hired for him, furniture procured and a printer commissioned to ensure that his poetic musings were published to provide him a steady source of income. But within a few weeks the wanderlust returned. James walked away from comfort and took once more to the bushes and tumbled-down shacks of the countryside.

A century later Albert Barrett was a familiar figure in Newmarket dressed in his shining black gaiters. He was better known as "Ackie Barrett", the Old Moore's Almanac man, but also sold ice-cream. Similar 'hokey-pokey men' would turn up at Cambridge schools during playtime with a barrow containing paper-wrapped slabs of ice-cream for sale at a penny a time. Other travelling vendors included Albert Craske, the Cambridge muffin man from George IV Street who walked the streets with his tray and handbell, as others had done before him, while in 1955 a 19-year-old caravan dweller told magistrates how she would go from house to house selling lace and pegs as well as collecting article left for her rag-merchant father.

Few hawkers made their fortune. For years bachelor Harris Norman lived in extremely poor circumstances in Romsey Town. He'd started as a hawker of cheap jewellery, then speculated in stocks and shares but never spent more than would suffice to keep soul and body together. When he died in 1908 he was found to be worth £12,000 which he bequeathed to be divided between Addenbrooke's Hospital and the London Jewish Synagogue

One man who took an interest in street traders was Percy North who lived beside the old Festival Theatre on Newmarket Road. He would recall the names of tradesmen in Burleigh Street as they were in the days of his youth, nearly a century before. His memory was not only of names but sounds - the calls of the traders who hawked their wares around the small streets off East Road. "Jam jars or bottels" encouraged children to bring such containers to be exchanged for a paper windmill, the lavender girl attracted their older brothers, the trotter man none at all. And then there was Bowie O'Dell with his home made chicken coop on pram wheels from which he sold freshly-killed chickens for dinner.

Do you remember such itinerant traders, were you one?

Kathleen Fowle was appointed headmistress of Coton village school in 1956 and taught its youngsters for 20 years, during which time the school moved from its old building to the premises it still occupies. During that time she developed a passion for the history of her adopted village, writing a short booklet to provide the children with some basic facts about their home in the hope that it would instil in them a lifelong interest in their local history.

But there is always more to be discovered and now an expanded version of her history has been published containing additions contributed by others who share Kathleen's enthusiasm.

One of the village's most notorious characters was its rector between 1788 and 1827 about whom Kathleen would only say that he was disappointed in love and ambition. Now a successor incumbent, Rev Canon Hugh Searle has added a little more

The Reverend Joshua Waterhouse had lived an unusual sort of life for a parson. He'd started off as apprentice to a shoemaker, but had run away. Then he'd enlisted in the army and been wounded in a battle of Foutenoy. He recovered and went up to St Catharine's college, Cambridge where he earned only a poor degree but was awarded a Fellowship. Despite his poor academic ability when the old Master died Waterhouse decided to stand for election. There were only five electors, including himself, and he was so sure he'd be appointed that he moved in to the Master's house – only to have to get out when it was discovered that another contender had received one more vote. Several times the college tried to eject him from his Fellowship but he always outfoxed them.

In his younger days he was one of the handsomest, best-dressed men in Cambridge; he visited Bath and other fashionable watering places, mingling with the best society in the bustle of the busy and the flutter of the gay. He developed a reputation with the ladies.

When appointed to the college living of Coton he soon manifested eccentricities that were to follow his later career. During one Sunday service in church he'd spotted a young man enter the Rectory. He knew the lad was in the habit of visiting his housekeeper and it was not a courtship he wished to encourage. So he'd told his Clerk, Mr Agar, to give out a good long psalm and left the pulpit. Agar sang on till the rector returned by which time he'd accomplished some twenty verses.

In 1813, when nearly 70, Waterhouse moved to Lt Stukely, though he retained the living of Coton. Although he had been a dandy in his youth by then he was somewhat careless of his dress, wearing the same clothes day after day, washing them in a pond when they got too filthy.

His new home was large and elegant but it did not remain that way for long. The bachelor rector lived only in the kitchen and one bedroom upstairs, blocking up the other windows to evade the payment of the window tax. Then he used the otherwise-empty rooms to store the grain from his farm. As a result the rectory abounded in rats. Indeed while his corpse was laying in the kitchen before burial a tremendous rat mounted the table and ran off with the candle

One morning two boys entered the rectory kitchen to eat their lunch, as they usually did. When they sat down they noticed the rector's legs hanging over the side of a large brewing tub and heard unusual, deep groans. Alarmed, the lads ran to the house of a neighbour, Ann Whitney, and told her what they had seen. She thought the Reverend was probably drunk and told the lads to finish their dokey at her house. Then a young man named Frederick Rogers knocked at the Rectory door, entered and saw what the lads had seen. He went for William Ashby who lifted the rector out, lying him on the floor. That's when they noticed his throat had been cut.

A Bow Street Runner was called in and Joshua Slade was arrested after his brother gave evidence against him. It appears the rector had disturbed him as he'd burgled the house. It had not been the only time: Waterhouse had frequently recovered property from Slade's house but abstained from legal prosecution fearing that his own immoral conduct would itself be exposed to public reproof!

Slade was given a public hanging at Huntingdon, though crowds of onlookers were sent home disappointed when the execution was postponed at short notice. It did not deter the souvenir seller who sold his account of Slade's last words and confessions anyway

A memorial was erected in Stukely churchyard:
Sacred to the Memory of the Rev Joshua Waterhouse BD who was inhumanly murdered in his parsonage house about ten o'clock on the morning of July 3rd 1827 aged 81

Beneath this Tomb his Mangled body's laid
Cut Stabb'd and Murdered by Joshua Slade.
His ghastly Wounds a horrid sight to see

And hurl'd at once into Eternity.
What faults you've seen in him take care to shun
And look at home enough there's to be done
Death does not allways warning give
Therefore be carefull how you live

Huntingdon High Street is a pedestrian's nightmare - the News' reported just 50 years ago in November 1964. The narrow road and pavement were just not sufficient. But, it added, "in the not too distant future it will be a pedestrians' dream where traffic is forbidden". For already a new High Street with modern shops was under construction

The need for improvement had become imperative as more and more people poured onto the new Oxmoor estate created under the London County Council expansion scheme. Since 1959 the more ambitious members of London's overspill population had found a new home and a new life in Huntingdon. Only 12 families had gone back, the paper reported. The influx of over 3,000 Londoners combined with people moving into the privately developed houses at Desborough Estate had increased the town's population by a third, to 12,000.

Already there was a minor shopping area north of Hartford Road with six shops, a public house, church hall and – probably soon - a petrol station. A much larger centre was promised south of Sapley.

The inner-city youngsters were to be educated with those of Hartford villagers. Their old school had been replaced with a new one for 320 pupils and another for 240 infants was due to open next year. The hope was that by integrating the children they would settle down into a combined community.

Nearly 700 houses had been built since the first was completed in 1961. And more were coming to the market. Huntingdon estate agents Ekins, Witherow and Handley had homes people could be proud of: exciting new houses and bungalows in family-friendly settings complete with model kitchens and luxury features at prices varying from £2,642 to £5,000 (£48-£91,000 in today's money).

Furnishings could come from Elphick's shop in George Street with carpets, curtains and loose covers made and fitted by competent staff while Stiles supplied high class confectionery, crusty bread and celebration cakes for the moving-in party. The one thing needed was a Murphy television rented from J.V. Robinson for just eight-and-six a week (£7.70), although they also stocked sets from Ferguson, Bush, Ekco, Sobell, McMichael and Decca at their High Street store.

The new residents found work in new factories. Over 140 Londoners employed by Horatio Meyer, the bedding manufacturers, had volunteered to move 60 miles with their families to a new life Huntingdon. The workers, drawn from the company's four London factories, had formed the spearhead of the staff to man the new factory in St Peter's Road making mostly mattresses and divans. There were three other firms producing machine moulded plastic products with another planned on the St Peter's Road estate - and that could well be the type of light industry for which the town made its name.

Huntingdon was well-sited. It was just off the Great North Road, and astride the A14 which joined the A10 to make a good road into the more easterly parts of London and the docks. And the Ministry of Transport had just included the long-awaited bypass in its rolling programme of road building

The expanding population – estimated to soar to 20,000 when the scheme was completed in 1970 – would also need leisure facilities. At present there was one cinema, a dance hall for just over 300 people and several smaller halls. Soon there'd be another where local beat groups such as Strawberry and the Fruit Drops, The Wreckers, The Huntsmen, The Inmates, The Ancestors and The Spyders could perform. New facilities for amateur dramatics, a bowling alley as well as a restaurant and coffee lounge would follow. Already there was the fine new Cromwell Museum opened by the Speaker of the House of Commons in October 1962 although it was sad that many of the artefacts could not be displayed owing to the restricted floor and wall space.

And now there was optimism that an open air swimming pool might be constructed at Bushey Close. It would be the realisation of a dream that had been born 30 years earlier with plans for a pool on Hartford Road fields using water from the river.

But there was little in the way of shopping. That would soon be remedied, the News forecast. The Chequers Court shopping precinct had pointed the way for style while F.W. Woolworth had acquired the Grand Cinema site for a much larger store. The Peterborough Co-operative Society had three different types of shop in the High Street and had recently acquired another. Some small shops were empty but Thackerays, the local builder, were erecting three new ones almost opposite Trinity Church

Historians might lament the “unmitigated tragedy” that Trinity Baptist Church, a landmark for nearly 100 years, was to disappear. It had opened for worship on 16th September 1868 but there was no minister and for five years services had been carried on in a small hall at the back. It would have cost £10,000 to make its 182 feet steeple safe. Now Tesco had bought it at auction for £42,000 and a new supermarket would rise on the site

Then Huntingdon truly would be ready for a prosperous future in the swinging sixties

Memories 11 November 2014 by Mike Petty

Recently Peter Biggs invited me to his Histon home – he had something that might be of interest in this centenary year of the start of the Great War

There I was shown a small leather photograph album recording how five members of this one family had been involved in the war: three brothers and two sisters.

When conflict broke out in 1914 Wilf & Albert joined the 12th Lancers and were sent to serve in Ireland. But soon they were sent to play their part in the fighting proper. Theirs would be a war fought on horseback.

Within days of the outbreak of war several local soldiers were home again, wounded. One of these was Lieut Macleod of the Royal Field Artillery from Waterbeach. He told his fellow villagers of the fighting at Mons ... The Germans outnumbered us five to one. They came on in masses and we mowed them down. Even then they kept coming on. We hung on to the position as long as we could but they enveloped us from both flanks. We managed to save all our guns, though lots of teams were shot down. I was wounded.

Then he added: But the Germans are afraid of cold steel, both bayonet and cavalry charges. The cavalry are doing fine work. They are going right through the Germans and the German cavalry dare not face them

It was worrying information for the Biggs family, whose fears were heightened with the news of the death of Capt Percy Pemberton of Trumpington Hall, the first local officer to fall. He'd been a cavalry instructor to the Cambridge Officer Training Corps but was recalled on the declaration of war and killed in action on October 19th 1914

The Histon brothers, Wilf and Albert fought on together, they transferred to the Royal Field Artillery together, were commissioned together and came home on leave together. Together they met their younger brother Arthur who was also serving with the Artillery. But then they were separated. Wilf was sent to Italy, leaving Albert in France. And Albert got gassed.

You may search Histon war memorial for their names; they are not there. You may scan the thousands of names of Cambridgeshire men commemorated in Ely Cathedral. They are not there. Nor are they listed on the records of the Commonwealth War Graves Commission. For Arthur, Wilf and Albert all came home to Histon once the killing was done.

They had seen terrible sights – young Arthur had been standing beside an officer whose head had been blown off by a shell.

But their sisters, Myrt and Eva, had also seen suffering. For the girls had volunteered to be nurses in the military hospital established at The Firs in Histon.

By November 11th 1914 Cambridge knew the cost of war. Already train loads of hundreds of wounded soldiers had arrived at the station and been transported by horse-drawn ambulances to the First Eastern General Hospital beds under the cloisters of Nevile's Court, Trinity College. And already a massive wooden hospital was being erected just across the Backs at Burrell's Walk.

Soon patched-up soldiers were coming to Histon for further nursing. And that is when Eva started her album of photographs – the one treasured to this day in the family home.

She snapped her brothers when they came home on leave, she photographed the nurses working alongside her at The Firs, and she took pictures of the men she was helping to mend.

Her pictures show that hospital supporters organised bazaars and garden fetes and in August 1915 took wounded men for a picnic on Appleyard's boat at Ely.

The men penned their thanks and signed their names. Many of them were Australians – for troops from around the globe were fighting - including Lance Corporal James. Lineham Beard of 82 Spring Street, Geelong. And one stole Eva's heart.

Alongside the album there is a locket containing a photograph of one of the Australian lads; he was nursed back to health and sent back to fight again. He never returned to Eva and she treasured his memory until the day she died.

Her small tatty, leather album is a tangible record of the impact of war; the faces of young men – many of whom never did grow old – smile out at the request of their ministering angel.

But as I turned the pages, one pair had no photographs. And it was this that hit home the most

For instead of faces there were flowers. Flowers brought back from French fields in 1918. Eva had lovingly mounted them in her album between the faces of wounded warriors.

And amongst the flowers is a poppy, slightly faded but still blood red.

Memories 18th November 2014 by Mike Petty

Last week I was taking a rare opportunity to browse in David's Bookshop in St Edward's Passage, that marvellous treasure-chest of all things antiquarian, when my attention was drawn to a recent acquisition: a series of hand-coloured engravings produced by W. Mason in 1819 and 1820

Mason was at this time working from a shop near Addenbrooke's Hospital in Trumpington Street; he was later to move to St Mary's Passage where he traded as a print seller, picture frame maker and bookseller

It was from there that in December 1825 he published portraits of local characters such as Gilbert Ives who had started as a barber and hair-dresser then turned bookseller amassing a considerable fortune by selling old prints with which he endowed four almshouses. Squire Jacob Butler of Barnwell Abbey was renowned for his eccentricity; he planned his own funeral and had a huge packing case made to serve as his coffin. It was large enough to hold several people and numerous 'house warming' parties were held to christen it. Another was Jemmy Gordon, a solicitor who turned to drink and delighted to mock members of the University hierarchy – Mason issued his memoirs.

Two years later, in November 1827 he published the first of a series of 'Illustrations of the University of Cambridge': picturesque views of the colleges, halls and other University buildings, each featuring four engravings produced from original drawings by James and Henry Storer.

The Storers' works are comparatively well-known but those produced by Mason himself are somewhat rarer.

There is an attractive tinted view of Trinity College library from the river, another of Christ's College with its decorated gate, Sidney Sussex with its stately trees dominating the street, the Old Court of Corpus Christi with two ladies, one apparently a bedder, the other perhaps a visitor.

Several show interesting details. His view of Trinity Hall also depicts the buildings in Trinity Lane that were to be replaced by the University Library a decade or so later, that of Gonville and Caius shows part of their buildings in Trinity Street swept away by Waterhouse whilst Market Street features in the background of a sketch of Holy Trinity church

On Market Hill Mason sketched a man fetching water from Hobson's Conduit with the Guildhall behind. This I had seen before.

But one picture particularly caught my attention. It is headed 'Cambridge from the Hills Road' and was published in 1820. We now call it Regent Street

It shows a wide, rutted track leading towards the town with a few figures making their way in and out. To the left is a wooden fence enclosing a field in which cows are grazing, then a few bushes before the newly-constructed Downing College. Dominating the background is the chapel of King's and the tower of St Mary the Great.

It is an area of Cambridge I had never seen depicted before, a unique image of a tranquil Cambridge now disappeared.

Memories 25th November 2014 by Mike Petty

Two colourful animals have been in the news during the last week: a Red Cow and a Red Lion.

The Red Lion, a large wooden statue commissioned for a London brewery, was displayed in the Lion Yard shopping centre until its removal during construction work on the Grand Arcade. Despite persistent attempts to get it restored to its pedestal the decision seems now to have been taken that it will leave the commercial jungle of the city centre for the leafy spaces of Grange Road, becoming a mascot for the University Rugby Club.

The Lion Hotel fronted on to Petty Cury from medieval times. With the coming of the stagecoach it became a coaching inn where passengers disembarked after their journey, utilising its outbuildings to provide stables and a smithy. The Hotel became an institution under the guidance of Mrs A.A. Moyes who took it over in the 1890s. Under her rule it grew famous as the headquarters of visiting sportsmen and athletic teams. Each visitor was made to feel that he or she was the only person the hostess delighted to honour - so they came back time and again.

The old courtyard off Petty Cury was covered with a glass roof and the rooms alongside became shops for travelling salesmen who laid out samples. Buyers from the big stores came to inspect the goods that were despatched by rail.

The practice died out with the increased use of the motor car. It was realised that motorists would need somewhere to leave their vehicles. By now the old stables, smithy, bottle store and laundry were no longer needed. They were gradually demolished to provide car parking space. By 1950 over 80,000 motorists were using the Lion Hotel yard car park. In 1961 in the single largest property transaction the city had seen it was purchased by a property company. Two years later the hotel closed, though the bars remained until the demolition men moved in during the construction of the development that perpetuates its name.

Nearby the old Red Cow public house in Guildhall Street was rebuilt in 1897 by Rowe & Scott, architect of the nearby Corn Exchange. The erection of these buildings would greatly improve the neighbourhood, it was claimed. Two years later the Red Cow advertised a Concert Hall featuring 'artistes of undoubted merit' including Miss Maria Farror, Miss Edith St Aubyn and the comedienne and dancer Miss Sadie St John. Initial response was good and an American bowling saloon was also opened. But during the Second World War Frank Dobie, the first Professor of American History was not impressed – he found the pub 'too cave-like for cheer'

In October 1972 a London development company applied to demolish the Red Cow and replace it with a four storey office and shop block. But planners invoked new rules over the future of old but not historically important buildings to keep it together with the adjoining Guildhall Chambers. It would provide a buffer between the city centre and the massive Lion Yard redevelopment behind. Now it has been purchased by the Grand Arcade Partnership sparking concern that the pub might be converted into shops and luxury flats.

But it was not just Red Lions and Red Cows that have attracted people to the area beyond Petty Cury.

The first printed map of Cambridge, dating back to 1574, shows open fields on which various strange animals are grazing. By the 1830s the area was called Hog Hill and was home to the cattle market and pig pens. It was also the base for visiting menageries including ten-foot high elephants, onagra - like the zebra but larger, aurochs with two large horns growing from their forehead, polar sea-monsters, anaconda, panthers and spotted laughing hyena. The howling of the caged animals quite distracted attention from the stench of the squalid back-street area bordered by Slaughter House Lane until it was renamed following the construction of the Corn Exchange.

Perhaps oddest of all was Snowy Farr with his menagerie of animals who became a regular feature of Petty Cury in more recent times. Who will forget the cat sitting on his top hat as mice scampered round the brim while Mother Duck and Mrs Chicken looked placidly on? There is a memorial to Snowy alongside the Guildhall. Campaigners hope the Red Lion and Red Cow might continue to keep him company.

Rock Road Library is tucked away in the streets south of Cherryhinton Road. This is not one of the oldest areas of Cambridge, having been created at the end of the Victorian era.

By the start of the Great War it comprised just a few roads bounded by Hills Road to the west and an undeveloped Hinton Way to the east. It was home to families who together were pioneering a new community.

And like all communities it was greatly affected by the Great War. They saw sons and fathers leave to fight in foreign fields and, like all communities, followed the news of their exploits; they heard of men taken prisoner, sons wounded, husbands killed.

But it also found itself invaded by soldiers, many of whom they did not welcome.

Right at the start of the war in September 1914 Cambridge was filled with troops and commons were covered with tents and horses. Soldiers were billeted in homes, stationed in schools, the Corn Exchange and University laboratories. On East Road a new Territorial Drill Hall was being constructed.

Then in October 1914 came news of a barracks is to be erected on Cherryhinton Road. It needed to be completed in six weeks; the task was entrusted to William Sindall and jobs were found for 400 men, working day and night.

By November all the frames and roofs had been erected and it presented the appearance of a miniature town. There was accommodation for 1,000 men, thirty to a hut, a guard house with offices for the Commanding Officer and clerks and a number of cells lined with sheet steel. The regimental institute contained a games and reading room, supper room and canteen while nearby was a coal yard and shower baths. A parade ground and miniature rifle range were to follow

It was occupied by the locally-recruited 11th (Service) Battalion (Cambs) Suffolk Regiment who moved out of their temporary quarters in Melbourne Place School to the new hut barracks. Their stay was brief. Soon they left to an enthusiastic send-off. In every sense of the word they were a credit to the town and county which had reared them. As they marched along with a fine swinging stride, upright and manly, they looked a picture of health and happiness. No wonder people cheered.

But what was to happen to their barracks? Soon they were surrounded by barbed wire fences. There were concerns that these were inadequate – they should be made unclimbable, though then desperate men would just burrow beneath them. The camp was guarded but there were not enough of them – the Mayor wanted 200-300 soldiers with a sentry every two to three years. But the military thought they had better use for such numbers.

And the 800 inmates were unruly, they went around in groups of fifty men with just one escort. No wonder they escaped; one was found in a Cambridge hotel, two or three others were discovered in London. Residents and councillors were incensed and questions were asked of the Secretary of State for War, Winston Churchill, in Parliament

Things got worse. One inmate died of alcohol poisoning. How was this possible: there were no facilities for leaving and no visitors were allowed. There was a six-foot ditch and a hedge between the road and his hut window. However it would be easy for somebody to pass a bottle from outside at night when the sentry could not see, the military conceded

Then in May 1918 hunger drove two of those confined to desperate measures. They were spotted by PC Barnes in Mill Road each carrying a sack containing bread that they'd bought from Bainbridge's shop and intended to sell at a shilling a loaf. They explained that rations had been reduced, though they still got more than ordinary people – 10 ounces of meat, 14½ ounces of bread and a pudding every day.

Local residents wanted the camp to be closed. But those inside were not enemy troops. For it was one of two Isolation Hospitals – the other was on Newmarket Road - and treated British and Colonial soldiers who had contracted Venereal Disease

When the war finally bled itself to death it was time to address the problems of the future. In Burrell's Walk the huts of the First Eastern General Hospital were converted into homes to meet the accommodation crisis with the remaining patients moved elsewhere. But they refused to go to Cherryhinton Road because of the moral taint about the place. Many thought the huts would be a suitable place for retraining the men returned from war but the stigma attached to the site was too great.

Instead there were proposals for new roads linking the area to the Station and Mill Road; this would create work during a period of severe unemployment and provide the foundation for new homes for the returning heroes

Now residents of the streets around Rock Road have obtained Heritage Lottery Funding for a project to investigate the impact of the First World War on their community. If your family lived in Blinco Grove, Baldock Way, Hartington Grove, Hills or Cavendish Avenues they would be delighted to hear from you.

Already there is a display in Rock Road Library and more will follow. And for those with computers there's even a film of a talk I gave there last Thursday, demonstrating just how little is known and how important it is to ensure a proper appreciation of that conflict of 100 years ago.

Claire Adler would be delighted to hear from anyone interesting in participating in the project; email claireadler@btinternet.com or ring 07970671965

December 1964 saw the arrival in Cambridgeshire of three media celebrities, two of whom are still fondly remembered, the other far less so.

The Daleks were mass killers and their arrival on King's Parade caused stares. The creature moved from King's College car park and stopped in front of Great St Mary's Church. There it accosted ten-year-old Timothy Shutter of Grantchester Street and demanded to know if he watched 'Dr. Who', the children's television series.

Tim said he did but that he was not at all frightened by Daleks. Other people were puzzled. One gentleman, who did not realise how close he was to vaporisation, asked 'What is that contraption supposed to be?' A woman enquired 'Is it a real one?'

Andrew Blackwood, manager of the Arts Theatre, was able to give the answer: the Dalek was taking part in their pantomime, 'Aladdin'.

But the real star of the show was Widow Twankey – otherwise known as Cyril Fletcher. Deryck Harvey the News theatre critic described him as a very funny man with an extraordinary range of facial expressions alongside his pop eyes and boyish, mischievous look. But to some youngsters the strange oddly-dressed figure was scarier than any monster from outer space. This was Cyril's eighth Cambridge panto and came with new jokes, old jokes, 'corny' jokes and ad-libbing in glorious abandon.

He was joined on stage by Princess Balroubador (his wife, Betty Astell), Frankie Murray, a wise and experienced actor and Peter Hudson as Aladdin. But Deryck did not mention the Dalek – perhaps it had been eliminated from the production.

The third celebrity, by contrast, had a reputation for cheeky charm. He came to promote a pop concert organised by the Huntingdon Chamber of Trade. Their idea of bringing in a top disc jockey worked: nearly 500 people turned up.

Many of the teenagers said they went to hear the groups, though others said they went to see the compere – out of curiosity. But he did not win over News reporter Elaine Rollings who travelled to Huntingdon to meet him in the flesh.

She reported: It is beyond my comprehension that Jimmy Savile should have won three top disc jockey awards. It is worrying that people can vote him above Pete Murray and Jack Jackson. In my view he is the biggest phoney in the record business

Yes, he is a millionaire, or very nearly. He owns four cars, including a pink Rolls, and seems to have three residences. But look how low he had to stoop to achieve all this. One can forgive the eccentric dress – but not that hair. "It is my smoke screen. I don't have it bleached. I have a fright a day", he said.

He is a patronising, screaming name-dropper – and a poor comedian, Elaine wrote. During and between his performances as a compere he chatted, using his usual patter and throwing in rude remarks, most of which did not bring the uproarious result he had hoped for. Some teenagers like him, but only about 20 waited to collect his autograph.

The sad thing is that teenagers could admire Savile the DJ in his zany clothes and be forced to listen to his 'kinky' comments. He is said to be an intelligent man who has lectured in nuclear physics at Salford Technical College. So why all the sham, Mr Saville? Leave out some of the phoney act and show your true character, Elaine urged.

Of all the extraordinary characters in Cambridgeshire that Christmas which was the scariest?

A recent survey has revealed that Cambridge streets are polluted by traffic fumes. But this is nothing new. Cambridge has had problems with motor vehicles for about as long as they have been around.

In May 1905 the News commented: It is doubtful if any town the size of Cambridge has as many motors and motor-cycles running about the streets as are to be seen in term time. All day long the 'pouf-pouf' of panting engines is to be heard in our streets.

There were problems: many residents were plagued by the clouds of dust raised by the motor cars. Dust-destroying measures usually involved evil-smelling solutions but in 1906 Cambridge experimented by pouring boiling tar over the surface of Hills Road and sprinkling it with granite chips.

In May 1907 the Cambridge Union Society discussed the regulation of motor traffic. They were in no doubt: the motor-car had come to stay and some day everyone would wonder how people could ever have done without it. The noise was objectionable and so was the smell. But there was no earthly reason there should not be a 'smell limit', one undergraduate claimed.

A Queens' man disagreed: as regard to smell from a motor car, had his friend never seen the boys of a village running out, cap in hand, after a car, to get the sweet, sweet smell? A considerable wrong would be done to a section of the community if the smell was abolished, he contended, to laughter.

But this was not a feeling universally shared. A correspondent to the News in October 1916 wrote: "Are the unfortunate dwellers in towns to be condemned in perpetuity to endure the fate of inhaling an atmosphere of noxious petrol fumes owing to the neglect of the so-called authorities? At any moment our narrow streets can be poisoned from end to end by dirty and callous motorists"

But it was fumes from buses that caused the greater concern.

Initially the arrival of motor buses in 1905 had been warmly welcomed: Two rival firms ran trial trips to demonstrate the suitability of this new form of traction and both were eminently successful. They created somewhat of a sensation in the streets and the way they threaded their way in and out of the busy traffic excited much admiration. The Thorneycroft's hill-climbing capacities were tested on Castle Hill and seemed to present no difficulties except a decrease in speed; the Straker-Squire passed with the greatest ease

But within months there were complaints: The buses were far too cumbrous, too top heavy and dominated the streets. Worse, they were very noisy and the stench from the oil was intolerable – in fact the streets were contaminated all day long with the disgusting effluvia, a correspondent complained in August 1905.

Giving evidence in September 1906 PC Wright said he was in Regent Street when he saw the Cambridge Motor Omnibus Company's bus discharging a great quantity of black smoke, it was filling the street as it went along and was the worst he had ever seen. The driver said they had just had a refill of oil but agreed to take it back to the garage, smoking all the way along Park Terrace. The company claimed there was nothing wrong but it was fined £2. Soon afterwards both bus companies were soon banned from the streets.

But in 1907 four new motor buses were introduced by J. Berry Walford. They were as noiseless as it was possible for motor buses to be, free from obnoxious odours, did not drop oil over the streets and were very easily handled, it was claimed.

Fumes might disperse in the open air, but it was another thing within the confines of the bus garage on Hills Road. In July 1933 two bus drivers were overcome by exhaust fumes after working with the starting gang. They were taken to hospital where one had to be revived from a state of unconsciousness through the use of a Novox resuscitation apparatus. A conductor was also slightly affected by fumes, but quickly recovered

That July, the News reported on a speech at a conference of the British Medical Association at which grave warnings were given of the danger of exhaust fumes from motor vehicles. The blood of traffic policemen had been found to be charged with carbon monoxide at a high concentration and that of motorists must be similarly polluted. Should the danger be intensified pedestrians would need to wear gas-masks in self-defence, delegates were told. Sooner or later authorities responsible for public health must take action, the speaker warned

Much has changed since then but obviously more still needs to be done before all Cambridge streets smell as sweetly as they did when hundreds of horses made their particular contributions to the aroma of the town.

Memories 23rd December 2014 by Mike Petty

The first Christmas Day of the Great War is remembered for a few moments of peace amongst the carnage of war.

Rifleman A. Arnold of the 1st Battalion, Rifle Brigade, wrote home to his father in Swaffham Prior: “We had a fairly good Christmas under the circumstances. The Germans arranged it with us not to fire on Christmas Day and Boxing Day and they kept their word. We met them between the trenches and had chats. They appear to be very nice chaps. We had dinner – a pheasant and rabbit, vegetable, plum pudding, mince pies.

Miss M. Brown of 17 James Street, Cambridge, learned about it in a letter from a British soldier. He wrote: On Christmas Eve we started to sing carols and songs, and so did they. The Germans had put lighted candles on the top of their trenches – which looked very pretty across the white ground, for it was covered with frost. Then a German brought some cigars over, and we took them cigarettes and laughed and joked with one another, and had a jolly good time. I myself got some German money, five cigars and six names and addresses so I can prove I have been over to the German trenches. The trenches are only 50 yards away from ours, so we did not have far to go. This lasted all day and we were singing together, and even had our photos taken together

Here in Cambridge Christmas morning dawned cold and frosty and different. Many families were separated, not just by the fighting, but because of the fighters. For many homes had unexpected guests in the form of soldiers who had been billeted on them. The income they brought was welcome – nine pence per man per night just for providing a bed or a mattress on the floor and cooking their rations. But it meant people did not feel comfortable about leaving their homes. It was their duty to provide hospitality for these lads who were away from their own families. So they shared their dinners and firesides.

However some troops were billeted in empty houses and they had to cope for themselves. Those based in Brookside were entertained to a Christmas tea at the Leys School – there'd not been time to arrange a dinner. However Mr G. Lambert of Sussex Street arranged a meal for 650 men at the Corn Exchange from which it was a short stroll to the Guildhall where a smoking concert had been arranged. The Mayor, W.L. Raynes, opened the proceedings with an organ solo. He welcomed the soldiers – coming from a manufacturing town they'd appreciate that in Cambridge the University corresponded to a big industry. Cambridge had done splendidly in providing officers for the army – and the heart of her industry had been taken away

More men would follow and many would not come back. At a short service for troops held in King's College Chapel on Christmas morning the preacher said so: Most of you are likely to come back from active service, but some will return no more. It may be you or the man next to you. Each of you should be prepared to die with a clear conscience. Do not leave a heritage of woe and shame to some poor weak member of the gentler sex, just because your own self-control failed you in the midst of temptation in Cambridge, they were urged.

Nearly 1,000 soldiers spent Christmas in wooden barrack huts in the muddy fields halfway to Cherry Hinton. They put up coloured paper chains, some streamers and Union Jacks to add a semblance of colour. But there was little in the way of festive fare, though a few got a turkey or roast beef thanks to the generosity of their officers. Afterwards the men amused themselves with impromptu entertainment in huts warmed by slow-combustion stoves. There were supposed to be athletic sports but the weather was so bad these were abandoned. Instead a boxing tournament was hastily arranged with – to add to the festive feeling – an exhibition of bayonet fighting.

While fighting may have paused on the battlefields, the casualties continued to come to Cambridge. On Christmas Eve a train loaded with 150 wounded men arrived at the station. Next morning another steamed in bringing 100, 99 of whom were stretcher cases. They were conveyed to the wooden military hospital in Burrell's Walk

There the wards were adorned with holly and mistletoe. Nurses ensured the wounded had festive fare with oranges and grape fruit from Jamaica which was washed down with mineral water courtesy of Barker and Sons. On Christmas morning each man received a gift from Princess Mary – an embossed box containing a dainty Christmas card together with tobacco, pipe and cigarettes. There were other cards from the King and Queen, the Vice Chancellor and Mayor

It was followed on Boxing Day by a present from Lady Waldstein of Newton Hall, wife of the Professor of Archaeology. It was a light-blue tin box printed with a view of King's and Clare Colleges. It would be a souvenir of their Christmas in Cambridge in 1914. Do you have one amongst your family mementoes?

Across the channel in the trenches, the fighting started again.

Memories 30 December 2014 by Mike Petty

With sales mania rampant, television screens have shown customers fight for bargains. It was not like that in the past – at least not at Heyworths upper-class fashion shop on the corner of Sidney Street and Market Passage, Cambridge. It offered a fashion service to women of every age, claiming to clothe them from the ‘cradle to the grave’. In 1952 the firm fulfilled their ambition of also clothing ladies from head to foot with the opening of a new show department in the basement stocking Lotus and Delta shoes for both day and evening wear

Its sale was one of the highlights of the year for the store and attracted crowds, some of who queued all night. But the owner, Herbert Heyworth, couldn't bear the thought of crowds rushing in. Instead he insisted on admitting customers in an orderly fashion and giving them an assigned shop girl to serve them one at a time. The strict code of politeness and personal service was as important then as any other time, regardless of the large number of buyers still waiting outside to be served.

Those queuing were given a ticket which detailed what they wanted to buy and where it could be found in the store. Once the customer was in the store and had been assigned a shop girl, the same girl stayed with them until they'd got everything they wanted. Sometimes it would be as late as 3 p.m. before the queue had reduced to a manageable size and the last shoppers would be admitted all together in one batch

But there were other shops competing for their money in January 1952. The first arrival at Rose's Fashion Centre sale in Sussex Street was there at 5 a.m. and by the time the store opened there were about 100 people waiting, so many that only a few shoppers could be let in at a time. The biggest run was on heavily reduced taffeta dresses.

Joshua Taylor in Market Street reported people coming in from a radius of 50 miles with the first bargain hunter arriving at 4 a.m. to secure a handbag at one-third of its original price. Girls' double-breasted school coats were snapped up and there was a rush on children's felt hats. In the men's department ninety dozen socks were sold at pre-war prices whilst other popular items were gabardine trousers and sports jackets.

At Coad's in Sidney Street the main demand was for all-wool lumber jackets, though long-sleeve woollen jumpers were also snapped. It was a similar story at Messrs T. Tobin, of Mill Road who specialised in outsize clothes. There was a queue of over 60 people by opening time and all previous records were broken. This was down to country people who were now showing more interest in bargain hunting – and needed outsize clothes.

But business was not quite so brisk at Laurie & McConnal in Fitzroy Street: “There's just not the money about”, said Director A.E. Turner; “the sales are put on too soon after Christmas and before people have any money to spend on sale bargains”.

The names of the shops may be familiar to many Cambridge folk. But who recalls Ballard's on the corner of Petty Cury and Alexandra Street which opened in 1868.

On the Ground Floor one could buy straw hats, bonnets, ornaments, feathers – including those from, ostrich, swan or vultures. There was dress material from Paris, such as poplin, sultanas, taffetas alpacas and mohair. Other departments offered silks, plain and fancy, in a variety of shades and qualities, some originating from Japan. There were velvets from the Continent, black silks, ribbon in all the new shades and widths and lace in the form of imitation Valenciennes, new Brussels, Pointe and Maltese. The Hosiery department catered for ladies and children, with drawers, vests and socks in every size, quality, material and make. There were gloves in all the new shades of every make, material, size and price while the 'Manchester & Heavy' department had the best makes of shirtings, white calicos, sheetings, flannels, blankets, quilts and counterpanes.

Gentlemen had a separate room with its own access from Alexandra Street All kinds of hose, half-hose, pantaloons, vests, shirts, collars, braces, belts, cricket caps, rugs, travelling trunks and umbrellas could be acquired at the lowest possible prices – for cash.

The first floor comprised one large showroom, three smaller showrooms, private sitting & fitting rooms and even a lavatory. The walls of the large room were covered with French moiré antique paper in panels depicting beautiful pictures of Swiss scenery. The brilliancy of the scene was completed by ten large glass chandeliers. Here the French Millinery department was under the direction of a French lady of experience in some of the best houses in Paris, who, with her staff of assistants, executed all orders with the greatest dispatch

Upstairs were three large workrooms capable of accommodating one hundred work-women with bedrooms for the lady assistants and servants while the attic floor housed a men's dormitory with twenty beds. All were well heated and ventilated. It was a model of its type.

But by 1880 Ballard's were finding it difficult to compete with competition from the new Co-operative Stores. The shops changed their name to the Alexandria Drapery Stores and slashed prices. They continued to trade until 1882 when major developments were planned for that part of Petty Cury. Now it has passed into history, largely forgotten, like many other Cambridge fashion stores.

The brilliancy of the scene was completed by ten large glass chandeliers. Here the French Millinery department was under the direction of a French lady of experience in some of the best houses in Paris, who, with her staff of assistants, executed all orders with the greatest dispatch

Upstairs were three large workrooms capable of accommodating one hundred work-women with bedrooms for the lady assistants and servants while the attic floor housed a men's dormitory with twenty beds. All were well heated and ventilated. It was a model of its type.

But by 1880 Ballard's were finding it difficult to compete with competition from the new Co-operative Stores. The shops changed their name to the Alexandria Drapery Stores and slashed prices. They continued to trade until 1882 when major developments were planned for that part of Petty Cury. Now it has passed into history, largely forgotten, like many other Cambridge fashion stores.

Cyclists and pedestrians making their way into Cambridge from the west will know Garret Hostel Lane. It links Queen's Road with Trinity Lane and is the last of a number of such lanes that once linked the town centre with the main source of commerce, the River Cam. The others disappeared over the centuries with the construction of the colleges.

The lane once led to an island in the middle of the river. Garret Hostel Green had once been one of the Cambridge commons but was not much use for anybody, being often waterlogged and so infested with college students taking their exercise on it that no townsman dared graze his cattle on it anyway. Then in 1612 it had formed part of a land swap with Trinity College. The Corporation gave up Garret Hostel Green and a bit of ground alongside in exchange for College land in the town centre that was then leased out to their cook, Edward Parker. That bit of land now universally known as Parker's Piece.

Though Garret Hostel island has disappeared, a bridge remains. The current one is the latest in a line of bridges dating back for centuries, with one being swept away by floods in the 1520s. The most famous was the 'Mathematical Bridge' erected in 1768 to a design by the eminent architect James Essex. It survived until July 1810 when the Cambridge Chronicle reported: "In the evening of Thursday the 2nd of July, the lofty wooden bridge over the Cam ... frequently called the Mathematical Bridge, broke down. It had been in a decayed state for a considerable time, and boards had been put up several days previous to its falling in, to prevent persons going over"

The same paper also contained proposals for a new cast-iron bridge at Silver Street. This would be almost alongside another Essex bridge, a wooden structure he had erected at Queens' College some 20 years previously. This was rebuilt in 1902 and is now known as the 'Mathematical Bridge'.

Back at Garret Hostel Lane in 1835 tenders were sought for a similar cast-iron bridge. The contract was awarded to the Butterley Iron Company and the work undertaken by Finch's iron foundry. The result was a fine bridge in the Gothic style which featured on as many postcard views as some of its older college neighbours.

But by 1959 settlement had caused the cast iron to fracture, making a replacement essential. Designs were approved in January 1960 for a new structure designed to be an honest example of twentieth century craftsmanship. It was exceptionally light for its 80 foot span but nevertheless strong and rigid. It was also very steep. Soon fit young undergraduates were soaring over it on their bicycles. But others were puffing and panting. A News reporter watched as a lady pushed her bicycle, its basket loaded with laundry, up the high approach ramp. A gentleman followed, pulling himself up the slope with the help of the elegant bronze balustrade.

Usually the wheezing of cyclists and the swish of bicycle wheels are the only sounds to compete with the chatter of visitors and the commentary of the guides in chauffeur-poled punts passing beneath.

But recently it has been joined by that of construction vehicles bringing materials for the renovation of Trinity College's New Court. One of the complications of having buildings in such a world-famous location is the difficulty of gaining access when essential repairs are needed or new work added. Thus in the autumn of 1838 blocks of stone destined for the new University Library, were unloaded by barge and transported down Garret Hostel Lane to the site in Senate House Passage

For hundreds of years the river, now the preserve of pleasure craft, was a principal commercial artery for Cambridge. Barges towed by horses waded up the centre of the Cam to deliver black coal to a yard in Silver Street before crossing Mill Pool to load up with sacks of white flour at the great Kings and Bishops Watermills. They also delivered supplies to the colleges along its banks.

It was a scene recalled on New Years Day when a number of narrow boats voyaged up and down the Cam to keep alive the rites of navigation. It was reported to be a tradition that has been going on for some years. But does anybody know more about it.

ello Mike,

I really enjoyed reading your piece about the Cam in 6 Jan edition.

In response to your question about keeping alive the right of navigation on the Backs - we are the navigation authority and as far as I know the right to navigate there is not under threat.

It is possible to navigate the Backs in a powered craft at any time between October and March with permission from myself. This year I've had about half a dozen requests - all of which are of course granted - it is great to see boats making full use of the River in this quieter time of year.

Part of our aim as an organisation is to protect and improve the River Cam, and maintaining traditions like the New Year's Day trip down the Backs is as essential part of that.

Kind regards,

Jed

Memories 13th January 2015 by Mike Petty

In January 1915 the armed soldier in his sentry box guarding Ely railway bridge found himself overwhelmed by fenland's oldest foe: flood. He was not alone: days earlier troops based in the boathouses on Cambridge's Midsummer Common had been marooned when the Cam burst its banks

Along the track residents of Babylon, across the Ouse from the Cutter Inn, could take a boat virtually to their front doors. The two cottages near the Cresswells railway bridge were waterlogged, the towpath, meadows and holts submerged, and the orchards in Willow Walk, the sewage tank and rod-peeling sheds were all surrounded by water.

Things were worse out in the fens themselves. At Isleham men watched as the waters of the Lark rose to the very top of the river bank. It was the same at Prickwillow where there was considerable anxiety as to the strength of the bank of the River Lark to resist the continuous pressure of water. When a crack suddenly appeared steps were taken without delay; a number of gaulters were called in to give it an extra layer of the sticky mud. The danger passed.

Such work could not save the Little Ouse between Feltwell and Hockwold. The river had been running abnormally high before about 60 yards of the bank collapsed with a roar that could be heard miles away, and innumerable tons of water passed into the fen carrying huge blocks of clay, each weighing from a ton to three tons for a distance of a quarter of a mile. Commissioners accompanied by labourers rushed to the site with a number of loaded lighters. Thousands of sacks of gault were sunk into the 50-yard gap and pile-driving machinery brought in but the water still rushed through.

Soon twenty four miles were inundated up to eight feet deep and the few residents fled to higher ground. Nor could they pray for relief: St Peter's church in Feltwell was engulfed by flood water and the furniture of St Peter's Mission Church in Methwold was floating about inside the building,

The stock for the most part had been removed as a precautionary measure but in one field a large number of horses were overtaken by the onrush of water. Half were rescued with difficulty while the rest rushed to some high land, which became an island. Late on Monday they were still there, the many attempts to rescue them not succeeding.

The damage to crops was considerable. When the floods came neighbouring farmers sent their teams to help and for a while the scenes of harvest time were reproduced. Women and boys as well as men carted potatoes, hay and corn to the higher ground of Southery village. Potatoes and mangolds were stored in new clamps or ridges covered with straw and a little earth, and the hay and corn stacked and thatched.

Reporters headed along the A10 past Littleport – itself partially submerged - to the hospitable Ship Inn at Brandon Creek where the Great and Little Ouse combine. It was a strange sight they beheld.

On the south side of the Little Ouse farmers were preparing their fields in the usual way. On the north was an inland sea dotted with isolated houses and floating corn stacks. The downstairs rooms of some of the dwellings were completely submerged and at one farm house it looked as though the water would soon be lapping the bedroom window. Now and again a rowing boat put out to one of the farmsteads standing derelict and brought back chairs, bedding, clothing and anything else that could be saved from the upper rooms.

But it was not a total disaster: the salvage of fences, gates and other floating wreckage became a regular business; there were pheasants among the flotsam and rabbits and hares were cheap for a day or two after the inundation.

And where the road from Southery to Feltwell dipped into the flood an old man was busy spearing mangolds as they floated on the lapping water. He handled the spear – a fork with a 10ft handle – with the dexterity acquired by a week's steady practice, and he pointed with pride to the growing pile of red and yellow roots, as large as footballs, on a wheelbarrow at the water's edge. 'Ten shillings a ton, they're worth ... and no one can stop me. You can't identify a mangold', he chuckled.

For weeks the tall smoking chimneys of the fen drainage engines going at high pressure testified to the battle to drive out the water. But despite their best efforts it would be September or October before it was possible for farmers to start back on their land and grow once more the food that was essential to maintain a country fighting another enemy – the Germans.

At any other time it would have been a National Disaster and appeals would have been launched for those who lost everything. But there was a war on and there were far more important things for politicians to worry about than just another flood in the fens.

Memories, 20 January 2015 by Mike Petty

Constable Frederick William Charter joined Cambridgeshire Constabulary in 1934 and served short periods at a number of villages including Melbourn, Shelford, Fulbourn, Bourn, Stetchworth, Histon & Willingham. It was there that he met and married a local girl, Ivy Munns, in 1938. Together they moved into to a small terrace Police House at Stetchworth Toll, close to Newmarket racecourse and what was then an active wartime airfield. Here PC Charter had a busy time during the blackout with frequent accidents, some fatal, at the dangerous divide of the London and Cambridge Roads close to their cottage.

They were a team with Ivy, a trained Pitman Shorthand and Typist, kept busy writing up his reports and taking telephone messages. Each Tuesday market day she would go shopping at Newmarket with friends. One week she did not go as she was visiting her family in Willingham. It was that day a German bomber dropped high explosives and incendiary bombs on Newmarket High Street, killing three of her friends and badly injuring a neighbour.

From Stetchworth they moved to Histon where Fred was promoted to Sector Sergeant and occupied a villa opposite the doctor in Station Road. There he was kept busy dealing with German incendiary bombs and fire drills. By now he had his own Morris Eight in which he carried out his police duties.

Then it was off to the Police Station and Magistrates' Court in Symonds Lane, Linton. Their new home lacked running water but there was always company. For the station included two cells and it was Ivy's job to cook food for any prisoners. They ate the same meals as the family with vegetables cultivated by Fred, a keen gardener who won the Cambridgeshire Constabulary Horticultural Show in 1955.

In 1957 the family moved to a newly-built Police Station and domestic quarters at Green Hill on the Cambridge Road where Fred completed his duties in 1965.

At his retirement he reminisced how the everyday life of a policeman in a rural area in his time focussed around domestic arguments, balls which were continually thrown over the garden wall, litter, riding on the footpath, and dogs. All required tactful yet firm day-to-day administration as they continue to do today

But there were highlights: one Christmas he encountered a wild man of the woods. "His hair was unkempt and enormously long and he had been living outdoors on cats. He would capture the animals, skin them and cook them on a camp fire. We took him in. I believe he had some sort of domestic trouble. Like many others; I think he was glad to be inside for Christmas."

Then there was the case which made headlines. The rector of Duxford became aware of a different light from the porch and noticed that half the lead was missing. Fortunately somebody had noted the registration number of a car seen standing near the church and Fred tracked down the vehicle. Then he spent a long time collecting tiny samples of lead carbonate oxide from its interior. These were taken to Scotland Yard where experts compared them with similar material from outside St Peter's Church. It was this forensic evidence – in 1952 – that lead to the conviction of two men, and brought him one of several commendations.

But it was another incident from 1952 that prompted memories last week. It related to a retired Linton coachbuilder who lived alone in the High Street. His shop looked deserted and gaunt, the front door had not been opened for years and the windows were so dirty they might have been made of opaque glass. After he collapsed and was taken to Linton Hospital neighbours investigated his dingy living room. Inside they found a barrel that was cracked and full of woodworm. It contained silver coins, six hundredweight of them. In another box were golden sovereigns and bank notes, some no longer legal tender, total value £4,000. One of Fred's former constables remembered the event of all those years ago and was able to give his own recollections of counting the hoard.

He'd gathered, along with members of the family, to witness the planting of a tree in Sergeant Charter's memory as part of a new development of homes for local people built by the Cambridge Hundred Houses Society on the site of the old police houses.

While the photographer was recording the occasion for posterity the air was filled with a shrill sound that sent shivers down the spine of Fred's daughter, Judy Young. It was not that of a police patrol car speeding to an incident that Fred would have covered on his cycle. It was a pheasant and it freaked her out.

Pheasants had been part of her childhood: often they featured in cases where hungry men had helped themselves to a brace or two to feed their families. And they were a regular part of the Charter diet too. She recalls seeing the birds hanging in the kitchen of the police house and how her off-duty dad would pick them up and chase her mother around the room with them, laughing happily – it had been part of their family's private way of life.

Now it was, she felt, as if Fred was there once more, long after he'd finally taken off his uniform and moved out of the police house. For years his cheery face had remained familiar in the village streets, respected by those he had served from babyhood to adult life.

Now these long years service to the community around Linton have again been appreciated

From Colin Moule

Hello Mike. I'm glad you are as active as ever.

I was chuffed to bits to read last week's Memories of Sgt Charter. Where did you pick up the information?

I have fond personal memories of Sgt Charter when, as a junior reporter for the Cambridge Daily News in the 1950s, I regularly visited Linton police station to cover the next-door court. At one stage I had no transport of my own, but in those relaxed and more informal days, was able to get a lift with the clerk of court!

Sgt Charter and his efficient constable would greet us with cups of cocoa before the court proceedings began.

Over the time I knew him Sgt Charter became a good friend. He was a wonderful character and was respected throughout the Linton area by everyone - including the criminal element!

Best of all he would often telephone me at the News with interesting stories he had picked up - a journalist's dream . . .

One incident that still tickles me concerns the Press table in the courtroom right next to a massive coal stove. Every time I went to the court I used to put a small nick in the edge of the table with my penknife to record my visits.

One day, with a twinkle in his eye, Sgt Charter said: "I haven't missed what you're doing. One day I'm going to charge you with criminal damage!"

Best regards

Dear Mike

This was my original e-mail to you re Fred Charter. Although my list of messages sent registered as being sent I think I may have made a mistake in your correct address.

Dear Mike,

I was most interested in your article on 'Pc Fred Charter (Cambridge News January 20 2015) kindly sent to me by a friend in Cambridge.

From 1953 until 1962 I was a 'Bobby' at Sawston until posted to Balsham, where I remained until 1966 before emigrating to Australia. Sergeant Fred, as he then was, was my Sergeant at Linton, cruising towards retirement. As you have mentioned Fred was a very keen gardener. Also, at that time, I was keen cartoonist and dabbler in indian ink. (probably when I should have been studying for my law exams) It so happens that I drew the certificate for Fred when he won the Cambs Constabulary Horticultural Prize in 1955.....so I am PUBLISHED AT LAST!. Little did I know that he was probably the Pc at Bourn where I first saw the light of day.

Looking back to my days at Sawston, it may well be that I am the sole surviving member of the Police Force in that area which also covered Abington, Duxford, Ickleton and Whittlesford. The Sergeant there was Ted Sussum, an impressive and fair minded officer who should have gone much higher in rank and was a brilliant cricketer for the Force in his day. I do not know the reason he became stuck as a Sergeant but it was probably Police politics. I feel he would be the source of an interesting article. He and Mrs Sussum are now deceased but I know they had a son Graham who probably lives in the Cambridge district.

Finally Stetchworth Toll. When I was on duty at the Newmarket July Racecourse I dreaded doing point duty at that spot.....it was downright dangerous. One driver ran over my foot in his Mini. Fortunately I was wearing heavy duty 'beetle crushers' so got away with only bruising. Thank you Mike for that article.....took me back a long way.

Gordon Hunt, ex Pc 64 at bop1933@hotmail.com...now living in Adelaide, South Australia.

KInd Regards...Gordon.

Memories 27 January 2015 by Mike Petty

Many people find great enjoyment in digging into the history of their locality. Some pore over ancient documents, decipher deeds, or transcribe wills. Others literally dig it up by taking part in archaeological excavations. But many more just enjoy reading what others have written.

Les and Joyce Price have made their home in Fowlmere since 1978. They spent many hours helping out at the RSPB Nature Reserve established on the site of former watercress beds. After retiring from the University Department of Biochemistry in 1990 Les started to compile a nature notebook. But Les does not do things by halves – by the end of 2012 the notebook had grown to 1,120 pages with photos, sketches and videos showing the myriad of plants and birds which make their home in this largely-unknown wildfowl sanctuary. Then in 2013 he decided to compile a pictorial record – a magnificent 200-page volume of colour photographs, illustrations and detailed observations.

But Fowlmere is much more than its wildlife. There have been people living there for centuries with a moated site that dates back to Saxon times, now disappearing beneath undergrowth. Then there's the tunnel.

Lots of villages have stories of mysterious underground passages, but Fowlmere really does have one. Some say it was dug by monks so they could have illicit intercourse with nuns living across the road, or that it dates to the time of Henry VIII when priests were persecuted. Certainly there was a priest's hole above the bar of the Chequers Inn.

Les believes it dates back to the Civil War when the Rector, John Morden was ejected from his living for scandalous practices – he profaned the Sabbath by playing bowls and three of his maidservants became pregnant. A High Church Royalist, Morden must have felt under threat for some time and decided to construct an underground passageway from his farmstead to the Old Manor House from which he could escape across the fields through a side bolt hole.

In 1991 Les and Joyce were given the opportunity to investigate the tunnel, which is not open to the public.

Les recalls: Our purpose was to make a video recording, including names scratched and written on the chalk wall, so we illuminated the pitch-dark tunnel walls with powerful torches. We entered through the doorway in the cellar of the Old Manor House, taking care not to collide with the metal brackets and old electrical insulators on the left hand side of the tunnel. They had been installed 1922 when an electrical generator in Jackson's Stores also supplied electricity to the Victorian Manor House. We soon had to crouch right down and almost crawl due to the restricted height as the tunnel sloped downwards. When the tunnel reached the road, we were, however, able to stand upright and walk along it with ease. We examined the niches and postholes along the edge of the tunnel, and the various names recorded the chalk: 'H. Ison 1891' - probably done by Harry Ison who was a grocery boy in Jackson's stores at this time. Other names included 'C. Kenzie June 28 1897', 'W Jackson Aug 19 1891' and 'C.E. Barnes 1933'. The workers who had installed the electric cables through the tunnel had also left their mark as well. - 'J Hill and W Haynes laid these wires Aug 2nd 1922 and Oh What a Job R.I.P'

The passage was not damp at all - very dry, and the air was fresh. It was, however, very spooky in the darkness with our torches turned off, and you could hear the sound of cars on the road travelling over the tunnel. At our exit point, we climbed out through an open trap door, with strong bolts, into a basement room in a cottage. Previously this had been a cellar with an access door to the tunnel. We speculated on possible uses for the large niches, which might have been used as altars in underground religious ceremonies, for candle illumination, as seats in secret meetings, or even as a hiding place so that you could spring out and attack anyone coming through the tunnel.

Some believe the tunnel was at one time Y shaped with one arm going off to the cellar of the Swan. Certainly Les was told by one elderly resident that as a boy he had been told 'you could go down the tunnel and come up through a trap door and surprise people in the bar'

Les has compiled a magnificent 320-page history with its wealth of colour photographs which record Fowlmere's three aerodromes – the first dating back to the Great War, the way the village has changed (for better or worse), the listed buildings and affordable homes that make up the community of today. It is sold in support of the Recreation Ground and Village Hall for £25 and most copies have been snapped up. Contact Les Price on 01763 208678 for details

The news of the closure of the American bases at Lakenheath, Alconbury and Molesworth has caused concern in local communities who have become used to their presence. There may be less queuing in Mildenhall shops where the sight of a female warrior with her pistol on her belt can be a surprise to casual visitors. As many service families have chosen to make their homes off the base, their absence from the rental market will be of concern to landlords and local schools will be quieter places without their American accents.

But communities have always had to cope with the arrival and departure of fighting men. In Ely in Victorian times the Cambridgeshire Militia were a regular and welcome sight, as a new history records. The recruits were mostly agricultural labourers who assembled each year for a month's training. Sometimes there were as many as 900 together with their officers, men from the local gentry, who supplemented the permanent resident staff of an Adjutant, Quarter Master and about a dozen sergeants.

Their barracks were in Silver Street, their parade ground the present Barton Road Car Park. There was a hospital fitted up with water, kitchens and lavatories. Another water closet was constructed for the use of the commissioned officers when on parade. The men had other arrangements.

The Militia had been revived at the time of the Crimean war, having been stood down following the defeat of Napoleon. The two men sent to rekindle a military presence in 1852 found the old big drum, but needed to hire somebody to carry it. There were no straps so it had to be tied to the man's back with rope, the drummer following behind him. They also found an old flute and paid for a player. The small group set off to tour the town, making plenty of noise if not much music and attracting many followers. But as they faced the steep ascent of Fore Hill the two-man band came to a complete stop, fully worn out. Only after a rest could they finally reach the Market Place.

Soon numbers of recruits flocked to the colour and a proper band could be formed. With the band came music, not just for marching but for dancing and concerts, adding greatly to the social life of the city. The men needed feeding and tradesmen tendered for the contracts to supply bread and meat. For many of the temporary soldiers the food was a feast compared to their normal work-day fare.

The sight of so many men in uniform, drilling and parading stirred the hearts of many young ladies. The sound of the musket fire as they practiced drifted across the quiet fenland fields. And then there were the sports days with donkeys ridden by officers entertaining the crowds.

But things cannot go unchanged; in 1881 a nationwide reorganisation of Militias saw them become part of the Suffolk Regiment and there were fears everything would move to Bury St Edmunds. So much money had by now been spent on the Ely depot that the War Office was lobbied to retain the local barracks.

The annual training continued, though in 1906 it took place at Great Yarmouth. Ely people were sad to see them go, but the men themselves enjoyed their holiday by the seaside and the railway company offered cheap tickets so wives and sweethearts could travel to watch the annual sports on the North Denes.

But in 1907 came news that the 4th Battalion, Suffolk Regiment – the former Cambridgeshire Militia – were no longer required. The announcement caused protest meetings, not least because £200 had just been spent on the drains at the Barracks. MPs wrote to the Prime Minister but to no avail. The King sent a letter of appreciation and thanks for past service and the Army Council issued an illuminated certificate to each man.

The disbandment would have a devastating effect: Hundreds of farm labourers looked upon the training as their annual holiday, the Christmas bounty meant they could afford to celebrate and many relied on the boots and army-supplied underclothes to see them through the rest of that year. There would be financial loss to the householders who provided billets for the men, to the businesses supplying bread and meat. Schools would miss the children of the permanent staff who would no longer be attending, even the football club would be hit by the departure of the soldiers who'd been such a mainstay of the team. There'd be no more recruiting, and the lovely scenes of springtime, the daily marches of the soldiers, the church parades and the stirring music in the streets would be no more.

The laying-up of the colours took place in the Cathedral in March 1908. It was a final grand occasion before the Militia marched out of the West Door for the last time and passed into history.

As they did so they looked towards the canon on the green, a reminder of the Crimean war that had prompted their formation. Members of the Volunteers had accompanied it in its journey from the station in 1860, deputising for the Ely Rifle Corps whose new uniforms were not ready in time. Today few remember its significance, and fewer still the Militia who were once so important a part of Ely's life.

Memories 2015 02 10 by Mike Petty

Last Saturday evening I was invited to join members of the Cambridge Classic Car Club at a gala dinner to celebrate the 20th anniversary of their formation in 1995.

We were chauffeured to the hotel in the leather luxury of a powerful Rover 8, still effortlessly eating up the miles decades after its construction. We mingled and chatted to motoring enthusiasts waxing lyrical about their various makes and marques and synpathised about a Daimler's loose core-plug in the block (whatever that is). For like nearly half those present, to me motor cars are merely a way of getting from place to place.

After the meal it was far too late for some erudite talk to end the evening, so instead guests helped identify of various of the vehicles photographs parked in Petty Cury or covered with snow on New Street car park in the years when such now-cherished classics were almost brand new.

Reading through the files of the News for my Looking Back articles of 50 years ago I frequently come across articles by Motoring Correspondent, Rodney Tibbs, in which he reviewed the latest output of the Hillman, Sunbeam or MG factories.

Even then people were reminiscing about their motoring memories. One such, who Rodney interviewed in January 1965, was 86-year-old Bertie Baker of Victoria Road, Cambridge who would have felt at home amongst his fellow enthusiasts at the Club dinner.

Bertie had bought his Austin Seven second-hand 30 years earlier and it still purred like a sewing machine after a few seconds sustenance on the choke

He'd been born at Comberton and was originally apprenticed into the drapery business; he soon switched to carpentry and had worked for Marshall's for 25 years. It was that garage who carried out the maintenance work which ensured the old lady had no difficulty passing its 10-year test.

But ALU 474 was not his first Austin Seven; they'd been two others which together had taken him all over the country, only stopping on one occasion because of some 'temporary indigestion in the gearbox'. (I'm sure Bertie knew the technical reason)

The Seven was modest in its needs requiring very little oil and a modicum of petrol, returning 45 miles to the gallon and quite able to hold its own against the monsters of the early 1960s.

But it was an earlier Cambridgeshire carpenter that attracted the attention of the national motoring press 108 years ago. 'Autocar' for 17th August 1907 carried pictures of a home-made two-seater motor car that had been build entirely by its owner, Mr E. Everitt, a cabinet maker in the village of Wilburton.

The frame was of ash, the wheels slightly stronger than those of an ordinary bicycle, having done service on an old tandem bike. The band brakes on the differential drums were worked by a foot lever and the petrol tank was an ordinary two-gallon tin

For the technical amongst its readers, the magazine explained that the differential made use of the two wheels of a lawn mowing machine fixed at each end of the back axle. The back pulley was wooden and came off an old drum of a thrashing machine, the front pulley was also wooden. The car was belt driven using a belt taken from a trashing machine and was tightened or slackened by means of a hanging pulley operated by a side lever which had formerly belonged to a reaping machine.

The tiller steering device was most original, the front weight of car being supported by a single wheel in a part of the frame, pivoted in front, and gliding in a greased wooden groove behind.

The starting handle was a bicycle crank and the engine, a 3 ½ hp Brown, was air-cooled with the help of a wooden fan driven by a leather bootlace. It and the carburettor were the only items Everitt had purchased..

The reporter, F. Barker-Starkey, said he had seen the car with two people up climb a gradient on which many four-seated cars were obliged to change down. For at course Wilburton hill is famous throughout the fens and if you or your car do have to pause at the top the magnificent panoramic view from its crest makes the time well spent.

Memories 17 February 2015 by Mike Petty

It is always fascinating to browse through volumes of cuttings carefully clipped by people in the past. You get an insight into the range of papers they were reading, the ways those papers presented the news and the particular topics that interested the person who compiled the scrapbook.

Recently I have been privileged to peruse two volumes compiled by members of the Martin family of Littleport who for generations have farmed the fens and played their part in the unceasing battles to ensure the good agricultural land remains dry, whatever nature can throw at it.

Sometimes that battle is lost and these albums reflect the consequences. Most of the fading snippets relate to the great floods of 1937 and 1947. But there are a few others that reflect the events in between.

Of these the one that particularly caught my eye was published in the Sunday Express on 30th July 1944, as the Second World War raged. It was written by Eric Bennett from Willow Hall in the Isle of Ely, an isolated farm in the fens between Thorney and Whittlesey. It was an unlikely place for a reporter to journey to in the days of petrol rationing.

But, if Eric is right, Willow Farm might have been on the front line of a German attack on England. He described the scene:

The large drawing room at Willow Hall Farm is pleasantly furnished. From its windows one looks across the lawn and the pergola of Dorothy Perkins roses to the dark line of trees, which is Gores Spinney.

Willow Hall Farm is part of a settlement of four farms and fifteen cottages, three miles from the nearest village. A stone-built T-shaped building it has twelve rooms and is one of few screened by trees. The land to the east of the farm is a 250-acre tract without a dyke, hedge or fence, whilst all the other farms have deep dykes cutting through their fields.

It would make an ideal landing ground for the German invaders. They could then capture the pillboxes built facing the other way, towards the anticipated enemy advance. Then, once they'd seized the Dog in a Doublet sluice they could have maintained deep water in the river sufficient for landing barges coming from the Wash as they launched an attack on Peterborough. Once they had control of its railway stations the Germans would have taken the first step in cutting off London from the industrial north.

Their advance would have been opposed by the 100 or so men, women and children on the farms, backed up by Thorney Home Guard. Their second-in-command, Captain J.W.E. Jackson local told Eric "In 1940 we had here 60 men to protect an area of more than 20 square miles. Our arms were 40 rifles with ten rounds of ammunition to a rifle. On top of that we had some pretty fearful homemade Molotov cocktails.

"Our defence plan was to hold road blocks in Thorney village with the object of denying the main, Peterborough, road to the enemy. One block was so badly sited that enemy armoured vehicles could by-pass it without hindrance. And the road towards Willow Hall was protected by nothing more than a few strands of Dannert wire.

To the south Major I. Burgess was commander of the Whittlesey Home Guard company who would have had the task of harassing the south flank of the German headquarters. He reminded Eric "This is where Hereward the Wake held out against William the Conqueror.

The fen man is used to fighting without natural cover – so he goes in with the bayonet. That’s the way he likes it – hand to hand”

Perhaps that was the reason the Germans plans for the invasion of England, discovered in an underground stronghold near Cherbourg, came to nothing.

But do you have more details of this or other wartime secrets amongst your own family papers.

Memories 24 February 2015

Whilst compiling my 'Looking Back' articles for February 1915 I came across a story that caught my eye

A Lt Chesterford farmer claimed that sparks from a passing Foden steam lorry had set fire to the thatched roof of his cow house. But when the matter came to court an expert claimed this type of engine never emitted sparks under any circumstances and they were so safe they were even used in arsenals. The more likely cause was a spark from a Great Eastern Railway engine.

The fire had taken place the previous April when eleven houses had been gutted and ten families, numbering 43 persons, rendered homeless. The blaze had started at a stack at Bordeaux Farm before wind carried burning straw on to the roofs of three thatched cottages which were razed to the ground. Other balls of fire fell on roofs of houses up the street and those which were thatched fell easy prey to the flames. The Crown Inn and Bushel and Strike beerhouse were gutted. When the smoke cleared the village presented a strange spectacle for nothing remained but the chimney stacks. The paper even carried a photograph – a relatively new development at that time

Reporters looked back through their files to reflect that the fire at Lt Chesterford practically repeated the disaster that occurred at Swavesey in 1913. In these days of slated and tiled roofs, fires of this magnitude were comparatively rare but in the 'good old days' it was not uncommon for a dozen cottages to be destroyed in a single outbreak. Only that week a public house and two cottages had been burned down at Newport. Villages like Chesterford have been largely left alone by the modern builder and were still open to the danger of annihilation, they reflected, adding 'Soon perhaps the thatched cottages will have disappeared altogether save for isolated specimens regarded as curiosities'.

Twenty years later in November 1934 fire broke out at the White House in the adjacent village of Great Chesterford after a chauffeur had started a Sunbeam car which back-fired and enveloped the vehicle in flames. These spread to the corrugated-iron garage which was destroyed. Firemen obtained water from a large pond near the house. There were goldfish in the pond but an attachment on the hose prevented them from being sucked through the pipe

But in June 1938 the blame for a blaze was again being placed on a Foden wagon. This time firemen were called to the main road between Littlebury and Little Chesterford where they found a fairground wagon ablaze. The vehicle, owned by Mr J.H. Manning of Bedford, carried a Jollity Farm and was on its way to Coton. It was completely destroyed.

The in March 1962 an express freight train broke in two as it was passing through Audley End station. The two halves travelled about four miles downhill towards Cambridge and collided on the bridge outside Gt Chesterford station. A tanker wagon carrying 4,000 gallons of diesel oil ruptured causing the oil to spray out over the adjoining fields and seep into a stream. It did not ignite.

But the biggest story never made the front pages due to war-time censorship.

For it was on 30th May 1944 that violent explosions rocked the district, smashing windows at Saffron Walden and leaving the High Street stores boarded up for more than a year since plate glass was so scarce. An anti-aircraft shell dump near Rectory Farm, Little Chesterford, had exploded.

Brief details had emerged in March 1961 when local farmer Fordham, told the News he'd been finding shells on his land ever since. "I must have found about 100 shells and usually am able to deal with them myself". But then while clearing some undergrowth he discovered a 3.7 shell which seemed to be live as it was complete with fuse and detonator. This time he decided to call the police to take the bomb away

Then in November 1978 the army returned to the scene to clear the debris of the explosion. It prompted Leonard Crickmore of Saffron Walden to recall how he'd been a member of the National Fire Service who had rushed to the scene at the time. "There were landmines bowling down the road at us and a shell dropped on the water carrier and blew it up. A box of ammunition dropped amongst us and then three haystacks were alight. There were shells hitting trees like darts and splitting them in two".

Those nearest to the blast were residents of the Jewish Home and Hospital for Incurables who had been evacuated from Tottenham to Little Chesterford Park in 1939. The patients were wealthy and had beautiful linen sheets and warm blankets on their beds. But as the explosions continued they were carried on their mattresses outside, as far away from the dump as possible though still fragments of red-hot metal landed nearby and there was the ever-present fear that gas shells would also explode.

It was, of course, all kept very quiet at the time, though the story was subsequently told by Janet Clark in 'Disaster at the Park', published in 1994 and still available from the Recorders of Uttlesford History website - <http://www.recordinguttlesfordhistory.org.uk/>

Soham is 'The last place God made but forgot to finish', claimed residents 50 years ago when in March 1965 the News ran a major feature on the town that is a village

It was then an active community with its annual Whit Monday carnival while the Grammar School continued to despatch its students to a variety of universities both in this country and abroad. Both are now but history.

There had been a steady increase in housing including the new development at West Drive Crescent which comprised 'system-built' two-bedroomed timber bungalows for old people that could be completed in ten weeks, considerably quicker than traditional methods

With its busy shopping centre and brighter shops, Soham was attracting motorists but needed somewhere to put their cars. Meanwhile traffic wound its way past the church – a by-pass was being planned but that would still be some years off.

It was a predominately agricultural community but many of its 5,500 inhabitants who worked in light industry were collected by the firms' workers' coaches each day. The existing Soham industry was thriving, ranging from flour milling and bodywork to egg packing and light industrial machinery construction.

But there was a need for more. Planning permission had already been obtained for a six-acre site in Fordham Road, but industrialists were not waiting to come – they would have to be persuaded. Following much negotiation one firm had agreed to establish some light industry. They would have employed about 250 people initially, increasing to 1,000 within a year. But instead they went to Newmarket where land prices were less than a third of those at Soham.

Over five percent of the parish acreage was made up of common and charitable lands. But the traditional rights of grazing were dwindling and that land was then slowly slipping from usefulness before the Parish Council's eyes. Perhaps this should be allocated to more light industry, they were pondering.

But how did Soham get all those commons, who could use them and for what?

This is one of the topics addressed in a major new history by William Franklin who has delved into an immense number of ancient documents. He records the disturbances of 1632 which followed an attempt to inclose lands around Barway which led to a crowd of poor people halting Queen Henrietta Maria's coach as she passed through Soham, prompting King Charles I to order the sheriff to suppress the rioters.

He also includes notes on the route of a 'Perambulation Day' and a map of 1656 which enable him to explore street after street: Clay that lead to one of the two watermills, Fountain Lane where the steelyard would later be erected, Paddock Street where livestock were kept, Pratt – named after Thomas and Mabila who lived there in the 1300s.

Then there are the principal inhabitants like Thomas Chicheley, a name familiar to former Soham Grammarians since it was used as the name of one of the 'Houses'. At last we can learn something of his story, though the reputation of the more interesting William Dunn Gardner is allowed to pass relatively unscathed.

Nor is the social history overlooked: the cholera, constables, markets and inns all feature. So does the parish workhouse, where, according to the Soham peasant poet James Chambers 'A post with two ringles is fixed to the wall, Where orphans, when lashed, loud for mercy do call'.

The great fire of 1846 is described in graphic detail with a plan showing the extent of the devastation in Hall Street and there is an account of the railway accident on the line's opening day in September 1879. But you will look in vain for the story of the ammunition train explosion.

For this is a book that concentrates on Soham's earlier history; on its great Mere, the charities, churches and that great Minster established by St Felix before he moved to Dunwich and to which his body was returned for burial. Nobody knows for certain where his great church stood, so comprehensively destroyed was it by Danish raiders.

Truly Soham folk might feel that not only had their God forgot to finish his work, but that he failed to prevent its destruction. But they can no longer claim that its history has been overlooked.

William Franklin will be talking about Soham's agricultural history to the Fenland History on Friday meeting at Ely Methodist Church on 13th March, 10.30 am.

Caldecote is one of those places that send me looking for my Ordnance Survey map (or Google Earth since I can never find the map). Of course, I remember, it's that long thin village between the A428 and B1046 Toft to Bourn road.

But now there is no excuse for not knowing everything about it. For the Caldecote Local History Group have produced a massive 482-page history of this quite small little village. It really is a tremendous piece of work and essential reading for anyone whose families have had any connection with the area

They have researched the archaeology, plague, poor law, civil war, Bourn Airfield and the Short Brothers factory on the Madingley Road where Emily Howe repaired damaged Stirling bombers. There are notes on Josephine's Band and the growth of Tin Town – the smallholdings whose dwellings in Highfields with their lack of sanitation and electricity became so bad that the District Council wanted them cleared. Now redeveloped it is an important part of the village. There are sections on geology, farming, families, social life; the village hall and much much more including the double funeral of two old soldiers in May 1914

Villagers have also scoured libraries, archives and residents' albums to find a wealth of pictorial images with which to illustrate their book, including colour photographs of murals at Childerley Gate School that had been built after a Halifax bomber hit the old one when landing.

But however much you research inevitably something will turn up just after the book is out. Which is what has happened to Caldecote. For during my digging through files of the Cambridge Express for 1893 I have chanced upon probably the oldest picture of the village church.

It was produced by John Sebert Clarke, the most prolific local artist of the age. John's journalistic career had started with the 'Cambridgeshire Weekly News' at the beginning of the 1890s but between 1892 and 1896 his sketches were published in the Cambridge Express most weeks. They proved so popular that some were subsequently issued in two volumes entitled 'An Artist's Rambles in Cambridgeshire'.

Although his name and artwork survives little has yet been discovered about the man himself. Both he and his wife described themselves as "artists" and lived in several houses in Cambridge. In 1881 he was in Earl Street while the final entry in the street directory seems to be in 1907 when he appears as a builder and decorator with a workshop in Blinco Grove. But John continued to exercise his art for in October 1913 he produced an illustrated scroll that was presented to W.H. Smith at Trinity Place Mission Hall. He died of influenza and pneumonia on 31st October 1918.

The Cambridgeshire Collection has many examples of his work including detailed drawings produced to explain technical difficulties when iron pipes were laid across the bed of the Mill Pool during the installation of sewage in 1895. He depicted the large fire of October 1890 which caused £2,000 worth of damage to rooms at Clare College, destroying the roof, bringing down the ceiling of the Combination Room and cracking the college's 270-year-old bell.

Those sketches in the Express for 1893 include a view of Petersfield Lodge in Mill Road, Cambridge, then home to Mayor Samuel Leggate Young, the ford at Duxford, Biggin Abbey near Horningsea. Wilbraham Temple and the Wale Memorial at Harston. But the majority are of churches including Toft, Lt Shelford, Bottisham, Longstanton and Grantchester.

Amongst them all is Caldecote (which he spells without the 'e') that was published on 16th December 1893. His accompanying notes refer to the restoration of 1861, the medieval holy water stoup and the extensive view from the tower. The picture is not really that exciting – except when it's of your village, when you start to wonder just who those figures near the porch might be

My daily 'Looking Back' column can also reveal snippets of the past that have otherwise been overlooked. Now thousands of these can be read online for free. Simply Google 'Internet Archive' and search 'Mike Petty Cambridge'

Memories 17 March 2015, by Mike Petty

Over the weekend fire devastated the former Tivoli cinema on Chesterton Road, near Mitcham's Corner.

It is not the first time it has hit the headlines

The "Tivoli", was Cambridge's sixth cinema when it opened in March 1925. A News reporter who was given a preview came away very much impressed with the attractiveness of the interior. It had comfort, excellent lighting and excellent decoration. Over 600 people could be seated in the body of the hall and gallery but if you wanted a private box for six people you might have one for the sum of 15s (75p), he informed readers.

H.G. Benstead was one of the first into the new building; he told me in March 2000: "When it was built the news spread that they wanted young people to help test the circle on the following Sunday, and a gift would be given. I and several mates went along and joined a long queue. When the doors opened we went up the stairs and were told to sit down until every seat was full. A man came at the front of the screen and asked us to stand up – sit down – stand up and mark time – sit down – stand up and then leave. When we got to the bottom of the stairs we were given a shilling (05p). We were well pleased!" And doubtless many returned to spend their coppers on seats for the films.

On the first night it was hailed as "Chesterton's super cinema" and had every justification for expressing itself in superlatives. With its courteous staff of brown-uniformed attendants it was elaborate, cosy, artistically lighted and efficiently ventilated. It also boasted an excellent orchestra and a screen sufficiently large to do justice to the most elaborate film productions. Sadly the evening was marred by one small technicality: the projection was not quite perfect, but this could soon be remedied

Not all the films it showed were professionally-made. In June 1927 the Tivoli gave a screening to "Grit" an undergraduate film directed by Mr Dennis Arundell and filmed on a little Cine-Kodak camera. It was believed to be the first serious attempt in an English University to obtain experience in the technique of film production and was one of the first amateur films to be exhibited in the country. It was a tale of how the stroke of a college crew was kidnapped so his boat might not go head of the river and featured some good views of Cambridge streets and colleges. More authentic rowing footage of the Oxford and Cambridge Boat Race was rushed to Cambridge to be shown on the evening of the 1930 event

That year a new sound installation manufactured by British Acoustic was installed when the first film featured Maurice Chevalier in 'Innocents in Paris' supported by the comedy 'Talkie'. Later a young Alan Kersey (later to be the News' film reporter) recalled how on one occasion he'd watched 'Tarzan and the Amazons' three times in a row and his grandmother rang the police to find out what had happened to him

But not all films were appreciated. In November 1933 a recruiting film 'Our Fighting Navy' was withdrawn following lively scenes. Fifty undergraduate anti-war students, including Alan Turing of King's College (later mastermind code-breaker at Bletchley Park), organised a protest against what they saw as blatant militarist propaganda. But a rival party, numbering about a thousand undergraduates, marched to the Tivoli with two bands playing war-time songs and carrying Union Jacks. Several tried to push their way in, a stink bomb was let off in the vestibule and cries of 'Down with Hitler' and 'Heil Hitler' were heard above the general uproar until four policemen with drawn truncheons, managed to restore order

The cinema itself featured in one of the Cambridge Accident Prevention Council's road-safety films. 'Horse Sense' made in 1952 featured the adventures of a horse called Patch that escapes from its stable and wanders about the streets of Cambridge passing the Tivoli where children are waiting for admission. The principal characters were members of the Rodney Dramatic Club who rehearsed in the 'Little Theatre' behind the New Spring pub next door.

Film star Diana Dors made a personal appearance in 1950 but in November 1956 the Tivoli closed, with Associated British Cinemas claiming the heavy burden of entertainment tax had made it uneconomic. It was one of 180 cinemas forced to close that year, including the Playhouse on Mill Road.

For a while the building housed Flinders electrical wholesalers but In March 1982 a plan to turn it into an arts and entertainment centre with featured films, fashion shows, music and exhibitions was rejected following residents' concerns over potential noise and traffic problems. It became 'The Exchange' a fitness club and bar with some of the most advanced computerised workout equipment in the country together with a Turkish bath and sauna. This was put up for sale for in May 1990 and later came its conversion into the pub and restaurant now so severely damaged

But even this is not new: in July 1939 an incendiary bomb hit the Tivoli and fire fighters were badly handicapped when they found no water was available from the hydrant. But within a few minutes a van-drawn Scammell pump pulled up outside. Firemen transported the pump to the riverside from which a hose was laid to a portable canvas dam near the burning building. Eighteen lorries with an illuminated red cross were used as ambulances to treat the casualties including two usherettes who suffered serious burns.

That fire was just an ARP exercise, the one last weekend was only too real.

Memories 24th March 2015 by Mike Petty

Browsing through a bookshop in Stamford the other week I spotted a little volume on the Fenland Waterways produced back in 1974 by Alan and Michael Roulstone. It was not the words that attracted me but its watercolour illustrations.

One shows the great Denver Sluice where a new interpretation centre is shortly to be launched to explain something of the complexities of the fenland drainage system. Another depicts motor boats passing through the Hermitage locks at Earith to enter the Old West River which joins the Cam at Pope's Corner, where the Fish and Duck offered both food and moorings. That has now passed into history.

To the south is Bridge Hotel at Clayhithe which before the Great War was famous for its menagerie that attracted Cambridge folk to admire the variety of exotic animals, including kangaroos, monkeys, lemurs and snakes. The last, a bear, was killed, cooked and eaten during the height of first-war rationing.

There is however another location where motor boaters can dine well and enjoy the most convivial of company. It is the clubhouse of the Cambridge Motor Boat Club where I recently shared a table with the President, Commodore and the Rear Commodore who had spent his lifetime on the river, much of it at Bucken Marina (another of Roulstone's paintings). The history of the club was ably researched by Bob Foote to commemorate its centenary in 2011.

By then word 'Boatoring' was a serious rival to sailing on the river Cam with about 80 of this type of craft of various sizes and power. In 1923 speaking at the Club's annual dinner the Mayor, G.P. Hawkins, said he had often looked at the "motorists of the Cam" with envying eyes. He had thought what a lazy lot of chaps they were. But he had also thought what a jolly good time they were having.

But there can be problems: In August 1909 a petrol-driven motor boat carrying a party of five undergraduates caught fire on the river at the back of King's College and was burnt down to the water's edge. The students had experienced difficulties with the engine and called on John Scudamore, the boat-builder of Mill Lane, for help. Scudamore built several of the earliest motor launches seen on the Cam and was one of the earliest officers of the Cambridge Motor Boat Club together with other Cambridge luminaries such as William G. Pye, later founder of the Pye radio company, Sidney Smith a University tailor and Frank Pryor, the owner of a fish shop.

Another of the early members of the club was H.C. Banham who in 1906 launched a motor boat service on the Cam with 'The Enterprise' which had been specially built to carry 50 people. It was powered by a twelve horse power engine giving speeds of 7½ mph without any of the 'blacks' given off by a steam launch and an entire absence of smell. It glided through the water so smoothly one can forget there is any motive power on board, the News reported. Banham went on to establish a marina and hire out motor cruisers for exploring the fenland waterways. One of his descendants is still a member of the Club.

But in Ely there was another boatbuilding firm. It was founded in the early 1800s by Thomas Appleyard as a barge yard, principally concerned with making fen lighters of oak. Successive generations expanded the operation and in 1907 they introduced their first passenger launch, Pattie, carrying private parties of up to 45 people on trips to Denver or Cambridge. Two wars later, in 1945, their buildings on the Babylon side of the river were almost derelict with no equipment, plant or machinery. It was then that T.C. Appleyard and H.J. Lincoln combined to form a new company. They built craft ranging from children's paddle boats to 35-foot cruisers, some for export, then diversified into fibre glass boats that launched the firm into a new age.

Amongst their range was the Elysian 34, a six-berth cabin cruiser featuring nearly every possible amenity in the standard specification which cost £5,200 with a petrol engine.

Amongst the happy customers was a 'pop' singer whose 'hits' included "Living Doll" and "The Young Ones". Crowds gathered to watch Cliff Richard as he took delivery of his boat and he left the firm a souvenir autograph on a copy of the brochure.

That autographed brochure was kept and treasured by Harry Lincoln together with scores of photographs of the construction of the boats and the scene around Ely's riverside. These have been preserved by Alan Scarrow, who spent his career with the firm. Once they have been scanned and annotated they will be passed for safe keeping to the Cambridgeshire Collection at Lion Yard Library.

Memories 31 March 2015 by Mike Petty

Memories are about looking back and now it is my time to reflect on some of my writings in the News over the years.

It was more than 30 years ago that I was asked to stand in for Rodney Tibbs' 'History Revisited' feature. Having already spent 20 years exploring the material held in the Cambridgeshire Collection at Cambridge's central library I knew there was much that could be shared. My first article appeared on 30th June 1984. It was the story of witchcraft at Horseheath in 1916, the next was about the living conditions in Swavesey as recorded by James Bowd in September 1889.

By then the News had launched a series of Weekly titles and from February 1985 my 'Looking Back' articles started to appear regularly. One in July 1986 featured the memories of an Irish labourer building the runways at Witchford airfield in 1943.

But the Cambridgeshire Collection was more than just books: from August 1986 to October 1988 I featured the various engravers who had depicted the area since the 1660s. These were followed later by nearly two years of similar articles about the region's photographers, once more drawing on its extensive holdings.

In between there were 100 'Stories from a Year' based on topics that the News had reported in what was then its 100th year. A centenary book, "Cambridge in Pictures 1888-1988", combined images from the Collection with some of the News' photographs from the 1960s. "Memory Lane Cambridge", "Memory Lane Ely" and "Vanishing Cambridgeshire" followed.

Meanwhile I recycled some of the articles in weekly broadcasts on BBC Radio Cambridgeshire which, with regular talks to groups, resulted in the 'Librarian of the Year' award. Strangely, I've just rediscovered the report of the Westminster presentation when researching my 'Looking Back' column for 25 years ago!

By then it was getting difficult to think of things to write about. But the answer was obvious. Old and new items arrived daily at the Collection, why not reflect on the recent accessions and the people who'd given them? Thus the weeks from November 1992 to May 1996 were filled.

But by then my professional involvement with the Cambridgeshire Collection was coming to an end. I'd started a new series inspired by one of its thousands of playbills for performances at the Theatre Royal on Newmarket Road. This was headed "Mr Pickwick's first visit to Cambridge'. So I took the view that if he had really visited – and he must have done because it said so on a piece of paper (and everything written on paper must be true) - then he would have kept a scrapbook about the people he'd met. For the next 750 weeks (can that really be over 14 years) I turned the pages of "Pickwick's Cambridge Scrapbook, 1838".

At first I could draw on that remarkable collection of material amassed since before Charles Dickens himself lectured in the Guildhall. But then Lion Yard Library closed for refurbishment, a process that should have taken weeks and instead took years. Unable to access its resources I needed to discover another source of first-hand accounts of local life in the 1830s. I found it on the Internet. The myriad of websites, some of which are freely available, do indeed allow one to read a vast amount of Cambridgeshire publications. But I know that there are many, many more that are not online.

By then I had a daily 'Looking Back' column which involved going through the original files of the News' papers (deposited you know where), seeking and copying information I had not remembered seeing elsewhere.

And then there was this weekly 'Memories' page. This has relied on the letters you've written and the folk I've met at talks. I am privileged to have been able to share your recollections through the pages of our local newspaper. To find some of the old articles filed away in scrapbooks is always rewarding. But most moving of all has been to attend funerals where some of the last words said about a former correspondent have mentioned something from my columns.

You may not have cut and kept all, or any, of those thousands of article and snippets. But you can still read, search and download them. For as my thanks for all your assistance over the last 50 years I have placed them all on the world-wide-web. Google 'Internet Archive' and search 'Mike Petty Cambridge'.

However I know so many of us do not use the Internet. But there is still the telephone, the post and the voice. Please still drop me a line or give me a ring. I'll help if I can

And of course the paper edition of the Cambridge News will continue to reflect Memories of our area. I will continue to read them with great interest, safe in the knowledge that any little errors are not now of my making!

Reflections: Old and new items arrive daily at the Cambridgeshire Collection; Mike Petty reflects on some of the recent discoveries

These are the text of a number of the Reflections articles I wrote in the Cambridge Weekly News.

Reflections 1992 11 18 by Mike Petty

If there is one thing more interesting than old newspapers it is a scrapbook: containing cuttings from them, Two such have been donated recently which were compiled by the late Herbert Johnson whose photographic exploits I featured in the Cambridge Weekly, News a few months ago,

One volume contains items pasted into a writing book compiled by Hilda Ethel Wright in 1891, her neat hand-written notes on mountains, domestic economy or English grammar peeping out from beneath yellowing and tattered cuttings. These cover a variety of dates and topics with a preponderance of them relating to the Baptist church and Gt Gransden parish.

Amongst them the eye alights on an obituary of William Eaden Lilley dated May '15th 1913 one section of, which recalls his generosity for "he was one of the few of whom it might truly be said that his left hand knew not what His right hand gave. On principle he would not give a cabman more than His legal fare, but if he discovered that that cabman had a wife and family at home who, were in want of food and clothing, he would part with a Sovereign as readily as most men would give their sixpenny tip"

Perhaps it was the unusual name which prompted him to take the legal notice regarding Tryhena Scruby of Park Terrace in 1906 whilst the death of "Blind James" Hayward who could find his way around Cambridge without even a stick and except on rare occasions without having to ask guidance from a passer by also found its place in his scrapbook

Blind James' passage might have been obstructed by William Brown and his bride Doris, depicted setting off on their honeymoon on a tandem in 1934 whilst the proceedings of the town council some 30 years earlier also feature. The Watch Committee had proposed a bye-law with respect to driving cattle through the streets ensuring that there be two people to every 12 cows and that bulls should be controlled by a strong pole or staff at least five feet in length, securely fixed to a ring through the nose of the bull and firmly held by some competent person - on pain of a fine of 40 shillings

From Gt Gransden comes memories of William Pedley, born 1807 who loved to talk of old times - the jubilee of George II, the village stocks to which he saw two boys fastened for robbing an orchard and then flogged on their bare backs till the blood came - and the "cage", or village lock up in which he had once been incarcerated, He was wont to relate that story in the following manner, "I was working for Old Samuel Flinders at the Tithe Farm, He and he's

..." The story ends abruptly, the crumbling cutting torn, But a little detective work: could find the story in the original files of the "Cambridge Independent Press" held in the Cambridgeshire Collection to which these precious scraps are a welcome addition,

Quite by chance a variety of items come in together which refer to a particular., topic or theme, This week that theme has been the fenland with a new book and a tape recording being acquired together with something quite different - a page from the magazine "Church Bells" of July 20th

Writing over 90 years ago Henry Moxon introduces his readers to the problems of ministering in a fenland parish, an area without roads whose long droves fringed by deep rush-covered ditches, lead to the isolated farmhouses or cottages.

He describes how parson needed to attire himself in and sou'wester before his visit his parishioners, one of whom lived in an old windmill whose sails had long ceased to move but who gladly welcomed the minister's little gift of tobacco, the old lady spending many an hour sitting in her windmill door, smoking her long churchwarden" pipe, Whilst tobacco might be a boon the dreadful custom the mothers had of dosing their poor babies with opium in order to send them off to sleep whilst their parents went out to work: in the fields was, he declared, "a cruel and vile practice"; yet every fen cottage had its little garden filled with white poppies, purposely grown to be administered to children.

The good folk of Chatteris whose memories have formed the basis of a fascinating book "We're the characters now" also recall childhood problems whooping cough, mumps and measles as well as scarlet fever and tuberculosis together with other memories from their younger years – "My mother was the first woman cyclist to enter Chatteris and she was booed because it was not a very ladylike thing to do", Those were the days when roads were dusty and dirty in summer, muddy in winter, and when crossing sweepers would be paid to sweep a way across, One recalls how the cinema owner would stop the film and put up the lights to eject people she heard cracking nuts or misbehaving - once an attractive young lady was combing her beautiful hair when the film got stuck., "These boys started to whistle and she turned round to look at them, The whole place went in an uproar - up went the lights and out two rows of boys had to go!".

As Sue Oosthuizen, who tape recorded the memories as part of a WEA oral history course, points out, it is difficult to convey on the printed page the warm Fenland accent of the contributors, Lester Milbank however has no problems at all in this regard. His newly-issued cassette combining his already successful Tiger Talk compilation with another entitled "Christmas Tiger Talk:" makes compulsive listening with its skilful blend of voices commenting on fenland life, Topics such as the fen blow", flooding, folk remedies and the joys and heartbreak of Christmas combine to capture the spirit and sounds of the fen, complementing the Chatteris book and making one wish that Henry Moxon could have done something similar in 1900!

Sue Oosthuizen's "We're the characters now: the oral history of Chatteris" is published by Cambridgeshire Libraries Publications at 4.50; "Tiger Talk: and Christmas Tiger Talk.." produced by Lester Milbank: retails at £4.95, Both may be ordered from bookshops or libraries or direct from Cambridge Central Library shop

Now that the crowds have left the war memorials and the poppy wreaths become battered by wind and rain the memories of wartime are allowed to dim again. "We will remember them, most now never knew and nearly others have themselves faded away, just as the stone memorials have become weathered and stained,

Yet the story of the memorials themselves has become as forgotten as those they commemorate even by 1924 few Cambridge folk marked the opening of what had been intended as the counties' premier tribute to its dead, 'a new Nurses' Home at Addenbrooke's Hospital'. This half of the total money raised by the Lord Lieutenant's War Memorial Fund, collecting from town, frown and county to provide a fitting memorial,

But there were other projects as well, One the erection of inscribed at Ely Cathedral, commemorating parish by parish the names of those who served and fell. This would leave a farther sum of £3,500 for a celebration of "Victory" in the form of a statue by Canadian sculptor Tait McKenzie whose original proposal had envisaged something taller than the funds would actually stretch to and the memorial had to be reduced in height. Yet came the day of opening this was not ready and a plaster copy was created to be unveiled by the Duke of York who was in Cambridge attending the Royal Agricultural Show

Full details of the discussion and arguments, proposals and debates which raged over 70 years ago have just been published by Australian Prof K.S. Inglis contained in the latest issue of the "Journal of contemporary history", an article which deserves wider readership than it is likely to receive.

Yet this is not the only unexpected record of wartime activity for from Sawston has just come Abe Easey's account of the impact of units of the United States Army who descended on that village from 1943 to 1945, "A street full of sad sacks" outlines the problems of such an invasion - the overflowing of the sewerage system, the overloading of the telephone the overcrowding of the buses into Cambridge - and the overplaying of the village's first jukebox: in the saloon bar of the Black Bull. Many fascinating details of sentry duty in blackout, the war-time use of Sawston Hall where wire-fenced towers kept watch over the King and Queen when they paid a visit during the early days of war are contained in its pages, yet only a few dozen copies have been produced, of which the Cambridgeshire Collection has secured two.

Even more conventionally produced items are easy to miss and it has taken two years for us to obtain a copy of another fascinating book, "Spitfire squadron" published by Air Research Publications & available from Duxford Imperial War Museum reprints "one of the finest first-person accounts of air fighting during the Battle of Britain, a book first published in 1942. It is the record of Squadron Leader Brian Lane who flew from Fowlmere airfield. Though censorship blocked publication of names of places and people these are now explained in the second part of the new book.: which contains photographs and goes on to report the death of the author when shot down over the North Sea in December 1942. His body was never found but his name is inscribed on the Runnymede memorial., one of thousands, but this time remembered,

Members of the Cambridge Antiquarian Society will have less need of book tokens than usual this Christmas for recently they have received no less than three publications for their annual subscription of £10:

One is a cumulative index to the articles appearing in previous volumes of the Proceedings; identifying the myriad topics that have been covered since the Society was established in 1840. The others are the issues for 1990 and 1991

Detailed archaeological papers occupy much space including accounts of excavations at Barrington Anglo-Saxon cemetery, St Neots priory and fishponds at Linton together with pages of detailed drawings of flint scrapers, arrowheads and axes from the fens. When such items are properly recorded they can add greatly to the early history of an area, but what happens to them once removed from the soil. Today they are properly stored and accessible but this has not always been the case

This is demonstrated by Nigel Holman's account of Marshall Fisher and his Ely museum which opened in 1843, its collection boosted by many finds discovered during the construction of railways through the fenland. Open only Monday afternoons it attracted few visitors other than those gentlemen and their ladies who could afford the subscription fee, nor did Ely Councillors offer much support. On Marshall Fisher's death in 1899 there being no like-minded individual prepared to take his place and keep the museum open it was sold to Cole Ambrose at Stuntney Hall where it remained hidden from public view until purchased by the Cambridge Antiquarian Society in 1923. As this month sees the closure of the excellent Farmland Museum at Haddenham the article has particular relevance,

Graham Chainey has two contributions to the 1991 Proceedings. One chronicles Royal visits to Cambridge between 1441 and 1536, showing not even a King could visit whenever he wanted. Thus in September 1444 Henry VI cancelled a trip due to "the air and the pestilence that hath long reigned". The arrival of such important guests needed much preparation as at Queens' College in 1520 when Cardinal Wolsey stayed ; "the great chamber, hall, cloister and chapel were white-washed ... and the cobwebs swept from the hall roof",

In July 1446 Henry VI laid the foundation stone of King's College chapel and many subsequent visits revolved around that building. In his second paper Chainey lists the drawings, paintings, engravings and photographs that have shown the Chapel up to 1900. He devotes a page to the monumental work of Joshua Baldry who in 1809 produced a detailed engraving of the East Window, using a telescope placed in the organ loft. This was the most complete record of any of the windows for 130 years until Peter Brunney undertook a photographic record in 1939 as the glass was being removed in anticipation of German bombing. One of these photographs shows a panel of glass being carried from the chapel, another the scene inside as work progressed. They will doubtless feature in a future volume of "Proceedings" as the Cambridge Antiquarian Society continues to provide a vehicle for articles on the history and archaeology of the County

Cambridge Antiquarian Society "Proceedings" vol. 79 for 1990 is £7.50 for non-members, vol.80 £12.00; earlier volumes are also available from the Librarian, Dr John Pickles at the University Museum of Archaeology, Downing Street, Cambridge

Reflections 1992 12 16

Perusal of this week's list of accessions reveals a very mixed bag including various books of poetry and a number of pairs - reports on the Cambridge and South Cambridgeshire local plans, a couple of newsletters issued for the guidance of School Governors and a duo of archaeological reports on Brent ditch and the Dullingham—Swaffhams pipeline. The Countryside Commission has just produced two series of leaflets detailing walks and rides along the Icknield way and cycle routes through the fens

Two more items are on first glance a little confusing as "A taste of East Anglia" is in fact a cassette guide to places rather than produce - and "Rosemary for remembrance" is a recipe book issued by the Sue Ryder foundation and does not relate to plants.

This week however the dominant theme has been botanical, including the acquisition of something missed years ago - an issue of the Journal of the Linnean Society published in 1912 which includes a detailed study of the ecology of Gamlingay wood complete with weather records, soil analysis and study of vegetation all of which is essential, reading for botanists but incomprehensible to the rest of us,

Equally puzzling has been the abundance of fungi seen growing in local fields following the changes in farming practice, Some are probably edible others potentially poisonous. One lady who has recently devoted much time to their study has been Doris Watson who, now 91, has lodged with us two albums of her paintings of mushrooms, toadstools and the rest - some of which she has spotted growing in the gardens around Milton Road Library. These beautiful illustrations, now on display in the Collection, cannot fail to attract and we are delighted to house them pending their possible desposit in a place more appropriate to their specialist subject matter

Then on Saturday afternoon we found the answer to a mystery - the date of something we already had - when one of our readers spotted an advertisement in the "Cambridge Chronicle" for 26th July 1847 for a Victorian publication entitled "The land we live in". The ad only ran for one week - perhaps not surprisingly for this guide for visitors was less than complimentary about Cambridge - the town devoid of dignity or beauty, its buildings too mean to attract attention. The author was more scathing about the new architecture of Downing College - finding it devoid of everything that any one could possibly conceive to be either graceful or appropriate. He comments upon possible improvements - "It was proposed to purchase the property and convert it into the terminus of the railway, then the thing must have been pulled down; as it would have been impossible to tolerate such a structure for even such a purpose". Fortunately even he found some things he did like, including the tree lined walks - "a delicious place to loiter away a summer's afternoon" - and left a record of his visit in engravings depicting the botanical beauties of the countryside with the buildings as mere background details

This has been the week for photographs - clinched when on Saturday the post contained a parcel from Holland, Inside were copies of a new book entitled "Great & Little Shelford in old picture postcards"; compiled by Margaret Ward and featuring 76 views of the two parishes - many of which had been supplied from our Collection and featuring many photographs taken by local photographer Ted Mott in the 1920s.

In addition to the usual quiet and peaceful views when horses and bicycles outnumbered cars and steam locomotives brought goods to the village station there are others which reflect dramatic change - such as that of Shelford Old House, pictured in its grandeur on a postcard issued just months before the building was gutted by fire in February 1929, the blaze starting in the pantry and quickly spreading to the roof and the contents of the house destroyed.

Such dramatic events were of course reported by the local newspaper and the "Cambridge Chronicle" carried a number of photographs recording the tragedy. But even in those days here was an interest in pictures of the past as well as present with a regular weekly series reproducing old pictures sent in by readers. Enterprising businesses benefited by this interest in nostalgia to emphasise their own long traditions of service.

Thus when John Vail, ironmongers of Post Office Terrace, wanted to pay tribute to the long-service by five of its employees in 1921 it chose to feature not only a picture of its present staff but also a much older print, taken in 1872, and were able to identify the names of the men depicted - including Fred Lister, then aged 13, sitting to the right of the anvil. This week we have been given an original of that photograph together with another taken c1884 by a member of the Photographic Tourists Association. Quite why they took such a picture is unknown - equally obscure now is the Cambridge firm itself - though in 1921 they were described as "well-known". Their advertisements show they were established in 1835 and describe their services as furnishing ironmongers, bell hangers, braziers, gas fitter and hot water engineers, installing electric bells as well as grinding razors and repairing lawnmowers. They disappear from Directories about 50 years ago and seem to have been largely forgotten and unrecorded.

Precisely the same fate seems to have befallen James Sendall & co of Cherry Hinton Road, Cambridge, horticultural engineers and suppliers of conservatories, green houses and heating apparatus. Yet in March we acquired a copy of their 35th catalogue issued in 1896. Nearly 100 pages depict their range of products with illustrations of conservatories erected around the country - Guildford, Isle of Wight, Lancaster and Brighton - seeming very similar to some of those offered by companies today. Yet a search through trades directories will find only brief mention of the firm between 1891 and 1898 and its story is untold.

However such has been the response from readers of this column in recent weeks that perhaps more information will now come to light to enable some more of Cambridge's past to be recorded for the future,

"Great & Little Shelford in old picture postcards" by Margaret Ward is published by European Library and available in bookshops

Reflections 1992 12 31

Whilst it is relatively easy to locate actual books relating to Cambridge it is much less so to track down fiction with a local setting.

Who would expect for instance that one of Nigel Tranter's historical novels of life in Scotland' would contain a detailed account of an incident relating to Hereward the Wake.

"Margaret the Queen", set in the years following the Battle of Hastings, tells of how Malcolm, King of Scotland, endeavoured to inflict defeat on William the Conqueror by forcing him to full-scale battle in the tens. The plan involved inciting Saxon lords to march on Peterborough thus prompting a major confrontation in an area where the mounted Norman troops in their heavy armour would be at a disadvantage and from which Hereward and his band could inflict considerable slaughter. The strategy failed with remnants of the slaughtered Saxon army escaping through Pymore Fen. It was whilst this attack was taking place - according to Tranter - that William mounted his main assault on the Isle of Ely from the South and with his own men distracted by the affray in the North Hereward could do little but escape into other areas of the fenland. The book was published by Hodder & Stoughton in 1979 and has taken until now for its local connection to be discovered - and then by chance,

Novels can combine the author's imagination and knowledge of location with known facts to give a picture of events not otherwise recorded. Sometimes indeed it can be too real for comfort - thus Terence White felt induced to include a disclaimer in his book "Darkness at Pemberley". Whilst acknowledging that the "St Barnabas College" which forms the setting for part of the story could easily be taken for that of Queens' College in Cambridge he was quick to point out that no member of that college would indulge in any of the activities portrayed. The story then revolves around blackmail and murder occasioned by drug abuse amongst senior academics. Whilst such topics might be ready sources for detective fiction in the 1990s it is surprising to note that this book was first issued 60 years ago and must indeed have raised eyebrows then. Despite this we failed to acquire a copy for the Cambridgeshire Collection until the recent reprint by Gollancz Crime,

I equally failed to note a more contemporary crime story yet one which presents a most interesting picture of Cambridge life as it may well be seen by a numerous group of our visitors. "Death of a Daimyo" by James Melville (Martin Seeker & Warburg, 1984) follows the visit to England of Japanese Police Superintendent Utani during which one of his countrymen is murdered at the opening ceremony of an institute of Japanese Studies in Cambridge. The visitor's impression of St Cuthbert's college and its High Table lifestyle together with the comparison of English life with that of their native country makes most interesting reading.

We did however obtain a copy of "Naomi's Room" (HarperCollins 1931) immediately on publication for the central character visits the Collection when attempting to identify the former owner of his Cambridge house whose mutilated children join his own murdered daughter in haunting the premises. Described as a classic ghost story the book is not one to be read alone at night. The amount of research an author needs to undertake before writing is reflected in the acknowledgement to my colleague Chris Jakes who did indeed guide author Jonathan Aycliffe through the complexities of street directories and burgess lists, just as we do hundreds of enquirers each month, in fact as well as fiction.

Reflections 1993 01 06

During November George Anderson and his wife found their way into the Cambridgeshire Collection. They were in England on holiday from their home in Louisville, Kentucky and seeking not their family tree, but directions to the former family home, Olmsted Hall.

Having pored over the Ordnance Survey maps for the south-eastern corner of the county and located the house just outside Castle Camps we sent them on their way with directions and some photocopies of the Listed Buildings record from our computer link and photographs of what the property looked like in the 1930s. Early in December we received a letter from them telling us they found it easily and enclosing photographs they had taken to update our files. We sent a thank—you note and thought little more of it.

A couple of weeks later however the editor of "Have-hill Historian" brought in our copy of their November 1992 issue which includes an account of "A visit to Olmsted Hall" written nearly 90 years ago in the form of a letter to an American lady - Mrs John Whittlesea Olmsted. It would appear that her correspondent had somewhat more difficulty than did our American friends.

They had set off on 9th October 1904 taking a train from Liverpool Street station to Haverhill hoping to find lodgings for the night in a town "where rooms are not much in request". Although the "wrinkled old station-master" did not prove very helpful somebody recommended a Mrs Page in Mount Road - the one house with a door knocker. Once accommodated they set off on a six-mile walk through "Bumsted Helion", following a map drawn up by the postmistress and one of her nice customers. The country was "too glorious for description, unspoilt by factories, modern inventions and untouched by trippers" whilst every passing Hodge was obliging and affable, especially a "sweet shepherd with his flock of sheep and a beguiling little country boy of about thirteen, glowing with health and bursting with communicativeness". They passed half-timbered cottages and finally the Hall dawned on their view, partly surrounded by a moat – long, low, half-timbered with a discoloured reddish-brown roof, delightfully wobbly in outline and a leaning red chimney-stack

They found the occupants friendly and were given a tour of the property with its flag-floors and vast chimneys, although there was embarrassment when they discovered the housekeepers husband swigging away at a quart pot of ale in the dairy. Their return to Haverhill was in the farm wagonette whose driver was the first surly and monosyllabic person they had met - through he was very ready with the information that the roads were bad and the journey a long one. On arrival they were greeted as "adventuresses" by their landlady - a description they thought they had earned by the time they got back to London next day following an unpleasant and tiring railway journey

A copy of the "Haverhill Historian" article will soon be en route to Louisville where it will doubtless revive memories — though perhaps not of sweet shepherds and beguiling country boys, for such are less obvious these days when people sweep past in automobiles. It may possibly add another piece to their jigsaw for the 1904 visitors had found that they too were following in another American's footsteps, that of a rich couple who had driven over in a brake and pair from Saffron Walden claiming that their ancestors had lived in the house 200 years earlier - but not getting their name. Thus as one more piece is added another gap appears and the interest is sustained

Side by side on our New Books display at present are three items which seem miles apart. The newly-published and authoritative "History of the University of Cambridge volume 4. 1870-1990". a "Biographical history of Gonville & Caius College" volume 6 (newly received though published in 1958) and "The Bomb Photo" cassette by "Dennis of Grunty Fen" They are linked by one thing -- the second World War

With the present volume the Cambridge University Press are now halfway through the first substantial history of the University in modern times, This is a History of the University and its place in the world, though largely in isolation from the town in which it is situated. There is little reference to domestic town-gown issues which have been subject to considerable change in the period under review or the "rags" which soured relations in Edwardian times, though the more recent and somewhat more peaceful Garden House Riot does receive mention. One would rightly expect the author to devote a section of his scholarly 650-page book to the War though his six pages seem particularly concise. But as he points out he is handicapped in a shortage of scholarly histories of colleges and faculties on which to base his history and the lack of contemporary records available for the more modern period - though had the Cambridgeshire Collection been included amongst the acknowledged sources this omission may have been partially remedied.

Nevertheless there is a detailed bibliography and the author pays full credit to one source which we have only recently acquired. Judging from its title one would hardly expect Prof. Stratton's volume of the "Biographical History of Gonville & Caius College", issued in 1958, to be compulsive reading. Only when scanning it from cover to cover do the unexpected appendices come to light, including a most interesting account of the college between 1939-45 when part of its buildings were taken over by the Government for the use of the Master in Lunacy and his staff. Soon afterwards men of the Scottish Regiment, evacuated from Cherbourg, were based in the college for some days, the officers dining with Fellows at High Table. Those students who remained in Cambridge were pressed into service for Home Guard or Civil Defence duties - guarding the Post Office etc - activities which "did not pass off entirely without injury to the public". Air Raid precautions were put in hand with a fire engine installed in Trinity Hall by the river and a line of piping laid into St Michael's Court. But the only damage caused was when a cobble stone crashed through the Chapel roof. It had come from the devastated Union Society building during the same attack which has left the walls of Whewell's Court pitted with holes from the debris. This was but one of a number of raids which killed several townspeople but left University buildings and academic studies largely undisturbed.

And so to "Dennis". Living on the edge of the edge of Grunty Fen I was at first tempted to join Christopher South in his search for the railway carriage and associated outbuildings from which a series of radio interviews have been broadcast, some of which are now also available on cassettes issued by "the Grunty Fen Gramophone Shed". The area is home to an abnormally high proportion of unconventional dwellings but people may ask whether his world of contentment amid squalor is real. Dennis's description of Fen Tigers with "dew-drops on their nose ... and webs between their toes" echoes that of a London visitor in 1862 who recorded "all the girls had yellow spotted bellies and webbed feet". In "The bomb photo" Dennis relates how his education was interrupted when it was realised that an unexploded bomb was being used as a doorstep. In fact newspapers report that bombs were dropped on Grunty Fen on 1st August 1940 and later a dummy airfield was constructed to distract enemy planes from Witchford airfield just to the north. But none of this is yet recorded in formal histories. As Chris South asks "Where does reality lie? In Dennis' life or yours?" It a question for the Professional Historian to answer for we lesser mortals cannot,

Saturday brought traction engines under the spotlight, A visit from one family of knowledgeable enthusiasts was echoed by the arrival in the post of an article from the Locomotive Society Journal of November 1992 relating to a rare ploughing engine built by Howard in 1877 and used in Burwell for over 50 years. In 1929 it was sold back to the makers for display purposes and travelled under its own steam back to its birthplace at Bedford. Before it departed from Burwell it was photographed by Dorothy Grainger and two of her pictures form the basis of the article,

Then when browsing through the just reprinted "Swavesey Chronicle" with its wealth of stories culled from Cambridgeshire newspapers between 1776 and 1899 my eye alighted on an article from September 1899 describing a fire at Manor farm which was caused by a spark from a threshing machine engine which was passing at the time. Despite valiant efforts by villagers over £100 worth of damage was caused and there was much criticism of the parish fire engine, an ancient locomotive built in 1827 which was out of order and it was of no use whatever

From March 1857 comes another story, headed 'Singular Occurrence' telling how Joseph Jellings had a brother Nathaniel who was fighting with the army in the Crimea. On the day the battle of Inkermann was fought Joseph saw a vision of his brother standing beside him and suddenly saw his head apparently cut off and fall one way and the trunk the other. Several months after this they received notification that Nathaniel had died of fever at Scutari. However a week ago the mother was travelling on the Haddenham carrier's cart when a woman whose son had been on leave related how he had been going into battle with his friend Jellings who had called out "Come along, Charley, and you'll be all right". As he spoke a cannon ball came and severed Jelling's head from his body. The mother fainted.

A similar shock faced Oliver Hopkin's family during the Great War. Oliver had left his Wilburton home to join the Suffolk regiment and wrote letters describing his lot ... "Dear Mother father and Brother and Sisters i now take the pleasure in riteing you a few lines hoping it will find you all well as it leaves me quite well at present and i think i shall keep so a time yet for we are along way off of the Germans now i am pleased to say for we have close to them this last 6 weeks 300 yards thats all but we had a rum job to get away ... Dad will you be so good for me as to look around some of our Wilburtons people for a Pack of Cards for they are very handy to us out here to have a nice game with some of them would not refuse them i now it you tell them",

The arrival of the postman bringing such letters would have been very welcome in the quiet fenland village, even if Ol's messages were not always pleasant. They somehow survived and were published as "A Rendezvous with Death" in 1986, retaining the spelling of the originals,

Last week we received a cassette of a play based on the book. The story has a dramatic ending with the arrival of another letter. This time there was none of the usual preamble but it was stark and to the point, "Sir, These photos and pocket wallet was found by one of my men during the recent operation in a dug-out. The man thinks they belong to the dead Corporal who was in the dug-out ,,," it was the first time the family had any inkling their son would no longer be coming home

"The Swavesey Chronicle" compiled by H. Hephner is reissued by Swavesey & district history society at £4,00

"A rendezvous with death" by A.J. Peacock costs £1,85 from the author at 128 Holgate Road, York, Both are available at Cambridge Library shop

Reflections 1993 01 27

In 1932 the Town and Country Planning Act set out to tackle the problems arising from rapid growth of industrialism and increased population yet at the same time protect the countryside from irresponsible development. Two years later a Cambridgeshire Regional planning report was issued which included a traffic survey concluding that the existing road system was generally sufficient for anticipated traffic growth, though a Cambridge ring road was needed together with some village by-passes. The main traffic artery was the A,10 road but no improvements were envisaged between Cambridge and Ely apart to the level crossing on the Milton Road where a new bridge would eventually be needed, a new stretch of road in Milton village & a link road at Waterbeach

Over the last 60 years things have changed somewhat and traffic forms a more substantial part of the current review of the County Structure Plan, copies of which are now in the Cambridgeshire Collection and on which people are invited to comment.

It has been agreed already that the A10 should be dualled and work has started to consider the various options involved - should the existing road be widened or a new route chosen. As part of this process the area on either side of the current road has been the subject of an archaeological desktop study, the results of which have now been published by Cambridgeshire Archaeology,

The A10 corridor has a long history of human settlement and use, but this occurs against a background of flooding and environmental instability. At one time the area was dry and covered with forest but -subsequent flooding resulted in sea water covering the low lying areas, with settlement established on the higher land or fen islands. During the Roman period the construction of Akeman Street and the Car Dyke, a canal linking the southern fens with Lincolnshire, opened up communications but these deteriorated and the rivers remained the main means of transport until the construction of a Turnpike Road in the 1760s.

In their report the archaeologists survey the history of the parishes along the route - Milton which was a significant industrial site in Roman times, Landbeach hit by the Black Death in 1349, Waterbeach which depended on its river link along the Cam, Stretham where a ferry used to cross the Old West River and Lt Thetford where a Bronze age causeway has been discovered.

They also include maps indicating the range of artefacts discovered within each settlement - Roman pottery, a medieval purse, a Neolithic flint axe - and describe the Scheduled Ancient Monuments such as the Old Pumping Engine at Stretham built in 1831 to drain the fens and now undergoing restoration prior to its reopening in the Spring. Once the improvements are completed this will become even more of a tourist attraction and will generate additional traffic along the approach roads - and although this is hardly likely to influence the routing of the new dualled A10 it is one of the factors which need to be considered by the Road Engineers when planning a route which will meet the needs of increasing traffic yet minimise its impact on both existing residents and the remains of those who previously inhabited the area,

As work continues so even more archaeological evidence will be unearthed and be recorded in the wide range of excellent reports being issued by Cambridgeshire Archaeology and deposited in the Cambridgeshire Collection

Reflections 1993 02 03

Saturday morning was one of those times when it felt as if another tract of Rainforest must have been felled just to make the amount of paper that was awaiting me in my office.

In addition to the piles that had been there before my day off there was a whole boxful on the visitor's chair (though there is nowhere for the visitor to put their feet even if they sit down).

Investigation quickly revealed that it contained the deposit reports relating to the proposed Cambridge Southern Relief Road including numerous copies of a non-technical summary of the environmental reports for people to take away. The strength of the case for the road will doubtless be matched with strong arguments against and these will themselves be reflected within the Cambridgeshire Collection. It was ever such,

One of the most attractive examples of opposition to proposed roads must still be that produced by Quentin Nelson and Adrian Graham in 1927 when they were lamenting the proposed Coe Fen Road, Their poetic case is complemented with sketches of the wildlife to be disturbed whilst the words lament the tranquillity that would be lost by the heavily laden motor lorries they envisaged would trundle day and night across the previously quiet area.

Most of us cannot remember a world without the motor car. As John Crowe points out nowadays we sit bumper to bumper in cars or bounce along on buses but back in the last century most people had to walk, Those who didn't walk rode on horses or in carts or coaches pulled by horses. In those days it was the blacksmith, not the petrol attendant, who was relied upon to keep the traffic moving and John pays tribute to him in one of his songs featured on "Horses, housemaids and hard old times", a cassette and book illustrating Victorian life through song. The tape features traditional songs such as "The Lincolnshire Poacher", "Follow the Plough" and "Windy old weather" together with original compositions such as that describing the work of Jenny the housemaid between rising at 5 am and crawling back to bed at 9pm, serving not only master and mistress but also cook and butler for the princely wage of £6 a year.

Another recalls Washing Day when water had to be drawn from the pump or well and heated in an old copper over the kitchen fire before the hard work with washboard and bar of smelly green soap, The there was the rinsing, wringing by hand or mangle before hanging it out on washing lines criss-crossing the yard whilst everybody prayed it wouldn't rain - as the singer-laments "its thump, thump, scold, scold, scrub, scrub away, there's never a bit of comfort here upon a washing day".

Although aimed at schools the catchy songs - easy to follow with words in the accompanying book - would make a most useful addition to reminiscence work in old folks' home, This recording by the Tollhouse Company was just one of a series of cassettes deposited by Brewhouse Records of Wicken which feature the music of Cambridgeshire. This continues a tradition of song as John will know for more years ago than either of us care to remember he tracked down some of the original tunes for the Victorian ballads housed in the Collection featuring issues of that time - Corn Law repeal, rather than new motorway in those days

"Cambridgeshire Southern Relief Road environmental statement- non-technical summary" is available from the Cambridgeshire Collection or Shire Hall "Horses, housemaids & hard old times ; Victorian life through song" tape & booklet is published by Brewhouse, Breeds Farm, 57 High St. Wicken price

Reflections 1993 02 10 probably by Mike Petty 17 Jan 1993

Some weeks seem to disappear without any time to do anything except answer readers' enquiries and concentrate on specific projects which demand immediate attention.

The preparation of the Cambridgeshire Heritage Showcase has made this one of those weeks, Although material has come in -including some interesting photographs - most of it still awaits accessioning, making the next week's intake even more impressive.

One item which has found its way into the system is a copy of the sale particulars for the Lolworth Grange Estate when it came under the auctioneers hammer in July 1938. It comprised the "Grange", described as an old fashioned residence built in 1867 but with private lighting by a 35-volt Fetter plant with a series of 14 cells, a telephone (Madingley 147) and water supply from three wells pumped to a reservoir and thence by gravitation to the house. Many other village properties were also for sale including Lolworth post office which made £220 whilst a pair of brick and thatched cottages on the village green are recorded as fetching a similar price. There is no mention of electricity or telephone for these lesser properties though water was supplied by stand-pipe to the post office.

A survey of housing facilities in another part of the county is incorporated in the report of the Royal Commission on Labour for 1892, a copy of which we received 100 years later and which has this week been shelved. It surveys the Poor Law Union of North Witchford - the Chatteris, March, Manea area - and like many Government reports makes fascinating reading,

After surveying the agricultural employment -situation - wages of horsekeepers and cattlemen at 12/- (60p) a week with cottage or 2/- (10p) more without, with women earning between 1/- and 1/9 (5-8p) per day and children 3/6 to 7/- (18-35p) per week - the report goes on to describe a typical cottage for a labourer with nine children.

It had one sitting-room with roof sloping to four feet, doors about 4ft 5in high with two bedrooms, one bed in pantry, all on ground floor. The occupants often knocked their heads against the beam in the sitting-room, only five feet from the ground whilst few people were small enough to be able to stand upright in the bedrooms. Outside a piggery and small farmyard adjoined the bedroom whilst on the other side a henhouse adjoined the pantry.

The water supply was fetched from the river or caught from the tiled roof in tubs - though this could be green and red and like drinking blood, It would overflow into ditches which surrounded the property - which would themselves overflow in winter and mix with the muck from the pigs. Privies were another source of complaint, with 4 or 5 cottages sharing one closet in Benwick and elsewhere whilst the cesspools were often far too close to the pump for drinking water (where they had such a luxury)

For such luxurious conditions prices were quoted as £5.4.0 (£5,20) for a two-bedroom cottage, and rents of 1/3 a week (6p) for a single bedroomed place, Yet people survived and were becoming fashion conscious with Corduroys being no longer worn by anybody, even on Sundays, and men dressing in check cotton material instead of woollen, increasing their liability to chills, But, adds the report, nearly everyone over the age of 20 carried a watch

"Side by side the MA & the Mechanic, the Undergraduate and the Schoolboy, old men in broad cloth and young boys in fustian¹", John Pink's description of those using his Cambridge Free Library, though written some 90 years ago, still applies today,

Thus in the Cambridgeshire Collection we try to help many readers of all ages and abilities each pursuing something of interest to themselves, either for necessity, for school project or just because they want to. Some will be content to browse for themselves rather than have their attention drawn to the book that will give them what they want. For many however time is of the essence with a project that needs to be completed quickly or something that has to be found before the traffic meter runs out.

All are welcome although inevitably some are more welcome than others and their visits are remembered with particular affection. Such was our first acquaintance with a gentleman enquiring about medieval deer parks who only on leaving revealed himself to be one of the country's leading Historical Geographers. The memories were rekindled this week when his widow came in for copies of a portrait taken by Ramsey & Muspratt some 20 years ago, Another whose visits were always a tonic was Glyn Daniel, former Emeritus Professor of Archaeology at Cambridge whose anthology "Writing for Antiquity" was presented to the Collection on Saturday, This selection from his Editorials written between 1957 and 1989 contains many fascinating stories including hints for lectures on how to cope should some prankster substitute a slide of a bearded but naked lady portrayed upside down on a large mushroom for the expected view of a Roman ruin. His description of Ley Hunters as "lunatic figures who dwell on the wilder shores of archaeology" might not be appreciated by another of our readers whose appearance Daniel so accurately summarised.

But all sorts of people are passionately interested in their locality. One such was the late Dr William Mortlock Palmer, who as a child was a regular reader in the Cambridge free library. He went on to become a Linton GP who devoted much time to the history and antiquity of the area, writing, lecturing, excavating and photographing. Early this week we were presented with some more of his photographs and negatives, including a series showing archaeological excavations in the 1920s with a picture of men, now dead, inspecting the bodies of others long dead.

Included with them were others taken by Percy Salmon a photographic prodigy, who started his hobby as a lad of 12 and in 1891 won the Cambridge Camera club cup for the best set of five photographs taken in and around the town. Later he studied in Paris and went on to travel the world with his camera, meeting Kings, Queens, Emperors and Statesmen and contributing to nearly all the English and American newspapers and magazines. In 1927 he retired to live in Melbourn where he worked with Palmer. The pictures just received are from his early period, taken between 1888 and 1890. The donor who had treasured them for so long had come to see the Cambridgeshire Heritage Showcase where - by pure good fortune - many of Salmon's pictures are featured on the continuous video presentation.

But such coincidences are everyday features in the Cambridgeshire Collection where past and present merge, time stands still but the hours speed away - as those who end up running for the bus testify

Returning from a short break in Kent I find the anticipated pile of new accessions, including one describing precisely the area that has been home during the week. Yet instead of calling it "Tonbridge" the author chose to call the location as "Sawston". I had been alerted to the novel following a talk at Sawston Hall some months ago but had only recently placed an order for "The longest journey" by E.H. Forster. The book itself was first published in 1907 and is described as his most difficult, most personal novel; rich in its complexity of symbolism ... relating to the philosophical ideals of turn-of-the-century Cambridge. The Penguin edition supplied contains nearly 30 pages of introduction and notes by Elizabeth Heine in which I find myself acknowledged - so why did I miss it when it came out in 1984?

The story describes undergraduate life, homosexuality and the Apostles which the Editor assures us is accurate and certainly the description of traffic chaos rings true - "Cambridge welcomed her sons with open drains, Petty Cury was up, so was Trinity Street, and navvies peered out of King's Parade, Here it was gas, there electric light, but everywhere something, and always a smell",

Without the introduction I should have been trying to reconcile the Sawston in the book with the village whose name Forster borrowed. When he was writing it was a settlement of some 400 houses providing homes for 855 people. By 1991 there were 2,661 dwellings housing 7,169 residents of whom 659 had changed houses within the previous year including 183 who were new to Cambridgeshire, The majority live in semi-detached houses, whilst 241 homes had no central heating and just 3 properties either lacked or shared a bath, shower or loo.

These detailed figures have just been compiled for all villages by the County Council Research Group from information collected at the 1931 census and are an example of the way information can be made available through the use of modern computer technology.

Litlington is another village that has changed - as is shown in a new booklet of photographs taken in 1944 and 1984, just published in aid of the church. Bill Dumas's pictures capture quiet village streets disfigured by air raid shelters and the occasional army jeep whilst those of Brian Maynard taken 40 years later show how many of the historic thatched cottages had been replaced with much less distinctive - though doubtless more comfortable - dwellings.

The Cambridgeshire Local History Society are also engaging in a village Photographic Survey, repeating the project carried out by the Cambridge Antiquarian Society some 60 years ago. For their registration fee of £10 participants are supplied with copies of the old pictures and an Ordnance Survey map of 1927. They have to locate the site of the original photo and take a modern view from the same angle. This fascinating exercise provides hours of detective work and the resulting pictures are filed alongside the originals. Girton and Quoy are amongst the village already surveyed but many remain to be undertaken and volunteers can contact the co-ordinator, Gillian Rushworth, through the Cambridgeshire Collection where the Cambridge Antiquarian Society's pictures are currently housed alongside our own. One word of caution - sometimes the original photographer did not remember which village he was in when he took his picture and - as with Forster's "Sawston" - the unwary may be misled,

Just occasionally the items we add to the Cambridgeshire Collection are reprints we have ourselves commissioned from items in our stock. In this category are a number of views first published by Rudolph Ackermann in his "History of the university of Cambridge, its Colleges, Halls and Public Buildings" in 1815. Born in Saxony Ackermann practiced as a saddler and coachbuilder in various European cities before setting up a print shop in the Strand in 1795. Here he established a lithographic press which issued an astonishing series of illustrated works. He commissioned a talented team of illustrators and having achieved success with an Oxford volume then turned his attention to Cambridge with two volumes containing some 64 topographical views. They remain amongst the most attractive coloured illustrations of the town and its colleges & we have reproduced four scenes together with another depicting contemporary students.

Perhaps the most striking is the view of Trumpington Street and Pembroke College which has been adopted as the poster for the Heritage Showcase. This includes details of sheep being driven along the street whilst hens drink from the water in the channels beside the road — part of the scheme to provide running water in Cambridge which still bears the name of one of its benefactors, Thomas Hobson. The buildings beyond Pembroke college chapel were rebuilt in Victorian times whilst those on the opposite side of the street were swept away for the Fitzwilliam Museum,

This is complemented by a second view looking into town from Peterhouse, the oldest of the colleges, founded in 1284 by Hugh de Balsham. Bishop of Ely. Once more livestock are prominent whilst the background has been since changed by the erection of Emmanuel Congregational chapel & the Pitt Press.

Clare college forms the subject of a further two prints, one of which shows the most famous of all Cambridge prospects - the view from the Backs, though King's college chapel itself is largely obscured by trees the old bridge may be seen on the right of the view.

The other is a reminder of the commercial importance of the River with a line of barges being pulled towards the Mill Pool by a horse which is forced to be driven down the centre of the river, there being no towpath on either bank. The numerous bridges also provided a hindrance to navigation & the leading barge has had to lower its tall mast to allow the boat to pass beneath them. Watermen are shown pushing with their "spreads" to keep the barges in line,

If the buildings themselves are unchanging the character of the time is captured in the fifth print which depicts various classes of students. Two are Fellow-Commoners, privileged members of the University who could dine with the college Fellows and enjoy other distinctions. Those who were the younger sons of nobility — as here depicted — were entitled to wear a hat instead of the university cap and collar. The two, from Emmanuel and Trinity are shown with a "Nobleman", the eldest son of a Peer whose money and influence ensured him an Honorary Degree after just two years

Through a recent conversation with a remarkable nonagenarian we have been able to add much to our knowledge of two men who played an important part in Cambridge's photographic history.

Frederick Sanderson was born in July 1856 and in his younger days worked as a cabinet maker and wood and stone carver in Bridge Street but later combined this with his developing interest in photography. He became especially interested in architectural pictures, building up a magnificent collection of negatives of college views. But when he realised that existing cameras were not adequate for the task he designed his own which he patented in January 1895. In May 1897 five photographic experts came to Cambridge to test the claims of the new camera and found them proved. The tests were fully reported in the Press and the camera - named Sanderson after its inventor - became famous,
